It is not necessary, gentlemen, that I should call your attention to the abounding wealth of this threatened section of our State—filled with everything necessary for the comfort of our army and our people—or to the suffering and ruin of its loyal, patriotic inhabitants. You are sufficiently informed in regard thereto. It is for you, therefore, to say whether you will suffer our defences, as heretofore, to remain exclusively in the hands of the Confederate authorities, or take steps to carry out the will of the last Legislature, and raise troops enough on State authority to strengthen the weak hand of the general Government on our coast.

I unhesitatingly recommend the raising of at least ten regiments of reserves, to be accepted for three or four months, and dismissed in time to pitch their crops in the spring.

This force, auxiliary to the Confederate troops, would probably be able to prevent an advance of the enemy into the interior, and while subsisting on the abundant supplies in our eastern counties could benefit the whole State by aiding in withdrawing vast quantities of provisions from exposed points.

Inasmuch as it may become necessary for slave labour to be employed on State defences, and my authority to force such labour may be questioned by some, I would respectfully recommend the propriety of the passing of an act whereby such authority may be vested in me in case such urgent necessity shall arise as will justify it.

Next to the defence of the State from the enemy in importance, is the defence of our people against extortion and starvation. Notwithstanding the failure of the crops in the western part of the State, it is believed that there is within our borders an abundance of grain for the supply of our people, and a surplus for the use of the army. The lands heretofore devoted to cotton and tobacco have been planted in corn very generally, and the crop of this essential product is perhaps larger by many hundred thousand bushels than has ever been known. When this is considered, together with the immense crop of peas, potatoes, fruit, &c., there would seem to be little danger of any actual suffering among our people—nor would there be could it all be properly distributed and at reasonable prices. But the demon of speculation and extortion seems to have seized upon nearly all sorts and conditions of men, and all the necessities of life are fast getting beyond the reach of the poor.

Flour, which if properly left to the laws of supply and demand could not have risen to more than double peace rates, can now be used only by the rich.

Everything has a tendency upward in the same proportion—leather, woollen cloth, and cotton goods have been made the especial means of extortion. As if we were not sufficiently afflicted with the base and avaricious in our own midst, speculators from distant States swarm in the land, offering fabulous prices for everything they can buy. And in many instances, taking advantage of the patriotism of our people, they represent themselves as agents of the Government, purchasing for the army—thus obtaining what they could not otherwise do. The supply of salt will, I hope, be sufficient, but this subject too needs legislative action. Dr. Worth, the salt commissioner appointed by the Convention, has been industriously at work; but he has not produced a great quantity, owing to the difficulties which he has mentioned in his reports. His

I am also convinced that whilst the soldier in the field should have his property protected from seizure under execution, there exists no valid reason why, in the great plenteousness of money, and the high prices of property, any man should desire to be excused from paying his debts. I think it probable that it might also exert a favourable influence in prices if men were compelled to part with their surplus property to satisfy their creditors.

In this connection permit me to respectfully recommend that our present circuits be re-arranged, adding at least one additional circuit and another Judge thereof. The necessity for this change will be apparent from the following considerations:—

Some of the circuits embrace an extended area of territory with a large amount of business. The seventh circuit comprises eighteen counties, others more than twelve, and to some, two weeks are allotted. According to existing statutes, the Judges are allowed an annual salary of $1950, with the proviso "that in all cases where a Circuit of the Superior Courts shall exceed twelve weeks the Judges holding the said courts at any regular term shall be entitled to a compensation of $90 for the court of each county exceeding twelve held by them, to be paid by the public treasurer on the first days of January and July, in addition to their salary aforesaid, and each week in which a court shall be held shall be considered a term." Special terms of the Superior Courts are also held and for this service a compensation of $90 given, to be paid by the county in which the court is held. Upon examination it will be found that the amounts thus paid for the additional and extra courts exceed the salary of a single Judge.

The fourth section of the 102nd chapter of the Revised Code provides that "every Judge shall produce a certificate of the Clerk of each county of his having held the court of the county according to law; and for every such certificate omitted to be produced, there shall be a deduction from his salary of $100. Portions of certain circuits are occupied by the enemy, and it is impossible for the Judges to procure the required certificates. It may be necessary, therefore, to modify this provision to have effect only pending the war.

The Hon. Thomas Ruffin, jr., residing in the fourth judicial circuit, having resigned his place as one of the Judges of the Superior Courts of Law and Equity, my immediate predecessor with the advice of the Council of State, filled said vacancy by granting a temporary commission to the Hon. John Kerr, of Caswell, which will expire at the end of your present session. It is your duty to fill this vacancy permanently.

The office of Attorney-General has been also vacant by the former incumbent, Hon. W. A. Jenkins, entering the army and accepting an office under the Confederate States. There are also solicitors to be elected for the several of the circuits.

There are confined in Salisbury by the Confederate authorities a number of citizens of North Carolina, arrested for alleged political offences. How long they are to remain incarcerated no one can say but those who apprehended them. What their guilt really consists in I do not know, but this much it becomes both you and me to know, in view of the oaths we take upon entering into office, that they were not arrested by lawful process; as citizens of North Carolina, they are entitled under the Constitution to a speedy trial by a jury of their peers, and to be confronted with their accusers. I have laid their cases before his Excellency the President of the Confederate States, and when his reply is received you will be informed thereof. Should there exist any grave State reasons why they are denied a trial, it is due, at least, that we should be informed of them. I have not seen an official copy of the act, but learn from the newspapers that Congress has conferred upon the President the power to suspend the Writ of Habeas corpus in all cases of arrests made by Confederate authority. If this be once admitted, no man is safe from the power of one individual. He could at pleasure seize any citizen of the State with or without excuse, throw him into prison, and permit him to languish there without relief—a power that I am unwilling to see entrusted to any living man. To submit to its exercise would, in my opinion, be establishing a precedent dangerous and pernicious in the extreme. Among a people so united and faithful to their cause as ours, where disloyalty is the rare and solitary exception to the general rule, I can see but little good, but a vast tide of inflowing evil, from these inordinate stretches of military power which are fast disgracing us equally with our Northern enemies. A free Republic that must needs cast off its freedom in every time of trouble will soon cast it off for ever. Freedom cannot be embraced to-day and spurned to-morrow; a steadfast and constant worship can alone secure her countless blessings. Her chosen instruments—the Constitution and the laws—were made the sure covenant of her everlasting residence among us; our delight in time of peace and prosperity, and our guide and shield in the day of trouble and calamity. Now, if ever, is the time when we should abide strictly by their stern decrees, and walk uprightly in the narrow path they have marked out for our footsteps. We should least of all forsake the helm and the compass when the vessel is driven by the tempest, and clouds and darkness obscure the way.

Deeply impressed as I have been with the importance of this subject, I have been anxious at the same time to avoid any unnecessary conflict with the Confederate authorities. I have, therefore, waited patiently for your assembling, confident that you would take proper steps to maintain the laws and preserve the rights of our people.

It becomes my duty, also, to call your attention to the subject of officer of our troops in the field—some conflict of opinion existing in regard thereto.

The right of the State authorities to commission the officers of the regiments originally raised for the war is not doubted. It is conceded by the Act of Congress of April 16th, 1862, known as the Conscription Law. But the Confederate authorities claim the right to commission the regiments of twelve months' men, continued in service by this law, and also all regiments whatsoever raised since it went into operation. And in both cases they have claimed to commission and appoint all regimental staff officers, even when they conceded to the Executive of the State the appointment of the officers of the line. Again, while appointing and commissioning field officers, the Secretary of War has declined to appoint the company officers. To remedy, if possible, this confusion and to avoid conflict, I called in person to see the President, who promised to take the opinion of his Attorney-General on the subject at length. I have not yet had the pleasure of seeing that opinion, and now lay the matter before you, and recommend you to take such steps as will preserve the rights and honour of the State. It may well be doubted if the officer of the whole of our troops does not belong exclusively to State authority, as by strict reference to the Constitution they may be found to be in point of law, militia. It is mortifying to find entire brigades of North Carolina soldiers in the field commanded by strangers, and, in many cases, our own brave and war-worn colonels are made to give place to colonels from distant States, who are promoted to the command of North Carolina troops over their heads to vacant Brigadierships. Some of these promotions are charged to North Carolina, which enables the authorities to say that we have had so many appointments, when in fact we have not, the appointees not being citizens of our State. This is fast breaking down the pride and patience of our officers, many of whom have reported to me their intention to resign, alleging that the road to honourable promotion is almost closed to our citizens. This is not right, and forms a just cause of complaint both in our army and with our people at home. We are willing that our soldiers should follow any general capable of leading them, but we contend that as a matter of sheer justice our soldiers are entitled to receive their fair proportion of the honours won by their gallantry and endurance.

I would also recommend that the existing prohibition against the distillation of spirits from all kinds of grain be continued during the war. There is no grain to spare for such purposes, and all the medical needs of the country and army can be abundantly supplied by the liquors made from the fruit crop. Should even the supply for the army fail, it cannot be doubted that it is much better for the soldier to go without spirits than that his wife and child should be without bread.

I also recommend that a law be passed providing for a rigid punishment of all persons who may be convicted of speculating in any of the necessities of life, under the false pretence of being Government agents.

In order to keep the highways of the country in better condition, they having since the commencement of the war been permitted to get in very bad repair, I recommend that the Revised Code be so amended that the age to be reached to entitle a man to exemption from working on the roads shall be fifty years instead of forty-five, as now.

The term of the Honourable George Davis, Confederate States' Senator from North Carolina, will expire before the next regular session of the General Assembly, and it will be your duty to provide for filling the vacancy.

I take great pleasure in informing you that the educational interests of the country have not been overlooked since the commencement of my Administration. Owing to the great drain upon the Treasury during the first year of the war, the Literary Board deemed it advisable to make only half the usual semi-annual distribution of the common school fund for the fall of 1861, and none at all for the spring of 1862. Feeling that this pressure had passed away, and that the matter was one of great importance to our people, the Board, at its recent meeting, ordered the usual distribution to be made, increased by $10,000 from the sum due for the back distribution, and resolved to add that amount each spring and fall until the whole shall have been appropriated. There has been some disposition manifested to take this fund for war purposes. Should there really exist a serious design on the part of any one to do this, which I hardly think probable, I earnestly hope you will promptly defeat it. This small sum could add but little to the vast amount required to conduct the war, and its abstraction would be an absolute robbery of the poor children of the State. On the contrary, it should be your duty to carefully preserve and if possible increase this fund, make provision for its regular distribution, and do everything in your power to educate the rising youth of the country. While war is desolating our coast, and the tide of revolution is flowing all around us, let the young children of the State be still assembled in their log houses and primitive academies, in the mountains and on the plains, and let their first lesson be to read of our great struggle for civil and religious liberty—of the patriotism and sacrifices of our people, and the glorious bravery of their fathers and brothers upon the blood-stained fields of the South. It is of the very highest importance that the war should not carry away everything useful and civilized in the land and cause our children to grow up in ignorance and crime. The female schools of the State are generally as flourishing as in times of peace.

Both of the Asylums in this city are prospering under the present efficient management—a great charity to our people and a credit to the State.

Of our internal improvement system, I deem it unnecessary to make any mention. Since my introduction to office, I have received no official reports or information as to the condition or wants of any of the public works requiring legislative action. Should any thing of this nature be brought to my attention, I shall lay it before you in a special Message.

In addition to the matters herein brought to your attention, there are several of an important nature about which it is not deemed prudent to speak publicly, but which I will take pleasure in explaining, or discussing verbally with you when desired. Many others I have doubtless overlooked—for which, as well as for the hasty preparation and disconnected form of this instrument, I beg that my recent inauguration into office, and the many heavy drafts upon my time, may be considered an apology.

In conclusion, gentlemen, allow me to urge upon you the vital importance of bringing forth all the powers and resources of the State for the common defence of our country and our cause. The two great dangers we have to meet will be found connected with our currency and supplies for our army. Men enough to protect us and drive back the invader we can always get, if we can properly clothe and feed them. Let us do this and preserve our paper from depreciation, and all will be well. In our intercourse with the authorities of our young Confederacy, having demanded firmly the rights which are due our State, let us yield them no grudging support, but in all things pertaining to the general weal sustain and strengthen them with our whole hearts. And in all our official acts let us remember that it is the spirit of the people which tyrants cannot subdue. On this depends all. So long as they continue harmonious, willing, self-sacrificing, the united armies of this continent may be hurled against us in vain; with such a country and such a people we might set them at defiance. Our heroic soldiers, shivering in their rags and plashing with their naked feet through the snows, have already, even through the chronicles of our foes, excited the wondering admiration of the world, and great generals and brave people beyond the distant waters of the sea stand aghast with astonishment at the feats of freemen struggling for their rights. Let us learn of them, and by zeal and discretion displayed for the general good, show the world that we are worthy to preside over these gallant and patriotic men.

Remember lastly, that you are labouring for the very salvation of our people. The bitter cup that our captured cities and districts have had to drink shows us, alas! too plainly, the mercy we are to expect if our abolition foes should overcome us. In the bitterness of their baffled rage they have even shown a determination to re-enact the horrors of St. Domingo, and to let loose the hellish passions of servile insurrection to revel in the desolation of our homes. The people of the next generation will bless the memory of those who, whether in the field or the council, helped to rescue their country from these horrors. Let us labour to deserve their praise, and may the blessing of God attend our soldiers and our statesmen, who are struggling to defend a noble people and a noble cause.

SOUTHERN PATRIOTISM.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—As the numbers of your paper for the period of the present war will hereafter form a part of the history of our young nationality, I desire to place on record an instance of patriotism, which, in my opinion, deserves to be mentioned with the more brilliant deeds achieved on the field of arms. A young lady, the daughter of a friend of mine, who has resided in Europe since the beginning of this war, had always read, with painful interest, the tales of suffering and self-sacrifice that came in letters from home. To live in ease and comfort while near and dear friends were undergoing the most severe privations seemed to the young enthusiast intolerable. Her father had always been a liberal contributor to every patriotic scheme for alleviating suffering or promoting the great cause of national independence; and had gladly permitted his daughter to become a party in these generous deeds. But this did not satisfy her; she wished to give something that was clearly her own, and to give which would be a real sacrifice and privation. Among her valuables was a costly diamond ring, a parent's gift, and the first article of jewellery she had ever worn. With this, the dearest of her worldly possessions, she resolved to part. Through the agency of a friend the ring was disposed of, and brought £60, and with this sum medicines were purchased and forwarded to the sick soldiers of the Confederacy, according to the wish of the patriotic young lady.

I would not, even were I at liberty to do so, take from the grace of the gift by naming the generous giver. I can only say that she is a native of Alabama, and a true type of the Southern maidens.

Respectfully yours,

A SOUTHERNER.

THE LAST PRESIDENTIAL VOTE.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—In your impression of the 18th ult., there was an error made in the figures given for the Presidential Vote of 1860, in consequence of allowing Messrs. Douglas and Bell too large a portion of the fusion tickets in New York and Pennsylvania. The following is a correct statement:—

Lincoln.....	1,857,610
Breckinridge....	1,195,600 (including South Carolina)
Douglas	1,076,556
Bell	535,504

Total vote in all the States } 4,715,270 estimating 53,100 for South Carolina.
The ballots cast in the Southern States were as follows:—

	Breckinridge.	Douglas.	Bell.	Lincoln.
Alabama.....	43,831	13,651	27,875
Arkansas	28,732	5,227	20,094
Delaware	7,337	1,023	3,874	3,815
Florida	8,543	367	5,437
Georgia	51,889	11,590	42,886
Kentucky	53,143	25,651	66,058	1,364
Louisiana	22,691	7,625	20,204
Maryland	42,482	5,966	41,760	2,294
Mississippi.....	40,797	3,283	25,040
Missouri.....	31,317	18,801	58,372	17,028
North Carolina	48,539	2,701	44,990
South Carolina	53,100
Tennessee	64,709	11,350	69,274
Texas	47,548	15,438
Virginia	74,323	16,290	74,681	1,929
	623,971	163,525	515,973	26,430

The slave representation, equivalent to 350,000 votes, should be credited to Breckinridge 250,000; Douglas 20,000; and Bell 80,000. It will be observed that ten States did not furnish a single vote for Mr. Lincoln, nor had Mr. Douglas any supporters in Texas. South Carolina appoints electors through her Legislature; that State was, however, almost unanimous in favour of Mr. Breckinridge.

Your obedient servant,
G. M.H.

THE HON. J. M. MASON'S RESIDENCE IN VIRGINIA.—The Southern correspondent of the Times gives the following account of Northern vandalism:—

After the recent battles, which resulted in the headlong overthrow of General Pope's forces before Washington at the end of August, Winchester was held by a Federal general named White. Upon hearing of the Federal disasters he hastened to evacuate the town, blowing up a large magazine on its outskirts, by the explosion of which he shook the little town to its foundations, and applying the torch to a large quantity of commissariat stores, the bare, roofless walls of which give evidence to this day of the destroyer's presence. The town itself is as bitterly Secessionist as any spot in the Confederate States. Here once stood the home of Mr. Mason, for many months past the Southern Commissioner in England. The house was an unpretending country residence just on the outside of the town of Winchester, but the grounds were filled with beautiful trees, conspicuous among which was a picturesque row of sycamores, some fine locust trees, and a curious mulberry. It is hardly necessary to say that the house and grounds have not escaped the ruthless visitings of the invaders of Virginia. The house is roofless, the doors and windows torn out, the rats running about over heaps of rubbish, the kitchen and outhouses, which, according to the ordinary Southern fashion, were detached from the dwelling-house, levelled to the ground. It is said that Mr. Seward, visiting the house and grounds after they had undergone the manipulations of his soldiers, brutally exclaimed that he wondered that the rebel senator did not keep his grounds better. If anything can console Mr. Mason for the desecration of his favourite home, he will find it in the obvious affection and respect entertained for him among his neighbours.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOLZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOOKINS, 13, Bouvrie-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

Agency for the Continent: G. FOWLER, 279, Rue St. Honore, Paris.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 1, 1863.

America in 1862.

We do not propose to write a complete summary of those events which have convulsed the New World and fixed the attention of the Old World, but rather to notice a few of the incidents that have led to a state of affairs that few anticipated at the outset of the year that has just passed away. Hereafter when the historian of the second War of Independence deals with 1862 he will find the abundance of material exceedingly embarrassing. There are a multitude of minor occurrences which he cannot dwell on without impeding the course of his narrative, and yet which he cannot neglect without making the general results he chronicles unintelligible. Except that the records of the occurrences were so full, clear, and indisputable, we might reasonably imagine that posterity would refuse to believe that such great revolutions, such a crowd of great events, had taken place in the short space of twelve months. We who have watched the struggle from day to day are startled with the reflection of how much has happened in 1862, and even more by looking at the present condition of the Confederate States and the United States, and remembering their respective conditions at the beginning of the year.

In order to estimate the net result of the warlike operations of 1862, we have to consider their object, and how far that object has been attained. We suppose that the enemies as well as the friends of the South will admit that the Confederate States have been acting on the defensive. Whatever disputes there may be as to the right of secession, or as to the right of the North to attempt to conquer a reconstruction of the late Union, it is undeniable that at any moment during the past year the Confederate States would have sheathed the sword if the United States had chosen to give up the contest for empire.

The South has not wished for an inch of Northern territory, and she has fought only to be let alone. Her success has indeed been marvellous. Her capital is secure. With one exception, none of her great seaport towns, supposed to be so vulnerable on account of the naval superiority of her enemy, have fallen. The vast armies brought against her have been beaten, and have melted away. Such a series of triumphs have crowned her efforts that whilst we admire the heroism of her soldiers, who, suffering from unparalleled privations, have shown a discipline and bravery unsurpassed in the annals of warfare, and whilst we are fully impressed with the genius of Southern commanders and the wisdom of the Executive, we cannot explain the overflowing measure of Confederate victory, without assenting to the proposition of General "Stonewall" Jackson, and saying the South has thus triumphed because "it is the will of Providence." Who, a year ago, dreamt that the South would be able to gain any naval reputation, seeing that she was then without a navy? Yet the only purely naval triumphs of the war belong to the South. The Sumter and the Nashville played havoc with Northern ships and escaped capture. The Virginia gained a naval victory in the Hampton Roads that induced the maritime Powers of Europe to set about the reconstruction of their navies. The Arkansas, single-handed, defeated and disgraced a numerous and well equipped Federal fleet. At present the little Alabama is the terror of the North, and as yet has gallantly defied the naval power of her adversary. It was to be expected that the blockade would prove partially ineffectual, but such achievements as these could not have been anticipated by the most sanguine Southerner.

The Confederate States are unconquered, and the object of the war, so far as they are concerned, has been accomplished. We know, and we have not the least desire to conceal, what great sacrifices these triumphs have entailed. The best and noblest blood of the country has been poured out like water. Property has been given up and destroyed with an alacrity that is without precedent. Homes have been desolated and prosperity has been changed into suffering and poverty. But the South has a present reward for her afflictions, as well as a future prospect which is in itself sufficient to infuse a spirit of cheerfulness in the hour of trial. The South has become, by reason of the blockade, truly self-dependent. She has discovered that in herself she has the means of defence and existence. Cotton may be King in Lancashire, but the South does not depend on cotton. A year ago there was a general impression that Europe would intervene, and, recognizing the Confederate States, put an end to the war, by convincing the people of the United States of the hopelessness of the struggle. Some persons in the South believed that England would, in her own interest and in the interest of humanity and justice, even intervene by force of arms, if recognition should not at once bring about a cessation of hostilities. All such expectations have been signally disappointed, and the Southerners have learnt not to trust to the favour of princes or peoples, but to their own right arm and the blessing of Heaven. We know, too, the reluctance with which the conservative and anti-revolutionary South withdrew from the Union; and perhaps even last January there were Confederates who, though fully determined to die rather than return to the Union, still felt a regret at the parting. Such a feeling is no longer possible. The Southerner now has too much cause to be proud of his nationality. To be a citizen of the Confederate States, who have so gloriously fought the battle of liberty, is a privilege and an honour that must satisfy the most exacting patriotism. And during the struggle with a foreign enemy, the Constitution of the Confederate States has not been in any degree violated; but, on the contrary, the fullest liberty of speech and publication has been enjoyed. Liberty in the South during the present year has been subjected to a fiery ordeal, and it comes forth unscathed.

Let us now glance at the other side. The object of the North is the conquest of the South, for even Mr. Seward no longer pretends that there is any "Union sentiment" in the Confederate States. What in 1862 have the Federals done towards the accomplishment of their design?

The Federal operations may be considered under three divisions—the attempts to capture Richmond, the movements in the West, and the gunboat expeditions. Prudent men placed most reliance on the last; and events have justified their judgment. It is quite true that in the only really naval engagements that have taken place, the Federal navy has been disgraced, and that Vicksburg has resisted a powerful fleet of gunboats, much to the disgust and chagrin of the North. It is true that Mobile, Charleston, and Savannah, so often threatened with destruction, have not shared the sad fate of New Orleans; and that a few of the only notable achievements of the Federal navy have been to bully the unarmed crews of merchantmen, and to grossly insult the British flag. But it must be conceded that the gunboats have been of great use to the Federals. After Shiloh, and after the Seven Days' Battle, they saved the remnants of the Northern armies from capture or destruction; and besides this service they have, in conjunction with land forces, obtained for the North the only successes it has gained. Indeed, the gunboat successes at the beginning of 1862 were so numerous that timid friends of the South in Europe began to despair. Early in February General Grant, with a combined force, took Fort Henry, and directly afterwards the important position of Fort Donnellson, together with 5000 prisoners. These captures involved the fall of Nashville, and, as a military necessity, the evacuation of Columbus. Meantime a combined expedition, under General Burnside, had taken Roanoke, with its garrison of about 2500; and, a few weeks later, Washington and Newbern—at the former place, a small town of 1500 inhabitants, there was no defence, but at Newbern a gallant resistance was made to the combined attack of gunboats and land forces by about 4000 Confederates. General Pope, with a large flotilla, captured the small fortification of Island No. 10. On the 1st of May Commodore Farragut captured New Orleans, and this was effected not by fighting, but by an accident that destroyed the river defences of the city. This capture has been worse than barren to the Federals. It has proved to the world that the fall of Southern cities and towns will not eventuate in the conquest of the South; and the conduct of General Butler has disgraced the Government of the United States, which has sanctioned it. We expect there are few men in the North who will not admit that New Orleans has been a source of weakness, and not of strength, to the Federals.

Warned by these casualties, the Confederates contracted their line of defence and concentrated their forces. General Sidney Johnson turned the tide of success by the battle of Shiloh, in which the Federals sustained a crushing defeat, and were only saved from surrender by the arrival of gunboats. From that disaster the Federal army of the West never recovered. What has it done since then? What has become of the large Federal army that invested Corinth? Since the evacuation of that city we have not heard much of it, and its fate would be a mystery, but for the revelations in the Federal Congress. It literally disappeared. It was enfeebled by disease before the Confederates left Corinth. General Beauregard conquered his enemy by enforced inactivity. We heard of Pope's captures and Halleck's advance, but we have long since learnt that the one was an audacious falsehood, and the other a mere pretence. The Federals still hold Nashville, but they are not strong enough to baffle the vigilance of General Morgan, and to prevent the Confederates drawing all the supplies they need from Kentucky, and from freely helping themselves to the war stores of the Northern depôts. The Federal hold on the Border States has relaxed, and in Tennessee the power of the invader has been crippled. The Federals were defeated in the fall at Perryville, and in the last month a whole brigade had to surrender to General Morgan at Hartsville.

But the most important operations of the war have taken place in Virginia. The North, for reasons we are unable to suggest, thought that the capture of Richmond would be the end of "the rebellion," and consequently the resources of the North were lavished on the Army of the Potomac, that was to do the work. We need not recapitulate the Federal disasters in Virginia in 1862. Before McClellan was ready for attack his enemy was fully prepared for defence. Having exhausted the patience of the Northerners by waiting before Manassas, McClellan changed the base of his operations. At that crisis General "Stonewall" Jackson achieved the successes which have rendered his name famous. He defeated General Banks, out-generalled Fremont and Shields, and so alarmed the Washington Government that General McDowell was peremptorily ordered to look to the defence of the Federal capital, instead of going to the assistance of McClellan. After the evacuation of Yorktown there was universal jubilation in New York and Washington. Richmond was as good as captured. The "Young Napoleon" was lauded even by the Republican organs, and in excess of patriotic fervour his wife was serenaded for the prospective taking of Richmond. Battle after battle was fought, and in every engagement the Federals were defeated. At length came the Seven Days' Battle, and the Army of the Potomac was utterly beaten, and after resting a few weeks on the banks of the James River, where it was further prostrated by disease, the remnant of it withdrew from the peninsula. Pope then took the lead in Virginia, but so far from redeeming the Federal fortunes, he was disgracefully beaten on the old battle-field of Bull Run. The brief Maryland campaign resulted in a severe reverse to the Northern army, and the capture of Harper's Ferry with an immense quantity of stores; and McClellan, who was perfectly conscious of the exigencies of his troops and of the Federal position, enraged the Abolition fanatics by slow and cautious movements, of which the brilliant exploits of Generals Jackson and Stuart showed the necessity. Once more he was displaced, and Burnside took the command. Again the tone in New York was less despondent and the Republicans boasted of Richmond being taken before Christmas. But ere the year closed it was destined that the Federal arms should meet with a disaster too palpable to be concealed, and one that almost defies modification in its recital. On the 13th of December was fought the battle of Fredericksburg, and the Federal troops were so beaten that retreat, we might almost say flight, became necessary. We read in the telegram that the waters of the Rappahannock were rising rapidly, and that General Burnside and the people of the North were rejoicing that the rise of the river would afford some protection for their shattered army. That observation about the rise of the Rappahannock proclaims as plainly as words can do the total failure of the Federal arms in Virginia. The invading force is driven back—is crouching within an easy distance of the fortifications of Washington, and is thankful that between it and its enemy there is the obstacle of a swollen river. In short, the invader is glad that it is not easy for the forces of the invaded country to attack him. So far from having done anything towards conquering the South, the North is weakened and prostrated by repeated disasters. Last January the Federal armies were lavishly supplied with the matériel of war, whilst the Confederates were in want of artillery, small arms, and ammunition. At present, so far as these things are concerned, the South is amply supplied, and the North has not sufficient to equip its new levies.

The political failure of the North is not less remarkable. During the past year the people of the United States have submitted to a despotism such as no people in Europe ever patiently endured. The world has seen with astonishment how readily a nation boasting of its freedom has become the tool of a fanatical and imbecile faction. Not less surprising is the way in which the North has sanctioned the brutality of Butler, condoned the offences of Turchin and McNeil, and permitted the Government to proclaim the savage expedient of a servile war in the South.

Amongst the wonders of the year the revival of the Democratic party is worthy of notice; but whether that political revolution will bring about a peace in 1863 is a problem that time alone can solve. As yet and for many months to come Mr. Lincoln, the tool of the Abolition fanatics, who are not yet gorged with slaughter, and who from pulpit and platform clamour for the extermination of the people of the South, will be master of the situation. Disregarding the fearful load of debt already incurred, and caring still less for the host of men that have been killed and maimed in this unholy war; disregarding the afflictions with which it has pleased Providence to visit the once prosperous United States, Mr. Lincoln and his advisers—defying justice, policy, and the most sacred obligations—declare they will not let the Southern people go. If the war continues during 1863, the bloodshed it involves will be the guilt of the North. If the Federals will give up their lust for empire, if they will cease to covet the riches of the South, peace may be immediately brought about. Whether or not Europe in times past could have put an end to the strife we will not discuss; but we must avow that we cannot conceive how our Government, after duly considering the events of 1862, can say that the independence of the Confederate States is not firmly established; and this being so, we cannot altogether plead guiltless to the charge of encouraging the North to carry on the war if we refuse to recognize the fact of Southern independence, since recognition will do more towards convincing the people of the United States of the hopelessness of the struggle than the ruin of their finances and the defeat of their armies.

The Political History of the Year.

At the commencement, as at the close of 1862, the one topic of absorbing interest was the news from America. Then it was the surrender of the gentlemen kidnapped by Captain Wilkes on board the Trent which occupied all minds and filled the columns of all the newspapers; now, the tidings of a defeat which is said to be the heaviest yet sustained by Captain Wilkes' countrymen are received with a general feeling of satisfaction, which is due in no small measure to the impression made on the public mind in England by the conduct of the Federal Government and the Northern people when they were informed of the insult offered under their auspices to the British flag. The effect of the surrender might have been favourable to the Northern cause, if it had not been so obviously the result of fear; a simple yielding to necessity, in the most ungracious and offensive manner. The people had received Captain Wilkes in triumph; his victory over the unarmed Trent was hailed with applause as loud as that which greeted General Butler's loathsome insults to the defenceless women of New Orleans; the Secretary of the Navy had commended him; the House of Representatives had thanked him; and only when forced to choose between submission and war did Mr. Seward, who had so loudly threatened war on former occasions, find irresistible reasons for acceding to the demand of England. Even then he could not refrain from insolence and defiance. The whole affair did great good to the Southern cause. It also did good, incidentally, to the Liberal Ministry, and enabled it to meet Parliament more boldly than it could otherwise have done.

It had been expected, towards the close of 1861, that the Session of 1862 would certainly witness the overthrow of the Administration. The Conservatives had been steadily gaining ground since 1859; the Radicals were discontented; and reports were rife of concerted plans for attacks on the Government which could hardly fail of success. One sudden calamity plunged the nation into mourning, and incidentally respite the Ministry. The death of the Prince Consort made it obvious to all parties that it would be impossible to intrude upon the widowed Queen the cares and anxieties inseparable from a Ministerial crisis; and the thoughts of a parliamentary pitched battle were by common consent laid aside.

Mr. Lowe, the Vice-President of the Committee of Council and virtual Minister of Education, did his best to break the enforced truce by a desperate onslaught on the established system of national primary instruction. Parliament, as our readers know, votes certain sums annually for the furtherance of education, which the Committee of Council distributed according to a code drawn up several years ago by the founders of the present system. Under that code, grants were made to schools established by private individuals for certain specified purposes—to augment the salary of the schoolmaster, if in possession of a Government certificate, according to the class in which his qualifications had placed him at the Government examination—to pay apprentice or pupil teachers on a fixed scale, and to provide for a few objects of minor importance. These grants were limited by the amount of voluntary contribution for the support of the school; and were liable to be diminished or withdrawn altogether if the condition of the buildings, the conduct of the school, or the progress of the children, were not deemed satisfactory by the official inspector. By what was called the Revised Code, Mr. Lowe proposed to do away with the whole of this system, and to substitute a uniform capitation grant for all children who, after completing a certain number of attendances, should satisfy the inspector, on a personal examination, of their competence in reading, writing, and arithmetic, according to a standard varying with the age of the pupil. From all parts of the country, from every one acquainted with the working of a primary school, came indignant protests against the proposed alteration. It was shown that it would destroy discipline, deteriorate the quality of instruction given to the poor, undo the chief work of the last twenty years—the creation of a class of competent teachers—impose a cruel burden of expense and anxiety on the patrons or managers of schools, and especially on the parochial clergy, and generally operate unfavourably to the spread of knowledge among the people, unfairly in the apportionment of grants between different schools, and oppressively as affecting the vested interests of the existing class of teachers and pupil teachers. Mr. Lowe was obstinate, and contrived to make the worst of a bad case. He insulted the clergy; he sneered at the school managers; he abused the certificated teachers, and alienated everybody except the extreme political Dissenters, whose support did him no good and not a little harm. At last, after Mr. Walpole had taken up the cause of education, and when defeat was impending, the higher Powers interfered. After vowing that he would concede nothing, Mr. Lowe came down to the House on the decisive night, and conceded nearly everything. The warm friends of the old system were dissatisfied with his concessions, and felt that there could be no security for the educational system of the country so long as he remained in office. But the majority of the Opposition, seeing that the Minister was obliged in point of fact to surrender at discretion, generously granted him a capitulation, and left him in possession of his office and the fragments of his scheme.

Though there was no great battle, there were several party skirmishes, in which the leader of the Opposition was generally left to contend, almost unaided, against the ablest of his adversaries. Few more telling speeches have ever been delivered than the first, in which Mr. Disraeli reviewed the financial history of the last three years, and wound up by a brilliant diatribe against Mr. Gladstone, as the professor of a code of political ethics too high for the practice of ordinary men, and an offender of the worst kind against the accepted principles of political conduct, and the plainest dictates of public duty. It was, as the orator himself said many years ago of another famous speech, "the vengeance of a lifetime concentrated into an hour," and it was appreciated as such by the House, and felt as such by the statesman assailed. Taken by surprise, and evidently goaded to an unusual degree of irritation, Mr. Gladstone defended himself feebly, though his retorts upon his antagonist were only less pungent and severe than the invective which had called them forth. But for the fact that Mr. Gladstone speaks with the weight that attaches to high personal character, and acknowledged statesmanship, the result of the encounter would have been pronounced to be decidedly in Mr. Disraeli's favour. Some people objected, indeed, to so strong a leaven of personal malice as was displayed in his attack, but unfairly; for Mr. Gladstone has given the Conservative leader good right to regard him as a personal enemy, and good cause to treat him with all the severity of which the bitterest of living orators is capable. In a subsequent collision with Lord Palmerston, Mr. Disraeli was less fortunate. And Mr. Stansfield's motion gave the Chancellor of the Exchequer as complete a revenge as the most vindictive spirit could desire. The Radicals had mustered their forces to press a demand for retrenchment, the Conservatives, refusing to accept their motion, had prepared an amendment of their own, on which they were not unlikely to obtain a majority, and entrusted it to Mr. Walpole. The Premier anticipated this attack by rising and declaring at once that if defeated the Government would either resign or dissolve. Mr. Walpole took fright, gave way, and left his leader and his party in the lurch. Mr. Disraeli made the best of a very painful and ridiculous position, but it was evident that he was bitterly hurt, and that the Ministry had gained a great moral advantage. The scene has been described, not inaptly, as the "Conservative Bull Run." But fortune had consolation in store for the defeated party. The civil conflict which had arisen in the Liberal camp had completed the disorganization of the Ministerialists; and Mr. Cobden openly declared his hostility to Lord Palmerston, winding up the session with a speech in which he described the Liberal party as likely "to rot out of existence under a load of infamy." The defeat of Sir John Trelawney's Church-rates Abolition Bill by a majority of 17, and the passage of a bill for the better prevention of poaching (a crime especially patronized by the Radicals), also served to indicate the growing strength of the Opposition; and Parliament was prorogued amid a general feeling that the Ministry would have hard work to survive the next session.

Before its prorogation one practical measure had been passed. Mr. Villiers, the President of the Poor Law Board, introduced a bill to allow parishes or unions in Lancashire and in one or two other counties, when the expenditure on the relief of the poor should reach 5s. in the pound, to obtain a rate in aid from the other parishes of the union, or from the county. Great fault was found with this measure; and, as finally passed, it included a power to borrow on the security of the rates whenever the expenditure on the relief of the poor should exceed the ratio of 3s. in the pound per annum. It need hardly be observed that in times of severe distress an expenditure of 3s. in the pound involves a levy of a very much greater amount. But it was made quite evident in the course of the debate that the Government did not at all appreciate the actual condition of Lancashire. The distress had been gaining ground for twelve months, and yet Mr. Villiers did not believe that his Bill was likely even to be brought into operation before next March. And Lord Palmerston made himself obnoxious to severe rebukes from Mr. Cobden by uttering some hasty and very unfounded strictures on the conduct of the Lancashire manufacturers. No one who has read THE INDEX can be ignorant of the extent of the suffering which Lancashire has endured, or of the heroism with which that suffering has been borne. Since September 1861 the mills have been gradually closing; the operatives have sunk from prosperity to want, from want to pauperism, struggling desperately to maintain their independence, sacrificing their savings, their furniture, their clothing, every comfort that the industry and thrift of years had accumulated around them, and finally, often reaching the verge of actual starvation—literally in their own phrase "Welly clemming to death"—before they consented to ask relief from the parish, or even from the Relief Committees which in every town have been organized to assist them. These Committees, directed and advised by the Central Executive at Manchester, have done wonders; but the task before them was herculean. Nearly half a million of mouths formerly well-fed by honest industry are now to be fed by charity, besides those who are provided for by the liberality of their employers. Under the auspices of Lord Derby, whose services to Lancashire have been worthy of his position as the chief of her aristocracy, this gigantic feat has actually been accomplished. All classes, all parts of the empire have done their duty; Lancashire, and the Lancashire manufacturers, have done theirs especially well. Nearly a million sterling has been collected, half of which has been contributed by Lancashire, while her property is deteriorating in value every day, and her manufactures produce no income whatever. And beside this, there are firms which are giving privately from £50 to £500 a week, to maintain the people whom they can no longer employ. The Committees are distributing, we believe, about £30,000 a week; the parish authorities about £17,000 or £18,000. And as yet scarcely a ray of hope breaks through the darkness of this terrible calamity.

The paramount object of the foreign policy of Lord Russell during the year has been to keep peace with the Government of the United States. He has quietly endured the impertinences of Mr. Seward, and the flagrant insults of Captain Wilkes. He has allowed British ports to be blockaded by Federal cruisers, and British vessels, pursuing a lawful voyage between Liverpool and the colonies, to be stopped, fired into, and on some occasions actually seized and confiscated. When the mercantile interest has remonstrated, he has coolly recommended them to abstain from a trade which excites the displeasure of Mr. Lincoln. The Government has resisted all efforts made to induce it to recognize the independence of the Confederate States. Towards the latter end of the session Mr. Lindsay made a motion tending to recognition; and Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald and Mr. Whiteside gave to it the support of their arguments, and of their authority as representatives of the Conservative party; but Mr. Lindsay did not deem it expedient to press his motion to a division. During the recess Mr. Gladstone publicly spoke of the Confederate Government as having "made an army, a navy, and what is more, a nation"; and for some time afterwards his private Secretary was constantly employed in explaining away his language. Mr. Adams obtained assurances from Lord Russell that the rest of the Cabinet regretted the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and Sir G. C. Lewis took the first opportunity of making amends by a strong speech against the recognition of the Confederacy, in which he was understood to say that we were bound to wait until the United States were utterly exhausted, or desisted from the war, or themselves recognized the independence of the seceded States—a doctrine which was indignantly scouted by a considerable section of the press, and afterwards explained in a more admissible sense by some of the organs of the Government. Another opportunity of proving still more signally his attachment to the Federal cause was soon given to the Foreign Minister of England. The Emperor of the French proposed that England, France, and Russia should jointly recommend to the belligerents a suspension of hostilities preparatory to negotiations for peace. Lord Russell refused, on the ground that an unfavourable reply was likely to be returned by the Government at Washington; but his refusal has gained him little credit in America. Altogether the feeling which prevails towards us in the North is no less hostile than at this time last year, after we have made one constant sacrifice of our interests and our dignity to the vain dream of conciliation.

For some inscrutable reason, Lord Russell has suddenly taken up the cause of Prussian aggression and Holstein treason against the Danish Crown, and done his best to further the designs of certain German Powers, who bear no good-will to England or to freedom, to subvert the throne of the family from which our future King has chosen his bride, and break up one of the happiest and best governed of minor kingdoms. This reversal of the traditional policy of England has excited great indignation both at home and abroad; but hitherto has been fortunately without any other effect.

The last great event of the year has been the Greek Revolution. King Otho was dismissed without a struggle; and Prince Alfred of England fixed on by the Greeks as their future Sovereign. After a tedious and somewhat treacherous silence, Lord Russell pronounces that the protecting Powers consider themselves bound by the Protocol of 1830, excluding members of their royal houses from the throne of Greece, and that Prince Alfred is therefore unable to accept the proffered honour. He offers to make amends by ceding the Ionian Islands to the new Sovereign; but to this some of the Powers interested object, and it remains to be seen whether Parliament will permit a first step to be thus taken towards the dismemberment of the British Empire.

Europe in 1862.

It is with years as with men. Your annus mirabilis and your illustrious captain usually owe a large part of their reputation to the insignificance of the circle in which they are placed. Triton counts for a vast deal more amongst the minnows than in the company of the demi-gods. If we could translate some of the men who at the present day play a distinguished part in politics and literature to the groups of statesmen and writers which have flourished in past generations, they would look small indeed; and if a year marked by events on the Continent of Europe like those which have illustrated 1862 had presented itself in those dull but happy years of peace which ran their round from Waterloo to 1848, it would have been buried with a very high sounding epitaph. But Europe is now traversing a cycle in which revolution is an annual, and war has lost all its strangeness; and 1862, although it has kept up to the level of interest, perhaps, of its predecessors, and will assuredly be a landmark in the history of at least three nations, cannot be accounted anything extraordinary. We speak only of the European Continent. The mighty struggle of which America has been the scene gives the year, perhaps, an interest which attaches to none other in modern history.

The New Year's Speech of the Emperor of the French presaged a peace which, although often threatened, has never been broken. But the year has not seen the settlement of any of the questions the agitation of which furnishes food for continual apprehension, and the relations of the great Governments of Europe have become more distant, rather than more friendly. When the year commenced the friendly support given by France to the demands made by England for satisfaction in the Trent affair had given a renewed cordiality to the alliance between the two countries. England and France were, moreover, engaged with Spain in a joint expedition for the redress of grievances sustained at the hands of the Mexican Government. The divergence of views upon the question of intervention in the American contest, the withdrawal of England from the Mexican expedition on the ground that the French commanders were pursuing other objects than those specified in the convention of London, and the speeches and despatches of the English Ministers on the subject of the Roman occupation, have generated a coolness between the two Governments, the consequences of which may, ere long, prove disastrous to both nations. The withdrawal from Mexico of the Spanish forces at the same time with the English has also occasioned no little disagreement between France and Spain, and the latest discussions in the Spanish Cortes have disclosed the existence of considerable irritation in both Courts. Russia has shown, upon several occasions, her desire to be upon very cordial terms with France; and although the story of an alliance for the partition of Europe is only a very stale canard, periodically set afloat, there can be no doubt that a very good understanding exists between the two Powers—the only good understanding which Europe has to show. Austria and Prussia lead their usual eat-and-dog life, and both are threatening Denmark with war. Italy has got over the first transports of her gratitude to France, and her statesmen bid for power by assuming an independent attitude.

The French Legislative Assembly met in January to exercise the new powers of financial control with which the Emperor, upon the suggestion of M. Fould, had endowed it. Its influence in this direction has yet been but small, but M. Fould has himself taken care that a stop should be put to the system of balancing each year's account with an enormous deficit. By the conversion of the 4½ per cent. Rentes, he obtained a sufficient sum to defray the deficit of 1861, and he is enabled to close his accounts for 1862 with but a small balance against him, in spite of the heavy charges occasioned by the Mexican expedition. Beyond the debates in both Houses on the Address—debates in which the cause of the Pope was eloquently attacked and defended—the principal event of the session was the sagacious withdrawal by the Emperor—in deference to the opposition of the Legislative Chamber of the project of law for conferring a pension on General Montauban. The failure of General Lorencez, who, upon the retirement of the English and French contingents, marched on Mexico to carry out, single-handed, the French interpretation of the convention, gave to the war in Mexico far larger proportions than the Emperor had anticipated. The honour and prestige of France at once became engaged in the struggle, and although the nation may not have had much sympathy with some of the objects which rumour assigned to the expedition, no one could say a word against the despatch of those reinforcements, thanks to which, General Forey is now marching upon Mexico with an army which the Mexican Government is quite unable to resist. The policy of the Emperor towards Italy is a subject which, during the year, has much occupied the attention as well of his own people as of foreign nations. It has been, as his own letters, and the despatches of his Ministers, published by the Moniteur, show, consistently directed to the reconciliation of the Church and Italy. The zeal with which he has urged upon the Papal Government administrative reforms, and the dissatisfaction which the rejection of his propositions has occasioned amongst his Ministers, gave probably some encouragement to the Italian delusion that he was prepared to abandon the Pope; but the attempt of Garibaldi, and the circular of General Durando—claiming Rome as the reward of the repression of that attempt—have dispelled it for ever. M. Thouvenel, who had suffered himself to lend an encouragement to the claims of the Italians which his Imperial master had never authorized, was dismissed, and M. Drouyn de Lhuys, a statesman of great experience and high character, developed in October, in his famous despatch to the French Minister at Turin, the policy which France intended to pursue—a policy which, based upon a regard, in the first place, for the interests of France, and the wishes of the bulk of her people, shuts out against the Italians all hope of obtaining Rome, except by some arrangement with the Holy See; and the Holy See, its Minister announces, can make no arrangement with its “despoilers.” In the last days of the year the controversy with Switzerland as to the ownership of the Valley of the Dappes, which, since the Peace of Vienna, has been continually rising up to interfere with the good understanding between the two nations, was amicably settled.

In the beginning of March, Baron Ricasoli resigned the Premiership, which, on the death of Cavour, had been assigned him by acclamation. His fall has been publicly ascribed to the personal dislike of the King, with whose menus plaisirs he is said to have interfered; but the King would have kept his Minister, however unwillingly, if the Baron had possessed a strong Parliamentary following. This support, however, he did not enjoy, although he was pretty secure against a directly hostile vote. The Italians thought of nothing but Rome; they had been encouraged to expect its immediate attainment by their leaders. Ricasoli talked very much of Rome, but he did not get it, and his countrymen began to turn to Signor Ratazzi, who was known to enjoy the good-will of the Emperor of the French. Ratazzi became Minister, and trying to lean at the same time upon the party of action, and his assumed French influence, only succeeded in provoking the disastrous Sicilian crusade of Garibaldi. The nation approved the repression of that attempt, but it could not pardon the man who effected it. Ratazzi resigned, his only real achievement having been the recognition of Italy by Russia and Prussia, and has been succeeded by a Ministry whose programme is the suspension of agitation for Rome; the restoration of internal order, and the reorganization of the country. The friends of Italy can only hope that Signor Farini will honestly try to carry out this programme, and be supported by the people. The condition of Italy is extremely serious. Its budgets are more than Austrian in their deficits; and with 90,000 soldiers in Naples, the richest provinces of the kingdom are entirely in the hands of men who are called brigands by the partisans of Victor Emmanuel, and patriot soldiers by those of Francis II. A convocation of the Bishops at Rome, for the professed purpose of assisting in the canonization of some Japanese converts made martyrs 200 years ago, furnished the occasion for a consecration before the world, by the Church, of the doctrine of the non possumus.

The King of Prussia opened in January the session of a new Parliament, in a speech the references of which to the rights of the Crown were ominous of the crisis which now exists. The Chamber of Deputies, in which an overwhelming Liberal majority sat, was not dismayed by the Royal menace. A resolution asking a full specification of the items in the Budget led to a Ministerial crisis, which resulted in the retirement of the Liberal members of the Ministry, and the elevation to the Premiership of Herr Von der Heydt, who supplied the places of his retiring colleagues with members of the Junker or absolutist party. The House was dissolved, but the election, in spite of all the efforts of the Ministry to cajole by promises of reduction of taxation, and failing that, to intimidate the electors, returned a House in which the Ministers had not a dozen adherents. The Ministers at once laid the Budget before the House, and the Committee appointed to examine it recommended the rejection of all the items appertaining to the reorganization of the army. The Minister would offer no compromise, and the House adopted the resolution of the Committee by an immense majority. Herr Von der Heydt then recommended concession to the King, but his Majesty would have none, and called to his councils Herr Von Bismarck Schönhausem, at that time his Ambassador at Paris. The new Minister, relying upon the rejection of the amended Budget by the Upper House, governs without one. The Chambers meet in January; meanwhile every day adds to the estrangement between the King and his people. Austria, on the other hand, has happily developed her constitutional life. The institutions with which the Emperor has endowed his people have had the success which his good faith merited. The Council of the Empire, yet incomplete in number, has established its constitutional position and proved its parliamentary aptitude. When the Emperor a few days since closed the session, he was able to congratulate it upon having effected important retrenchments, and passed valuable laws guaranteeing individual liberty. The successful working of the new institution will not fail to have a beneficial influence in Hungary. The Hungarians are beginning to see that the Emperor offers them every franchise consistent with their continuance in the empire. The never-ending, never-flagging rivalry of Austria and Prussia has had ample scope in Germany in the past year. The commercial treaty which Prussia, in the name of the Zollverein, concluded with France, has been cordially accepted by the whole north of Germany. It is viewed, however, with great alarm by Austria, who sees in it the ruin of her industry, and she has offered, on condition of its revision, to enter the Zollverein on terms which a short time since she would have repudiated with scorn. Prussia, however, has no desire that Austria should enter the Zollverein, and insists upon the treaty, which, however, cannot come into operation for some years, that is to say, until the expiration of the term for which the Zollverein is constituted, unless Bavaria and Wurtemberg, which have refused to ratify it, should change their determination. Germany has been agitated by Governmental projects for the reform of the Confederation, to none of which Prussia accedes. She conceives them all directed against that hegemony which she requires, and which a large part of Northern Germany is anxious she should possess, and she has declared that in the event of the acceptance of one of these propositions for reform, of a very mild character, now under consideration, she will consider the Confederation at an end. The Prussian Government has tried to make up for its unpopular proceedings at home by a “vigorous foreign policy.” It has forced, in the name of the Bund, the Elector of Hesse Cassel, to restore the Constitution of which, in the name of the Bund, he in 1852 robbed his people, and it has taken up strongly the Sleswig-Holstein question.

The Emperor of Russia continues his reforms, but too slowly for some of his subjects. The students of the different Universities have attempted to play a political part. Tremendous fires, causing immense losses in St. Petersburg and Moscow, have been lit with a constitutional purpose, and the nobles of several provinces have asked constitutional privileges. In Greece a King has been expelled for crimes most of which were not his own, and the choice of his successor is the question which agitates Greece and busies the diplomatists and quidnuncs of Europe. The authority of the Sultan has been vindicated by the complete subjection of the Montenegrins, and shaken again by the concessions which, in the negotiations consequent upon the ill-judged bombardment of Belgrade by the Pasha in command of the fortress, he was compelled to make. The insurrection in Greece prepares fresh dangers for him, and his Ministers are with reason alarmed at the proposed gift to that country of the Ionian Islands.

The shadow of the great American calamity has fallen upon the whole of Europe. In France, in Prussia, in Austria, and in Belgium, work has been scarce, and the people are suffering. For him who can read the signs of the times the New Year must open on the Continent of Europe with mournful forebodings; 1862 leaves it a damnum hereditas of many pretexts for war, and much desire on the part of crowned heads and Ministers to use them, and try to escape from embarrassments at home by carrying fire and slaughter abroad.

The Battle of Fredericksburg.

The defeat of Burnside has produced a deeper impression in Europe than any other event of the American War, if we except the first battle of Manassas, which revealed to the world the strength and heroism of the South, and the unfounded nature of Northern boasting. But the present surprise is not brought about by any miscalculation of the ultimate issue of the contest in Virginia. No one supposed that Burnside would capture Richmond, or that his march towards the Confederate capital would be signalized by victories. It is not the defeat of Burnside, but the time, place, and manner of it, that has made the news so startling. We doubt not if the true version of the affair had been given, the Northern disaster would appear still more extraordinary to those who do not make sufficient allowance for the political exigencies of Federal commanders; and who forget that Burnside is the servant of the tool of the New England fanatics, who care not for national disgrace and the slaughter of their fellow-citizens, so long as they themselves are screened from danger—of the men who breathe out slaughter and extermination, but who, like skulking cowards, refuse to share the danger of the strife they provoke. It is said that Burnside has fallen into a trap, but the statement is untrue. Burnside knew that the Confederates were fortifying themselves on the south side of Fredericksburg while he was waiting for artillery and pontoons, and he could not have been ignorant of the danger of attacking an enemy so prepared. Urged on by the clamour of his supporters, he resolved to give battle at all hazards, not, however, without the hope of having deceived the Confederates by his rumoured removal to the peninsula, which rumour was further confirmed by the ostentatious appearance of a crowd of transports on the river; and forgetting that even if the Southern commanders were deceived by this device, they would not move until he had evacuated Aquia Creek; for after the departure of the Federals the Southerners, by means of their railroads, could transport troops to the peninsula, so as to be ready to receive the Northern army. There is no doubt the Federals greatly outnumbered the Confederates, and possibly the estimate that Burnside had at least 100,000 troops, and

General Lee not more than 40,000, is tolerably accurate; but the superiority of numbers could make little impression upon strong and well-manned fortifications, and only added to the loss of the Federals.

When General Burnside was at Aquia Creek he had three courses open to him. He could have gone into winterquarters, which, in a military point of view, would have been a prudent proceeding; but McClellan had been dismissed for comparative inactivity, and his successor was pledged to go on to Richmond; and Mr. Lincoln could not have retained a general in power who refused to risk the loss of the army in obedience to the demands of the Republican faction. The second course open to the Federal commander was to remove his army to the peninsula; and this, probably, was at one time intended; but there was the fatal objection that if the peninsula was made the base of operations, Washington would be without adequate protection, Maryland would probably throw off the Federal yoke, and Pennsylvania would be opened to the invasion of the Confederates. Under these circumstances, and as a last resource, General Burnside, in obedience to the orders of the Federal Government, determined to proceed by way of Fredericksburg.

Why the Federal army was kept for twenty days in a state of inactivity it is difficult to conjecture. If when General Burnside on the 21st of November threatened to shell Fredericksburg the advance by that route had been decided on, it seems incredible that so much time should have been allowed to the Confederates for preparing to dispute the Federal advance, unless we conclude that the delay was inevitable, or that Burnside imagined he could deceive the Southern generals by the poor device of a rumoured intention of going to the peninsula. We are inclined to think that the delay is ascribable to several causes. At first there were divided counsels, Burnside being reluctant to undertake the movement prescribed by Mr. Lincoln and his advisers. When the movement was decided upon, the Federal commander had to wait for artillery and pontoons, and when these things were forthcoming we think it highly probable that Burnside indulged the vain hope that he was about to outgeneral and surprise his enemy. He evidently wanted General Lee to believe that the idea of an advance by Fredericksburg was abandoned, for he gave formal notice that he would not attack that place unless first attacked from it. He made demonstrations at various points, and a large fleet of transports was paraded on the Potomac, which was currently reported to be destined for the conveyance of the Federal army to the peninsula. The stratagem could not succeed, even if General Lee had believed in the pretended change of base, for the Confederates, after seeing the Federal army embarked, could, by means of their railroad communication, have reached the peninsula long before Burnside could have disembarked his forces. We are, however, under the impression that Burnside, when at length he ordered the advance, thought he had effectually divided the Southern army, and was about to take his enemy at a disadvantage. This opinion was confirmed by the passage of the Rappahannock, which, though at the commencement hotly disputed by sharpshooters, was ultimately effected with comparative ease.

Arrived on the south side of the Rappahannock, Burnside found himself in a situation which every raw recruit must have seen was critical. In his rear was a river, and before him an enemy posted on heights and strongly fortified; and we can imagine that even at the eleventh hour Burnside might have turned back if it had not been for a fatal miscalculation, yet a miscalculation based upon accurate information of the strength of the two armies. Burnside had at his disposal at least 100,000 men, and it is supposed that the Confederate force did not exceed 40,000, and it might have been much less. The Federal commander seems to have forgotten that a large force is not a source of strength in a narrow field of battle, and that a small force, strongly fortified and having the command of splendid artillery, is a match for an attacking force treble its number. So Burnside, on the 13th of December, fought the battle of Fredericksburg, which was to the Federals the most bloody and calamitous engagement of the war.

The plan of battle was necessarily simple. There was the enemy's position, and that had to be taken. No generalship was required, for no manœuvring was possible; it was essentially a soldiers' battle. All Burnside could do was to bring up his men as rapidly as possible. Between the Federal lines and the Confederate fortifications was an open plateau. As the Northern troops crossed this space they were mowed down by artillery, and when those who had escaped came near to the Confederate lines they were met with the still more deadly fire of the Confederate rifles. So raged the battle from morning till night. Burnside had plenty of food for powder, and he used it lavishly. He ordered fresh troops to charge over the ground strewn with his dead and wounded soldiers, and his orders were gallantly obeyed. When the battle was over Burnside learnt the extent of his disaster; his losses in killed and wounded were terrible; the lowest estimate was 10,000 men lying dead on that fatal field, and mingled with the dead were the wounded, who were too numerous to be immediately removed and succoured. Two Federal generals had been killed, and the casualties among officers were out of proportion to the great loss among the men. At present we can only surmise the extent of the slaughter. We are told that one Federal officer led 6000 men into action and at night could only muster 1500; but we know how heavy must have been the loss by the subsequent movements of Burnside. Two days were spent in burying the dead, and then, in the darkness of night and in the midst of a howling storm, the broken army retreated across the Rappahannock, and even then the Federal commander hardly felt safe until the waters of the river rose, and the bridges he had built were destroyed. Never did a general more frankly confess that he was crushed and beaten than did Burnside when he fled by night, and expressed his gratitude that the river which he had so vauntingly crossed was now between him and his foe. Perhaps he did not feel even then so secure as he pretended. He had only fought a portion of the Southern army. Where was the rest of it?

It may be asked why General Lee permitted his beaten enemy to escape? But without knowing the number of troops immediately at General Lee's command, or his plan of campaign, it would be ridiculous to attempt to answer this question, though we may observe that it seems to us the Confederate commander would have wasted precious lives if he had attacked his beaten enemy, and we may be sure that in the hurried retreat by night the Federals left behind them a considerable booty. We repeat it is useless to speculate on this point. Time will reveal the reason why the astute and farseeing Confederate general permitted Burnside to withdraw to the north of the Rappahannock.

In the North the disaster has created a profound sensation, but the Federal Government does not show any sign of relenting. McDowell, Pope, McClellan, and Burnside, have all failed—signally failed—yet it seems likely that if the men and money can be found the war will be tried over again. It is reported that McClellan, so lately and shamefully disgraced by the Lincolnites, has been sent for, and that he will once more assume the command. His Fabian policy is better than the rashness of Pope and Burnside, and the military quackery of Messrs. Halleck and Stanton; but McClellan has failed in the past; and why is he likely to succeed in the future? He will not have such a large and admirably equipped force at his command, and he will have to fight under the demoralizing influence of continued defeats. Why should McClellan, the unfortunate, do better in 1863 with less means than he did in 1862 with greater means? Well, he can lead his troops to slaughter. He can gratify the cravings of the New England clergy for blood. He can fight another "Seven Days' Battle," or, for the matter of that, for a third time make the plains of Manassas the scene of conflict. If Mr. Lincoln can get the men and the money, or credit, there may be another year of bloody battles unless Europe should strengthen the hands of the peace party in the North by the recognition of Southern independence.

A "GUBERNATORIAL MESSAGE."—English readers are familiar with Presidents' Messages, those curious and peculiarly American State Papers, preposterously voluminous, and in which anything, from the highest lessons of political sagacity to the homeliest truisms of proverbial philosophy, is thought to have an appropriate place. There is, however, a variety of this same species of document, frequently of far greater practical importance than the Presidential Addresses, though not usually of the same interest to Europe, which is almost wholly unknown and unnoticed on this side of the Atlantic. We refer to the Messages of the Chief Executives of the several States to their Legislatures. One of this class we publish elsewhere, in extenso—the annual Message of the Governor of North Carolina to the General Assembly of that State.

Regarded simply as a study of the political institutions to which both of the great American Federations profess themselves equally attached, but which in the South alone have survived the onslaught of Democracy and the shocks of a great revolution, this Message, despite its great length, will well repay perusal. It is impossible to read it carefully and not obtain from it clearer ideas of the relations of the State to the central Government or common agency of all the States, the very point which forms the complex problem of American politics, and presents the greatest difficulties to the European student. The Message is not an essay on this subject, but it is all the more instructive for not being an essay. It is the language of the Chief Magistrate of an independent, self-governing Sovereignty, which has indeed delegated, for specific purposes, certain of its attributes, but retains all the others as perfectly unimpaired as if it were a separate nationality treating as such with the other nations of the world. This Sovereignty is complete in every branch of its Governmental machinery, legislative, executive, and judiciary; it is the paramount lord over the domain included within its boundaries, and it claims the undivided allegiance of its citizens. Such is, by the Southern theory, the position of each member of the Confederation, the Confederate Government representing only the alliance of the States for purposes common to all, and assuming none of the functions of local Government.

The reader should be cautioned against erroneous inferences from the manner in which the State Executive alleges the grievances of the State against the Confederate Government. Grumbling is a peculiar Anglo-Saxon privilege, which the Southerners are not likely to surrender, and which they exercise much after the fashion of their progenitors. It would be truly wonderful, amid the enormous difficulties the central authority has had to encounter, and the fearful tasks imposed upon it, if each State did not feel itself entitled to its own special grievance and pet complaint. It is only natural, also, that each State should be most anxious for the defence of its own territory; and the necessities of the Confederate Government have frequently obliged it to apparently neglect the defence of one position in order to concentrate its strength upon another. That grievances of this nature, and minor ones, are freely and openly canvassed proves, not the looseness of the bond which unites these States in a common destiny, but, on the contrary, how firm and indissoluble it is held to be in the minds of all. The people of the South look upon the war of independence as a foreign war, and as such they discuss everything connected with it in their counsels, whether State or Confederate. With many faults, and many things in it that might be severely criticised, we are yet of opinion that this "Gubernatorial Message" is calculated to raise the character of Southern State Government in English estimation. At all events, it throws much light upon the internal working of the Confederate political system, and it proves, moreover, beyond all doubt, that the Federal telegraphist was quite right, when he briefly described the Message as "containing no trace of Union sentiment."

Boxing-Day.

Christmas-day, as observed in England, is peculiarly an English institution. Our decorations of the holly and mistletoe are a perpetual remembrance of the remote period when the Druids performed their religious ceremonies in the primeval forests of Britain. Our feasting dates back to a time anterior to that era in our history beyond which, the sages of the law tell us, the memory of man runneth not. But the feature of the festival, which for a time makes our country truly "Merrie England," and which is so nationally characteristic, is that on that occasion all classes of the community evince their respect for family life. Christmas day is not celebrated by out-door amusements or by public entertainments, but by family gatherings. It is pre-eminently the festival of Home, and a stranger passing through our streets on Thursday last might have supposed the nation was observing a fast, and not a feast.

Boxing-day is a holiday kept in a very different manner. We expect that with many of Her Majesty's lieges the day after Christmas-day is a sore trial of patience. John Bull, though very patient of taxation, does not like being generous on compulsion; and Christmas-boxes are gratuities that are nearly as compulsory as Queen's taxes. The householder may grumble as much as he likes, but unless he is content to be put down as mean, and suffer a score of inconveniences, he must pay. The postman claims his annual gratuity; and how can we refuse it, knowing that the Government chuses to consider our free gifts as a part of the remuneration of the ill-paid men who deliver our letters? The postman, like the rest of the claimants on our bounty, proceeds in a very business-like manner and comes with book in hand, to enter the donation. The turncock gives dark hints about deserting us in case of need if the customary half-crown is not forthcoming. The dustman, though bound by Act of Parliament to punctually discharge his duty, is sure to be a little remiss if we do not supply him with the means of drinking to our health, to the detriment of his own. The lamplighter simply appeals to our generosity, and we understand that he meets with many refusals on the ground that "Master says he pays a lighting-rate." The waits, who have broken our rest on two or three occasions with horrid discord, and the bell-ringers, who are parochial nuisances, succeed in getting a trifle by pertinaciously refusing to take no for an answer. The news-boy asks for his Christmas-box confidently, for if he is refused it is highly probable that now and then the paper will come too late for breakfast, and with many persons the paper is the best part of the morning meal. The policeman does not make a formal collection, but no doubt cook kindly bestows on him a goodly portion of our Christmas fare. Besides the numerous claimants out of doors, our servants expect a remembrance of the season. The cook is paid by the tradespeople, and the housemaid is remembered by the visitors; but the nurse looks to "master" for her Christmas gift. Let there be a little grumbling about paying wages, and the wife of one's bosom reminds us of the care bestowed upon our children, and the appeal is of course irresistible; and the attendant of children from morning to night, and from month to month, has, we confess, an unanswerable claim upon paternal generosity.

After all, Christmas comes but once a year, and Christmas-boxes are not heavy enough to deprive us of any of the luxuries or comforts we enjoy; and as to the compulsion, we may observe that if the recipients of our gifts did not think they could claim them as a right they would neither ask for nor receive them.

The motley crowds of pleasure-seekers that fill the streets of the metropolis on Boxing-day give to the scene in those thoroughfares where the shops are partially closed an appearance somewhat like a Sunday in Paris, except that the young women are prettier and much worse dressed. The beauty may be, we admit, a prejudice, but the inferiority of dress, so far as style is concerned, there is no gainsaying. We may be told that this arises from want of means, and that our ladies who have long purses are dressed with the most excellent taste; but this proves that our assertion is right, for all ladies who can afford to dress well resort to French fashions, and patronize French milliners. But we have no desire to be critical about the appearance of the holiday folk who plainly make a business and toil of pleasure; they look eagerly at everything that is to be seen in the streets; they visit the few institutions that are provided gratuitously for the recreation of the masses; and they go to the Zoological Gardens, which about Christmas-time are peculiarly uninviting, and when the Polar bears look more than usually miserable. Besides the Zoological Gardens the Wax-Work Exhibition in Baker-street is a popular place of resort, and Tussaud's Exhibition is certainly worthy of the patronage it receives, though we wish there were not quite so many gallows' celebrities.

Those who are of a scientific turn wend their way to the Polytechnic, where amusement is happily blended with instruction. Thousands flock to the Crystal Palace, at which place, erected to afford the multitude a high-toned and instructive entertainment, M. Blondin, who has been well described as a clever acrobat with the nerves of a bricklayer, performs sundry gymnastics upon a rope sufficiently high to ensure his being smashed if for one instant his nerves should give way.

Nothing daunted by the labours of the day, the pleasure-seekers fill the theatres to overflowing in the evening. It is the fashion to sneer at pantomimes as foolish and childish, but we notice the adults, who are only present to take care of the children, keenly enjoy the fun, and that the Clown is as much liked in the boxes as in the gallery. There is always a spice of genuine humour mixed up with the fun of the harlequinade, and the leading topics of the day are noticed in a manner that amuses all parties and displeases none. It will be observed that year after year the police are ridiculed to the intense gratification of the audience. Why? It is not that the force is unpopular, or that we are a lawless people, but the police force was for party purposes made unpopular at the time it was established, and in this country, once a butt always a butt, and so the "Bobby" continues to be tripped up by Pantaloon, beaten by the Clown, and terribly puzzled by the mystic wand with which Harlequin and Columbine are always performing feats of magic, such as no spirit-rapper has yet been able to manage. Another peculiarity of the pantomime is the advertising. The spectators see certain set scenes representing large London shops, or a board advertising cheap publications, and for these advertisements enormous prices are paid, and the price is still higher if the Clown makes some allusion to the advertisement. The most curious specimen of this system of puffing we remember, was a scene covered with placards of a quack pill. A man came on the stage walking on crutches, with his face painted, or rather chalked, a ghastly white. He was seized by Clown and Pantaloon, and asked if he had had "so and so's" pills; and several large pills were then taken from a box and thrust down what was supposed to be his throat. In the scuffle the Clown removed the chalk from his face, and unbound the bandages about his legs, and the cripple suddenly appeared before the audience with a flaming red complexion, and able to enjoy a very active dance. Even Barnum might admire the genius of such a puff.

It is to be regretted that all the holiday folk do not spend their evenings at a theatre; for then the highway would not present such a sorry sight of drunken men—and we must add, drunken women. Boxing-day is, however, generally a well-spent day; and we are glad to see that every effort is made to extend the holiday. We do not believe the political economists who look upon men as mere machines, and tell us that every holiday or half-holiday is so much loss of material wealth. He who works always will not work much. The Jews are notoriously rich, and they have a number of holidays more than Christians. We think our holidays are too few, and that if they were multiplied we should gain instead of lose. No bow carries so far as that which is frequently unobeyed—and this maxim applies to physical as well as to mental labour.

AMERICAN SKETCHES.*

Mr. Mitchell is not a brilliant writer, a close observer, or a deep thinker; yet he has managed to produce a readable, lively, and sensible book. He has not much that is new to tell us about American affairs; but what is quite as acceptable—he can give us clear and truthful sketches of some phases of American life, and assist us to realize what manner of men these are who are now waging an internecine war on the one side for empire, and on the other for independence. We should not look to him for any secret information as to the causes of the disruption, or any profound insight into the mysteries of American politics. We should not choose him as our guide on the question of slavery, or expect from him any solution of problems which have perplexed the calmest and wisest statesmen, and baffled the most earnest and singlehearted enthusiasts. He simply sees what is before his eyes, and describes it with tolerable lucidity in very respectable English. He has neither the ambition to be weighty nor the conceit to be tunny; he never becomes tediously didactic, and never makes silly jokes, or disgusts us with an ineptitude which is mistaken by authors, but never by readers, for humour. In a word, he writes like a man of ordinary capacity who is not ashamed of sometimes recording trifles, and does not often aspire to be instructive; and the consequence is that his book deserves to be read, is likely to be commended, and in a few months will be totally forgotten. Men who have a leisure evening, and who are interested in American affairs, will find it worth while to look into this unpretending volume; and may chance to learn from it more than the writer intended to teach.

Mr. Mitchell's first acquaintance with American soil was made in 1848, when the vessel in which he was grounded on a bar in the James River. After some negotiation he persuaded a fishing-boat to put him on shore; lost his way under the guidance of a small negro, whose landmark was an old horse's skull, which had unluckily disappeared from its usual place; and finally reached the house of a Virginian farmer, by whom he was received with frank and cordial hospitality.

I had merely noticed that the house I was entering was large, not very new, mostly of brick, with a plain whitened portico of wood in front, around the corners of which clustered some climbing plant. From the wide hall or passage, in which were an old-fashioned mahogany table, two rush-bottomed chairs, a gun, and some hats and coats, I was ushered into the family sitting-room, and courteously and pleasantly invited to take a seat in a large leather-covered arm-chair. The first feeling I experienced was one of surprise at finding myself in such a homely old-fashioned, pleasant, English-looking room. The members of the family were two grown young women, one pale, one rosy, both plainly but neatly and comfortably dressed; both rather good looking, and having that ease and self-possession which Americans rarely want; a slender, growing girl; a boy, brown and bold; and a fine young man of some five-and-twenty. The household had less of strangeness to me than I had experienced in my own country, under more favourable and usual circumstances.

I at once explained my situation, and narrated my journey, and I happened to mention that my guide had dated his misguidance to the time of finding the horse's skull. Upon this, a little negro, who was sitting in one corner listening demurely, showed signs of interest, looking askance at his young master, who laughingly informed me that he and that young black rascal had passed that way yesterday with the cart, and that coming back the boy had tied a string round the old skull, which had long lain at that spot, and attached it to the cart, so that it was dragged some distance, and finally left where we found it. This little incident set us all laughing, and seemed to make us acquainted with each other better than the best of regular introductions could have done. The father of the family—a widower, some fifty years of age, a stout, hearty, cheerful, thoughtful-looking man—declared that if I was not particularly sorry, he was very glad of the accident. This led to stories of being lost and "turned round" in the woods. All took part in the lively and unaffected conversation, except the youngest girl and the negro boy, who lounged on the floor in one corner, and a negro girl some ten years old, who sat on a hassock in another corner, with eyes and mouth open, looking and listening, laughing and grinning, attending very little to the occupation they had in hand—seeding cotton.

Some tea, boiled bacon, and chicken, eggs, wheaten bread, and corn cakes—in America, "corn" means Indian corn—were set in one corner of the large old mahogany table for my benefit, the family having supped before my arrival. To these viands without the least hesitation, I did full justice; there was such a feeling of ease and security, and goodwill in the people and the place, that I went on eating, drinking, and talking as if quite at home. It was the finest of hospitality, which I afterwards found not uncommon in the South. Had Prince Albert walked in, incognito, he would have been received much as I was; with as little constraint, pretension, or formality, and with scarcely more attention or ceremony. And very sorry I am that, during his visit to America, the Prince of Wales fell into the hands of Yankees, who contrived to prevent his seeing the Southerners at home, rendering even his hurried visit to Richmond almost an affront.

Here he spent the night, and availed himself of a visit from a party of neighbours to make his first remarks on American characteristics. Many such remarks are scattered throughout the volume, and are generally fair, shrewd, and not altogether hackneyed. The American women, even in Virginia, are said to have the look of convalescents; robust health, at least in the fair sex, being very rarely met with in the United States. Other observers have said the same thing; our author suggests that if the Americans were as scantily fed and fared as hardly as do the labouring population of European countries, their constitutional degeneracy would be still more obvious. Two facts, however, must be set against criticisms of this kind: in the first place, it is undeniable that the Southern and Western men—the Kentuckians for example—are physically a fine race, with stature, throws, and strength that would do no discredit to the sons of an English fox-hunter; and secondly, that the Southern soldiers, with insufficient food and very defective clothing, ill-sheltered, shoeless, and overworked, appear to suffer less than any European army in similar circumstances. We have heard before of the "indelicate delicacy" enforced in American conversation when ladies are present; we are not surprised to note Mr. Mitchell's observation that both men and women in the United States are quick to detect an objectionable sense in a word used with perfectly innocent meaning, which would pass unnoticed in English society; but we are rather startled to learn that it would be a mortal sin to ask for a rump-steak at an American table d'hôte. In return for these social restraints, and as if to compensate the women for the ill-health inflicted on them by the climate or the customs of the country, they enjoy an amount of personal freedom, an unchecked liberty in going anywhere they please in any company they choose, of which Mr. Mitchell gives some curious instances; and very young ladies are certainly allowed to take a place in society and at home which would hardly be thought due to them in England. De gustibus non disputandum. The women of the South have proved that their education has not spoiled them. And it must be admitted that far less mischief results from this want of supervision than English matrons would expect. American girls rarely go astray; society exacts so terrible a penalty from any man who takes advantage of feminine weakness that few there venture on sins which no vigilance can prevent where they are so leniently treated as in Europe. What other undesirable consequences the system may have we forbear to inquire. There is another remark made by our author which is perfectly true, though not often made by English observers—that a greater degree of courtesy and affability towards men of all ranks is exacted by public opinion in America than in England, and that “unpopular manners” are sure to draw down upon a man a degree of disfavour which would not be excited by many more serious faults. In the United States—and especially in those which still remain united—the people is sovereign, and every individual is more or less a courtier, and obliged to observe something of a courtier’s manner towards each individual atom that goes to make up the aggregate monarch. In the South, the punctilious temper of the people, and the certainty that any approach to an insult would be promptly resented by the meanest citizen, go far to improve manners that might otherwise, amid the roughness of life in a half-cultivated country, become exceedingly brusque and off-hand. Another observation will certainly surprise some English readers. In Mr. Mitchell’s opinion, Americans of respectable station are more thoughtful and cautious in political conversation than Englishmen; think more before they speak, and speak with more reserve, as men to whose words some weight is to be attached.

He found no one disposed at that time to admit the probability of a disruption of the Union. The national idolatry of size, which was constantly identified with grandeur, made every one disposed to regard with indignation the idea of any division of the vast thinly-peopled territory over which the thirty millions that were one day to be three hundred are spread. As to the possibility that the fanaticism of the Northern Abolitionists might one day drive the South to secession, it was never recognized. The Abolitionists were far too insignificant, too much despised even at the North, ever to become formidable to the people or dangerous to the institutions of the South. So men spoke and thought in 1848.

From the house where he had first been so kindly received, the traveller went on to Richmond. His account of that city, then a quiet State capital, much like an English county town, now the centre of a nation on whose struggle the eyes of the world are fixed, is not flattering, but is, perhaps, worth quotation:—

Richmond, the capital of the State of Virginia, is one of the oldest places on the North American continent settled by people speaking English; for it claims about equal antiquity with Boston, New York, Baltimore, Raleigh, and Charleston. It is situated at the head of tide water, on the winding, unbusiness-like James, which rolls carelessly and pleasantly through the country, as if choosing to be as long and see as much as possible before dying in the vast Atlantic. The principal thoroughfare is Main-street, which commences in the lower regions of the town, among warehouses, and waste places, and docks, and old dilapidated buildings. The neighbourhood (called Rocketts) is enlivened by mules and waggons, sailors, negro drivers, and laborers, merchants and their assistants; negroes, mules, and waggons especially. Thence the street runs nearly parallel with the river up hill, in a straight line. “Stores” of all kinds are on each side; provisions and such things at the lower end; “dry goods,” confectioners, hotels, bakers, druggists, &c., &c., higher up, for about a mile; then private dwellings, mostly of brick, some of wood; a storehouse here and there; business gradually going up town. The outskirts consist of fields, some fenced in, some open; here a respectable dwelling, there a shanty; there a fresh building going up, and so on. Beyond is the ample ground for agricultural fairs, surrounded by whitewashed shedding and stabling; and further on to the left is the beautiful cemetery of Hollywood.

The city is laid out at right angles, the cross streets commencing up town, with four or five named after once distinguished men; then “first,” “second,” and so on down to “thirty-first,” which runs at the foot of a hill, Chimborazo, 200 feet above tide water. At the time I first saw it, in 1848, the city contained some 35,000 people, of these about half were black, or inclining to that colour, and slaves, so that there would be about 3500 adult white males. A large portion of the outskirts of the city consisted of poor, mean, low, neighbourhoods. Probably there were not many more than 3500 white men in the whole population who would mutually call each other “respectable;” though the term would be applied to the well-conducted journeyman mechanic working for weekly wages as well as to the millionaire—if there were one, but I believe there was not.

It was curious, in walking along the streets, to observe that the dealers in old clothes and cheap slop-clothing, were Jews—Cohens, Moseses, Isaacs, Abrahams, and so on. There they were, with their sharp eyes and hooky noses, sitting, standing, or walking about their stores, ready to sell you a bargain, just as in the Old World. The dealers in fruit and confectionery were Italian, so cleverly keeping the business in their hands, that even a Yankee had a poor chance. Most of the few bakers were Scotch. The best butcher in the market, I was proud to hear, was an Englishman, “a jolly good fellow,” and related, I was surprised to find, to an old acquaintance of mine. Few people have any adequate idea of the number of surviving and ascertainable relationships between the people of England and those of the various States.

The “Dutch”—that is, the Germans—form a considerable portion of the population of this, and of most American cities. New York and other places were in early times settled by the true Dutch, and the Germans and others were classed with them, in the popular mind and language; all being called “Dutch,” or, not unfrequently, “the damned Dutch.” For the native American is exclusive in his ideas, he allows, indeed, English and Scotch, and the better sort of Irish to associate with him on terms of social equality, but no others; although he rather likes the French, partly out of national gratitude, partly because the French met with out of France, unless in numbers too great to be regarded as pleasant visitors, are of a class above the mere labourer.

Having the advantage of taking my first surveys of the city with a shrewd old resident, I saw many things which escape the traveller who has to trust to his own hasty and superficial observation. The foreigners, I found, formed social circles of their own—Irish with the Irish, Dutch with the Dutch, and to some extent, English with their fellow-country people—so that it is quite rare, considering the great proportion of Europeans in the United States, to encounter one as a friend or visitor in an American family. The men meet and talk together in the streets, or at their places of business, and that is all.

A portion of this city at the west end is, to English taste, very pleasing. The streets are wide and quiet and clean; the foot-pavement is mostly shaded with horse-chestnuts, Otaheitan mulberry, silver-leaved maple, and other trees. Many of the houses are detached; some of them are of red brick, in modern styles, others stuccoed, others of wood, and of various sizes. They are surrounded with well-kept gardens or with trees, and there is a little green space in front; the neighbourhood having an airy, comfortable, cultivated, home-like look, which one seldom meets with in American towns. About a tithe of the space built on is of this character, while in other quarters on the extensive outskirts—Rocketts, Shed Town, Horse Heaven, Butcher Town, Gully Nation, Scramersville—expressive names—one is wearied and disgusted with old wooden shanties, waste fields, patched, tumbling stables and dwellings, dusty or muddy roads, and all the appearances of a slovenly don’t-care population, out of the pale of respectability, and not ambitious even to get in. I am sorry to say that more than a tenth—more than two-tenths—of the city is of this inferior character.

It was in Richmond that the author fixed his residence, but during the ten years he spent in America he visited various parts of the country, and came into contact with men of all classes and of all opinions, both in the North and in the South. He is a tolerant and rational man, and not disposed to condemn as unpardonable vices the disagreeable peculiarities of those among whom he may be thrown; and thus he saw the Americans to greater advantage, and judged them more favourably, than do the majority of English travellers. He admits the existence of spitting and whittling, but condones these bad habits in consideration of the courtesy with which women are almost invariably treated; of bowie-knives and revolvers, which, as we all know, are habitually displayed and incessantly brought into use in every Southern bar-room, he takes no notice whatever. En revanche, he does notice the appalling frequency of murders in New York, and the frightful insecurity of life and property which distinguishes the Empire City. But from his book we should never learn that Virginian gentlemen were in the habit of shooting one another at the table d’hotes, and that the streets were rendered unsafe by the hourly encounters in which fire-arms are discharged with terrible rapidity and astonishing indifference to the lives of passers-by. We should gather from his pages—if we did not know better from the unimpeachable narratives of Mr. Russell and Mrs. Beecher Stowe—that the Southerners were, on the whole, a peaceful and law-abiding people, as little likely as Englishmen to shoot down their neighbours on trifling provocation, or roast their slaves alive by way of amusement. It is strange that Mr. Mitchell never saw, or, if he saw, failed to make a note of, any of those brutal murders, those diabolical outrages, which we know, on unquestionable Abolitionist authority, are characteristic of the daily life of a slaveholding community. It can hardly be that he became so used to them as to think them not worth recording; and we are driven to the conclusion that either Mr. Mitchell, fair and observant on other points, is uncandid or careless beyond measure in this respect, or some of his predecessors have drawn liberally on their imagination for their facts.

The restlessness of the Yankees, as contrasted with the more English character and staid demeanour of the Virginians, seems to have struck the traveller very forcibly. He assists us to understand it by the remark that Southerners, even more than Englishmen, love a country life; while the youth of New England, if possessed of any talents or actuated by a spark of ambition, gravitate towards the great cities as Frenchmen towards Paris. But there is, perhaps, a common cause both for the restlessness and the townward gravitation of the New Englanders in their Puritan origin. Puritanism deprives men of that geniality of temper and cheerfulness of spirit which alone can make contentment possible and the quiet of rural life agreeable; fanaticism is incompatible with the sober Conservatism which distinguishes the Englishman and the Southerner; and naturally breeds that uneasy, unsettled disposition which, while it has stimulated the energy and furthered the material progress of New England, has made her people one of the most disagreeable and most unhappy in the world.

There are two topics on which Mr. Mitchell touches lightly, which are especially misapprehended by many of his countrymen, and on which he has something that is new and much that is true to say. He does something to correct the ideas commonly prevalent here concerning the condition of the immigrant labouring population of the North. He shows that the foreigners do all the hardest physical work of Northern cities; people back streets and alleys in New York as unwholesome as the dens inhabited by the lowest class of the population in London and Liverpool, are looked down upon and disregarded by those for whom they work; fare badly and enjoy certainly no greater freedom than in the countries they have quitted. He bears witness, on the other hand—with an evident dread of the storm of abuse which he may expect from some parties to whom nothing is so offensive as evidence that does not bear out their preconceived judgment—to the good condition and kind treatment of negroes by their Southern masters. The Yankees, he remarks, like all men not used to the negro character, make bad slave-masters, and are greatly disliked by the subject race; but the planter, brought up among slaves, is patient and lenient; does not exact too much work, is tolerant of shortcomings, and displays tact in the management of servants, in which a stranger is inevitably deficient. The slaves are well-fed, of course—for they are valuable and food is cheap, so that the stories of their being undernourished are obviously absurd as well as notoriously false—and for the most part well clothed. Capacity and good service may bring them into a very comfortable position; and if their upward progress is more restricted than it ought to be, this is due chiefly to what Mr. Mitchell aptly calls “the state of siege” in which the South has been kept by Northern Abolitionism. There is no country in the Old World in which the mass of the labouring people are physically as well off as the slaves of the Confederate States.

We pass over without remark the political chapters of this book. They are sound, sensible, and mostly accurate; but they contain little or nothing that has not been better said by former writers. Mr. Mitchell is not a politician, and the merit of his book lies in its pictures of private life, and in the light it throws incidentally on some of the social relations of America, not in its political disquisitions. Nor is that merit small. We think that few who may read the volume will regret the time bestowed upon it.

THE TYRANNY OF GENERAL BUTLER.

LETTER FROM ONE OF HIS VICTIMS TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

A copy of the subjoined letter to President Davis from one of the victims of the brutal rule of General Butler, at New Orleans, has been forwarded to us through an officer of the Confederate Government from Richmond:—

SHIP ISLAND, State of Mississippi,
September 13, 1862.

His Excellency Jefferson Davis,
President of the Confederate States.

Sir,—A close prisoner on this desolate island, with some fifty or more of my fellow-citizens, I have thought it my duty, at every risk, to communicate to you some at least of the incidents of the administration of the brutal tyrant who has been sent by the United States’ Government to oppress, rob, insult, and trample upon our people in every manner which the most fiendish ingenuity and most wanton cruelty could devise, and in gross violation of all the laws and usages of the most remorseless wars between civilized and even savage nations and tribes.

I was consigned to Ship Island as a close prisoner, with seven other respectable citizens, to a small hut 15 feet by 20—exposed to rain and sun—without permission to leave, except for a bathe in the sea, once or twice a week.

A description of the causes and circumstances of the imprisonment of our citizens, who are now held on this island, will afford some of the mildest illustrations of Butler’s brutality.

There are about sixty prisoners here, all of whom are closely confined in portable houses, and furnished with the most wretched and unwholesome condemned soldiers’ rations. Some are kept at hard labour on the fort—several in addition to labour are compelled to wear a ball and chain which are never removed. Among these is Mr. Shepherd, a respectable, elderly, and weakly citizen, who is charged with secreting certain papers belonging to the naval officer of the Confederate States,—which the latter left in his charge when he departed from New Orleans. Mr. Shepherd had the proof that the officer who had deposited these documents afterwards returned and took them, and that they had been carried into the Confederate States. This testimony Butler would not receive, and declared that if it existed, it would make no difference in his case. Dr. Moore, a dealer in drugs, is also at hard labour with ball and chain, on the charge of having sent a few ounces of quinine into the Confederate States. There are five prisoners condemned, and employed at hard labour, on the charge of intending to break their parole as prisoners of war captured at Fort Jackson. There is also a delicate youth from the country who is subjected to the same treatment, on the charge of being a "guerilla," the term which Butler applies to the Partizan Rangers, organized under the Act of Congress of the Confederate States.

Alderman Beggs, on the charge of denouncing those who having taken the oath to the Confederate States afterwards swore allegiance to the United States, and Mr. Keller, a vendor of books, stationery, and scientific apparatus, on the charge of permitting a clerk to placard the word "Chickahominy" on a skeleton which was suspended in his show-window for sale, for the use of students of anatomy, are condemned also to close imprisonment and hard labour for two years. The others mentioned above are condemned for a longer period. A like condemnation and punishment were imposed upon Judge John W. Andrews, a most respectable citizen, recently a member of the Judiciary of the State, of the Legislature, and of the City Council, and a prominent merchant. This gentleman is advanced in years and in very delicate health. There is little hope that his health can long sustain his present burdens and hardships.

The circumstances of Mrs. Phillips's imprisonment are probably known to you. As, however, I desire this to be an authentic and studiously accurate statement of facts, I will here relate them. In the raid of the United States troops near Warrenton, Mississippi, a young officer named Dekay was mortally wounded. He died in New Orleans, and an attempt was made by the Federal authorities to get up a pompous funeral ceremony and procession in honour of so "gallant and heroic a young officer," who had fallen in an expedition which had no other purpose or object but the pillage of defenceless farms and villages. The effort to excite the sympathies of our people on this occasion proved a ridiculous failure, and the funeral ceremony had no aspect of solemnity or even propriety—a long line of carriages composing the cortege, designed for the Union citizens, being all empty. As this procession passed the residence of P. Phillips, Esq., Mrs. Phillips, standing on the balcony with several lady friends, was observed by some Federal officers to smile; so it was charged. She was immediately arrested and taken before Butler, who in the most brutal and violent manner sought to terrify the heroic lady. In this he did not succeed. Whilst denying that her gaiety had any reference whatever to the funeral ceremony, Mrs. Phillips refused to make any apologies or concessions to the vulgar tyrant. Thereupon she was condemned to close imprisonment in a filthy guard-room, thence to be transported to Ship Island, where she was to be held in close confinement for two years, with no other fare but soldiers' rations, no intercourse or correspondence with any person except through General Butler. This sentence was published in the newspapers, accompanied by words of the grossest insult and most vulgar ribaldry, in which Mrs. Phillips was denounced as "not a common, but an uncommon bad woman," referring to his proclamation denounced by Lord Palmerston and the whole civilized world as "so infamous," in which his soldiers are authorized to treat as "common women plying their profession" all who may manifest any contempt or discourtesy towards them. To add further insult, in the order condemning Mr. Keller, it was made a part of his sentence to permit him to hold converse and intercourse with Mrs. Phillips, to which condition that honest man was induced to protest, from the belief that his fellow-prisoner was a notorious courtesan of the city, who bore the name of Phillips. This protest was published in the paper, with Butler's order granting the request of Keller, so as to convey to the world the idea that a poor vendor of periodicals declined association with a lady of the highest respectability, the wife of a distinguished lawyer and ex-Member of Congress. I can bear personal testimony to the rigorous execution of the sentence against Mrs. Phillips, having been imprisoned for weeks in a building adjoining to that which she was never allowed to leave. Such was the treatment of a delicate lady of the highest refinement, the mother of nine children.

In his first interview with the authorities of the city, Butler had declared that he would take no cognizance of any acts committed before he occupied the city, and established martial law therein. This solemn and oft-repeated pledge he has violated in a thousand instances.

Of the other prisoners, there are three captains in the Confederate service, who have copies of their parole as prisoners of war, and who are sent here upon no specific charge, but as suspicious persons, who might break the lines and go into the Confederate service. They are Captain McLean, late of the McCulloch Rangers; Captain Losberg, who commanded the De Feriet Guards of the Chalmette Regiment, captured and paroled by Commodore Farragut in the attack upon the forts below the city; and Captain Batchelders, of the 3rd Regiment of Louisiana Regulars. There is also a young Creole, the sole protector of his family, his father having recently died, who is sentenced to an indefinite punishment, on the charge, supported by the testimony of his own slave, a negro boy, of having thrown a revolver into the river after Butler's order, requiring the citizens to deliver up their arms, had been published. This is the case of Mr. Le Beau, belonging to one of the oldest and most respectable Creole families in the State. The other prisoners here are imprisoned upon like frivolous charges; some eight or ten of them for the publication of cards denying that they had taken the oath of allegiance to the United States, their names having been published in Butler's journal among those who had taken that oath.

In the case of Mr. Davidson, a gallant young lawyer, who has not yet recovered from a severe wound received at Shiloh, the offence consisted in his publishing a card stating that he was not the person of the same name who was published as having taken the oath.

So much for the prisoners at Ship Island, with the facts of whose cases I am personally acquainted. I refrain from any reference to my own case, hard as my doom is, closely confined on this island, with all my property appropriated by the enemy, and my family placed under strict espionage and subjected to many annoyances, insults, and discomforts. With all its trials and hardships, the condition of the prisoners here is quite easy and endurable compared with that of those who are confined in the damp and unwholesome casemates of Forts Jackson and St. Philip on the Mississippi, and in Fort Pickens on Santa Rosa Island.

Among the latter is the Mayor of the city, who has been imprisoned for four months for the offence of writing a letter to Butler, protesting against his order relative to the treatment of the ladies of the city, and declaring his inability to maintain the peace of the city if the Federal soldiers were thus authorized to insult and outrage our women at their own pleasure and will.

The secretary of the Mayor, who wrote the letter signed by the Mayor, was included in the same committal and imprisonment. Several members of the council, for like or smaller offences, suffer the same punishment.

Dr. Porter, a wealthy dentist and citizen, is imprisoned for requiring the Citizens' Bank, the pet bank and place of deposit of Butler and his agent, in his vast schemes of corruption and extortion, to pay checks in the currency which Butler alone allowed the banks to pay.

George Laurason, formerly collector of the Port of New Orleans, suffers a like penalty, for applying for a passport to go to Europe, where his family now is.

Thomas Murray, as president of that benevolent institution known as the Free Market, which supplied the families of the soldiers with the means of subsistence; Charles Heideich, a French citizen, the owner of the celebrated wine manufactory in France; Mr. Dacres, and other British citizens; Mr. Mir, a wealthy and highly respectable Spanish citizen, the owner of extensive saw-mills in Florida, and the contractor to supply the French navy with timber, are all imprisoned at Fort Pickens, for endeavouring to pass the lines without taking the oath prescribed by Butler for foreigners, which oath requires them to reveal to the United States all information they may have respecting the acts and designs of the Confederate States, on pain of being regarded and treated as enemies and spies. There are, too, many prisoners who are confined on the information of political and personal enemies as dangerous characters, for offences alleged to have been committed by them months and years before Butler's arrival in the city. Dr. McPherson, an elderly and most respectable citizen, was condemned to the casemates of Fort Jackson, for speaking in a circle of his friends of Butler's proclamation, No. 28, that relative to the ladies of New Orleans, as "infamous," the very epithet which Lord Palmerston, in the House of Commons, declared to be the only appropriate one.

Dr. Warren Stone, the distinguished surgeon and philanthropist, was consigned to a like punishment, for refusing to recognize an individual who had been announced as President of a Union Association,—and yet who a few months before had made in public a most violent speech against the Yankees, and had advised our people to cut the throats of all invaders.

Several ladies of the highest social position have been imprisoned for the expression of sympathy with the Confederates, and the wearing of ribbons of certain colours.

Mrs. Dubois, an elderly lady, long engaged in the business of teaching our children, was imprisoned on the charge of not being able to account for certain keys and books belonging to the schools, which were never in her possession.

All the members of the Finance Committee of the City Council are imprisoned for authorizing the subscription of the city to the fund for its defence, and several hundreds of our citizens who subscribed to this fund, have been compelled to pay 25 per cent. of their subscription to Butler, under a threat of imprisonment at hard labour. To swell this exaction to the sum of $300,000, all the cotton factors of the city, who had united in a circular address to the planters advising them not to send their cotton to New Orleans, were assessed fines of $500 and $250, which they had to pay or go to prison.

The treatment of a venerable citizen named Roberts, a farmer living a short distance from Baton Rouge, is one of peculiar atrocity. A son of Mr. Roberts, a soldier of the Confederate army, having come on sick leave to see his parents, a detachment of the 21st Indiana Regiment was sent to arrest him. The young man, hearing the approach of armed men, went out to meet them, when several shots were fired by the Indians, one of which killed young Roberts. The father, seeing the danger of his son, seized a gun and fired through the door, slightly wounding Colonel McMillan, the commandant of the detachment. He was then arrested and charged with having killed his own son, and was taken with the rest of his family from his home; the body of his son being brought out and laid on the ground, the building, all the outhouses, barns, and stables were burnt to the ground, and his mules, horses and cattle were driven off to the Federal camp. Old Mr. Roberts was condemned to close imprisonment for twenty years, and this imprisonment he is now undergoing at Fort Pickens.

There are many other cases of equal atrocity and hardship of citizens of the highest respectability, who upon the most frivolous charges have been dragged from their homes by a brutal soldiery and immured in cells or the casemates of forts, and condemned to hard labour.

I have not the time nor the exact information to state these cases fully. The prisons of New Orleans are crowded with citizens, whose highest offence consists in the expression of opinions, and of hopes for the success of the Confederate cause. Not a few are confined for repeating reports of Confederate victories, or for having in their possession newspapers containing such reports.

A Mr. Levy, a respectable merchant, was imprisoned for one month for stating to a Federal that he heard that Baton Rouge had been evacuated, when it really had been evacuated.

Another citizen was arrested in the cars, and imprisoned for saying that the distress for cotton in England would soon increase; and another for repeating what had been published in the Delta, that "Richmond had fallen," such a remark being regarded as ironical, after the Confederate victories in the first days of July.

A great many have been imprisoned on the information of their slaves that they had concealed or destroyed arms, and the informers emancipated.

Mr. Lathrop, a respectable lawyer, is now undergoing in the parish prison a sentence of two years' imprisonment for "kidnapping" his own slave, who had been appropriated by a Federal officer. This sentence Butler declared was intended as a warning to the people not to interfere with the servants of his officers—meaning the slaves of our citizens appropriated by them.

A number of our citizens, enrolled as Partizan Rangers, or in the State Militia, have been closely imprisoned and threatened with death as "guerillas" or "pirates."

W. E. Seymour, late a captain in one of the regiments in the defence of the State, and honourably paroled, is a close prisoner at Fort St. Philip, and his property all confiscated on account of an obituary notice which appeared in his own paper, the Bulletin, of his father, the late gallant Colonel J. G. Seymour, of the 6th Louisiana, who fell in the battle at Gaines' Mill. The writer of the article, Mr. Dennis, an old and infirm citizen, was subjected to a like punishment, and is now a prisoner at Fort Pickens.

Besides these instances, there are a great many citizens who have only escaped imprisonment by the payment of large prices, and in many cases by bribing Federal officers of influence. To enumerate the cases of confiscation by order of Butler, and in many cases even by the order of his subordinates, would exceed the bounds I have allixed to this report. I have, however, kept a record of these cases, and will communicate them at some other time. Suffice it to say that nearly all the large and commodious houses of our citizens, especially those of absentees and officers in our army and Government, have been thus appropriated. Officers of no higher grade than lieutenants occupy houses which have cost our citizens $30,000. Where furniture has been removed, or when deficient in any articles which the appropriators may deem necessary to their comfort, they are purchased at the expense of the owner of the property. The wives and families of our citizens are frequently ejected from these houses to make way for coarse Federal officers and the negro women whom they appropriate as their wives and concubines. Ships have been loaded with costly articles of furniture stolen—they say confiscated—from our citizens and transmitted North to the families of Federal officers. Many a house in New England is even now resounding with the tones of pianos thus stolen from the parlours of our citizens. A vast amount of silver has been appropriated in like manner. The example set by Butler in appropriating the house of General Twiggs's minor heir and furnishing it in a most lavish and luxurious style at the expense of the estate, and in transmitting the plate and swords of the deceased veteran to Lowell, the seizure and removal to the North of the statue of Washington by Powers, and of the State library from the capital of Baton Rouge, have been extensively followed by Butler's subordinates.

Nor have I here space to expose the extortions of Butler through the agency of his brother, an abandoned gambler and speculator, who has compelled our citizens, by all kinds of threats, to sell their property to him at rates fixed by him; who has monopolized all the shipping employed by the United States to transport the produce thus forced from our people, and has acted as broker to obtain remissions of penalties, and the restoration of fugitive slaves, in many cases on condition of the payment of half their value, and on pledges of half of the growing crops. In this manner have the plantations within fifty miles of New Orleans been taxed. Many of them, unable to secure even these terms, have been depopulated.

You have, doubtless, been made acquainted with the proceedings of Butler to compel our citizens to take the oath of allegiance to the United States, the prohibition of all trade to those who have not taken the oath, and the seizure of their funds in bank. The last device will be to compel all those who do not take that oath to register themselves as enemies of the United States, when they will be either imprisoned or driven from the city, and their property confiscated. These orders, especially the oath requirement, are applicable as well to women as to men. Indeed, the malice of Butler against females is more bitter and insatiable than that against males. A placard in his office in large letters bears this inscription, "The venom of the she-adder is as dangerous as that of the he-adder."

And this is but a feeble and deficient presentment of the enormities and brutalities of this cowardly and brutal monster. It is in vain that some of his subordinates remonstrate and protest against many of his acts. He will permit no one to thwart his two great objects—to bid highest for the favour of the Northern mob, and to accumulate a vast fortune by extortion and plunder. The extent to which this latter purpose is carried will surpass all similar efforts of great robbers, from Verres down.

I content myself with this mere epitome of Butler's crimes. At some other more favourable occasion I will present them in greater detail and with the authentic proof which I cannot now command. It would not be becoming in me to solicit or to suggest that some steps be taken by the President and Government of the Confederate States to arrest and to avenge these wrongs done our people. I have full confidence that all will be done in that behalf which can be done.

I beg to subscribe myself faithfully and respectfully yours,

European and Confederate States

Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised, classified, and liberal SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING.

Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that might lever "the Press" and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—

1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.

2nd. To advertise Southern business, property &c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the cities of our Confederacy, instead of these of our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance, and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,

PRESIDENT DAVIS'S PROCLAMATION	196

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

Mr. Lincoln is always humorous. When the question of peace or war was pending, he interrupted a grave conference with grotesque anecdotes. No matter how solemn the occasion, he cannot refrain from homely jesting. We do not blame him for the indulgence of a habit which is evidently natural and unconquerable. When he tries to be serious he is grimly, but more than ever comic. When he told the Army of the Potomac, after the Seven Days' Battle, that it had not been beaten, we can conceive that the crushed and crouching remnant of that once mighty host must have thought their President amazingly funny, though it may have seemed rather a cruel joke to the crippled and the dying, and to those who had lost husbands, sons, and fathers in the bloody conflict. The last exhibition of Mr. Lincoln's fun is the terms in which he proclaims a servile war in the South—that is, a servile war if his power were in any degree equal to his will. This edition of his Emancipation Edict is confessedly a "military measure," and as such it would be useless, unless the slaves were to revolt, and also "be received into the Federal army and navy" to fight for the country of Butler, Pope, Turchin, and McNeil. With a blasphemy that has no parallel in the atheistic Reign of Terror in France, he invokes, "the gracious favour of Almighty God" upon the most brutal and savage scheme ever propounded. But the fun is as amusing as the blasphemy is disgusting. Mr. Lincoln, in effect, solemnly decrees that the slaves shall be free, where he has not the power to emancipate, and wherever he has the power, he decrees that the slaves are not to be freed.

The telegraphic summary of the document, of which we give the text in another column, says:—

It declares for ever free the slaves in Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Virginia, except in certain counties and districts occupied by the Federal forces; and that their freedom will be recognized and maintained by the Government and military and naval authorities of the United States. All the Border Slave States are exempted. The proclamation enjoins upon the people so declared free to abstain from all violence, unless in necessary self-defence, and recommends to them that, in all cases when allowed they labour faithfully for reasonable wages. The proclamation states that the slaves will be received into the Federal army and navy, and concludes by affirming the act to be one of justice, warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity, and invokes the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favour of Almighty God.

Possibly Mr. Lincoln hopes by this measure to conciliate the good-will of both Democrats and Republicans by playing with and deceiving both parties. He may remind the fanatics of New England that emancipation in ten States is equal to a general decree of emancipation, because the Border States could not keep their slaves if the negroes in the South were free. And Mr. Lincoln might still more conciliate his supporters by appealing to their cupidity and that passion for bloodshed that has made the clergymen of New England prefer the rifle to the Bible as an Evangelist. Mr. Lincoln, with a cunning chuckle, might tell his friends that he was going effectually to punish the Border States by protecting their property in slaves so long as the war lasted, and when it is over to leave them to their fate, and to whistle for compensation; and further that emancipation, by servile war, would be a ready mode of clearing the South of its white population and the hated negroes. The Republican journals approve of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, and the Rev. Ward Beecher is gloating over the prospect of a feast of blood that is happily not likely to be gratified.

Mr. Lincoln may hope to conciliate the Democrats by explaining to them that the proclamation is a sham to checkmate the Republicans. "See, gentlemen, I am not an Abolitionist. So far from sharing in the fanaticism of New England, I look upon the right to hold slaves as a fitting reward for loyalty to the Union. Besides, I am not going to emancipate the slaves. Where our armies do not go the negroes are not likely 'to work out their freedom'; in all the counties and districts occupied by our troops I especially exempt the slaves from emancipation." The cunning of Mr. Lincoln is too transparent to deceive the Democrats or to change the determination of the South to punish every attempt to stir up a servile war.

In our last issue we recited a clause of the Constitution of the United States, which forbids the dismemberment of a State. Our readers will not have been surprised to learn that Mr. Lincoln has violated that part of the Constitution by signing the bill for the admission of Western Virginia as a separate State. This act of spoliation is not formidable, as Mr. Lincoln's unconstitutional bills are less valuable than Mr. Chase's irredeemable greenbacks.

We elsewhere publish President Davis's proclamation of retaliation. We invite a careful perusal of that document, for though it is severe and uncompromising in its tone, it is marked by the most scrupulous regard to the claims of justice and humanity. Every effort was made to ascertain beyond question the true version of the murder of Mr. Mumford by General Butler, and ample opportunity was given the Federal Government to offer any explanation of the circumstances. The crime could not be denied, and yet Butler was left in office month after month, though his conduct was in all respects notoriously infamous. Long after the civilized world has condemned Butler as an enemy of mankind the President of the Confederate States denounces him as a felon and orders him, if captured, to be hanged. Surely no one ever so deserved the gallows as Butler, whose hands are stained with innocent blood, and who has been guilty of unparalleled barbarity to women and children, and has robbed the people of New Orleans of their property. Mr. Lincoln will not, by now withdrawing his favourite from New Orleans, save him from the consequences of his crimes. If ever the murderer of Mumford and the savage tyrant of New Orleans falls into the hands of the Confederates, he will be hanged. With regard to Butler's officers, who ought to have refused to obey such a commander, it is tolerably certain that since Butler is removed, they will be released from the responsibility. The latter part of the proclamation refers to attempts at stirring up a servile war. It simply decrees that Federal officers actually in command of negro regiments are, if taken, to be punished; and the non-commissioned officers and privates are to be treated as prisoners of war. President Davis will not, in any way, encourage a war of retaliation, and so he limits the responsibility to the officers. We are confident that this act of the Confederate President will do much to prevent the war becoming a war of extermination.

The military operations in the West are for the moment the centre of attraction. The reports which come from New York are meagre, and of such a character that we can only speculate upon the probable issue of the operations to which they refer. It appears that a series of battles have been fought in Tennessee between the Confederates under Generals Joseph Johnston and Bragg, and the Federals under General Rosecrans. The contest commenced on the 31st of December, and was continued on the 1st and 2nd of the present month. We need hardly say that the Federals claim a victory, for they have always done so during the progress and immediately after a series of battles. It is said that on the 31st of November the Federals recaptured Murfreesboro, and that the Confederate centre was broken, and the Confederates driven one mile, the left wing of the Federals having captured the entrenchments. This account of the affair is discredited by the fact that the engagement was renewed on the 1st and 2nd of January, and that when the mail left the result was not known in New York. The Federals must be very unteachable, or they would ere this have learned the danger of claiming a victory before the end of the battle, or before the result is known to them. We will endeavour to present our readers with an intelligible account of the affair, from the report of the special correspondent of the New York Tribune, though, of course, under such circumstances we cannot in any way guarantee the accuracy of the statements. The account is, however, full of admissions that pretty plainly indicate that there is much truth in the statement of the Tribune, that in spite of the Federal victory "the advantage was with the rebels."

It appears that the Southern army was posted on the bank of Stones River, with its flanks resting on Murfreesboro, and the centre on an elevation thickly wooded, and strongly fortified with artillery. The battle commenced at 7 o'clock in the morning, by the capture of three Federal batteries, which had the effect of demoralizing a Federal division. Upon this General Rosecrans ordered an advance, and the Confederates drew back, but immediately afterwards assaulted the Federal centre and broke it. The division under the immediate command of Rosecrans was still engaged in following the division of the Confederate army, the retrograde movement evidently being intended to divide the enemy's forces. The attack on the Federal right was also successful, and the correspondent of the Tribune says, "The number of our stragglers was formidable, and the prospect was discouraging, but there was no panic." The difficulties of the Federals were increased by the Confederate cavalry capturing McCook's ammunition and subsistence trains. The battle lasted till 6 o'clock in the evening. The correspondent of the Tribune says, "When the battle closed the enemy occupied the ground which was ours in the morning, and the advantage was theirs." The next day General Rosecrans commenced the attack. At 12 o'clock the correspondent of the Tribune says, "At this hour we are apprehensive, some of our troops behaved badly, but most of them were heroes, I believe all but Walker's brigade, consisting of the 17th and 31st Ohio, and two other regiments, were in Wednesday's battle, they being on guard, but they were engaged to-day." It thus appears that on the 1st the whole of the Federal reserves were in the battle. The result of the contest had not transpired. It is admitted that the Federal loss was enormous; it is said, "Our whole line suffered terribly. Four regiments of regulars lost half their men and all their commanding officers. General Anderson's troops suffered severely." In the list of killed are Generals Sill and Willick; Lieutenant-Colonel Garsche, chief of General Rosecrans' staff; Colonels Hill, Sheffer, Tanner, and Jones; Lieutenant-Colonel Cotton, and six other officers. Amongst the wounded are Generals Kirk, Wood, Van Cleve, Rousseau; Colonels Carsole and Berry, and Majors Clemmer and King. This list is very significant of a severe Federal disaster. Three Illinois regiments lost two-thirds of their men. According to Northern accounts the Confederate loss was heavy, and they report that General Raines was killed, and that General Cheatham was wounded and taken prisoner. But we need hardly observe that Federal reports of Confederate losses, whilst a battle is progressing are necessarily mere guesswork, and are always exaggerated. From the position of the Confederates it is probable that, as at Fredericksburg, their loss bears no proportion to that of the enemy. What is admitted in regard to losses seems to indicate one of those Federal victories which all the world considers Federal defeats.

Another and most significant circumstance is, that General Morgan captured the whole of General Rosecrans' transport train, which is in itself a decided victory, and is not modified by the report that he "is said to have lost heavily in men and material in skirmishes with the Federals." With enormous losses admitted, with the entire loss of the transport train, we should not be surprised to hear that the army of General Rosecrans has been completely dispersed and disorganized; but we must wait a few days before we can receive any reliable intelligence as to the bloody battles in Tennessee, of the 31st of December and following days. Possibly the capture of the transport train may refer to the ammunition and subsistent trains in charge of General McCook.

The reported defeat of General Morgan, at Rolling Fork, Kentucky, is not accompanied by any details, and is most probably one of the "rumoured victories" with which the Federal Government endeavours to console the Northern people for crushing disasters.

The Federals have made another attempt to capture Vicksburg. On the 27th, 28th, and 29th of December four attacks made on that place were repulsed with heavy loss to the Federals. The Confederates captured 100 prisoners. According to the latest accounts, the fighting was still going on. The New York papers said that Vicksburg would fall before the 1st of January, and, as usual, were false prophets.

Amongst other items of war news we may mention that General Grant has "changed his base" by falling back to the north side of Tallahatchie River; that the Confederates have repulsed an attack upon Davis's Mills, Mississippi; that the Confederates held the road between Columbus and Jackson; that the Federals evacuated New Madrid on the 28th of December, after destroying the magazine and barracks; and that General Morgan has destroyed a portion of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, and captured Elizabeth Town, with 600 Federals. The Federals have taken Port Hudson, an undefended place of 300 inhabitants, about twenty-five miles above Baton Rouge. General Herron is reported to have captured Van Buren, Arkansas, on the 28th of December, and to have taken 100 prisoners, and "a quantity of war material."

General Stuart has again made the circuit of the Army of the Potomac. On the 27th of December he appeared before Dumfries, drove out the Federal garrison, made some captures, obtained some useful information from the War Department at Washington by means of a telegraphic operator whom he had with him (there is something immensely droll in the way in which Federal generals and officials are outwitted); having eluded the enemy, who promised faithfully to cut him off, he paid a few other visits, and then recrossed the Rappahannock safely, and rejoined the Confederate army. This exploit of General Stuart's has much annoyed the Lincolnites, as it shows the inefficiency of the Federal army and the spirit and determination of the Confederates.

Mr. Seymour was inaugurated as Governor of New York on the 1st of January. In his address, which we elsewhere reproduce, he said that he should support the Constitution of the United States, the Constitution of New York, enforce the laws, and maintain and defend the sovereignty and jurisdiction of the State. His Message to the Legislature was to be delivered on the 6th instant. If we may judge by his first act, he will not altogether disappoint those who looked to him as a defender of the Constitution. He has ordered a trial of the New York Police Commissioners and Superintendent Kennedy for permitting the use of the New York police stations for the illegal detention of citizens.

General Banks has replaced General Butler at New Orleans, and has suspended all sales of property on account of the United States. Butler, in his parting address to his army, congratulates his "brave comrades on their privations, hardships, dangers, victories, successes, military and civil;" the victories he refers to being the ill-usage of women and children, murder and theft. He reminds them that, "landing with a military chest containing but $75, from the hoards of a rebel Government you have given your country's Treasury nearly half a million of dollars;" but he does not refer to his soldiers' plunder, or give an account of the fortune that he has scraped together by the agency of his brother. He further says, "By your practical philanthropy you have now the confidence of the 'oppressed race,' and the slave." The expression "practical philanthropy" being a delicate way of stating that the Federal soldiers have taken the negro women for their mistresses and clothed them with garments stolen from the ladies of New Orleans. Amongst other achievements claimed by General Butler, he says, "I have demonstrated that the pestilence can be kept from your borders." If he had been in New Orleans during an unhealthy season, he would have found it difficult to conquer the yellow fever by his brutal rule. It is rumoured that General Butler will have a command in the field, or succeed Mr. Stanton. We are prepared for any act of degradation on the part of the Lincoln Government. A correspondent of the New York World thus refers to Butler's doings in New Orleans:—

New Orleans, Dec. 19, 1862.

Our streets and shops, and houses are almost entirely deserted. Every one has got away that could, by fair or foul means, and the military have had possession of everything. They have not, I regret to say, been scrupulous in regard to right. Dwellings have been sacked, stores have been broken open, plantations seized, negroes accounted as soldiers, women driven into the streets, men shut up in prisons, property confiscated and sold, pockets rifled, and grave offences sanctioned as military necessities—all in the name of liberty and union; while the grand genius of all this work and his satellites and confederates stood by, like another Nero, gluttoned with savage self-complacency, smiling on the ruin crumbling around us.

The Alabama captured the steamer Ariel, of the California line, on her outward passage, on the 9th inst., with Captain Sartori, Major Garland, and 160 marines of the Federal navy, and $9500 in currency and specie. In consideration of the many women and children among the passengers, Captain Semmes released the vessel after three days, instead of destroying her. He took ransom bonds for $228,000, payable one month after the recognition of the Confederacy. The private property of the passengers was spared. The Federal officers and marines were paroled. The passengers speak in warm terms of commendation of the gentlemanly conduct of the captors, of which some account will be found in a letter published in another part of our impression.

The Florida (Oreto) has left Mobile fully armed.

The rates of marine insurance at New York have advanced 2 per cent., and as the 300 war ships of the United States are not able to capture the Alabama, the New York Chamber of Commerce has been abusing this country, and has adopted the following resolutions:—

Whereas, On the 21st day of October last a statement emanating from Captain Hogan, of the ship Brilliant, recently burnt at sea by the captain and crew of the steamer Alabama, was produced in this Chamber, and a series of resolutions were unanimously adopted, the object of which was to warn the merchants of Great Britain in a friendly spirit of the evil consequences likely to ensue from a repetition of such piratical acts as the fitting out in ports of Great Britain of other vessels like the Alabama, destined to plunder and destroy our commerce on the high seas; and

Whereas, This Chamber is led to believe that other vessels have sailed from ports of Great Britain, or are about to sail, for the express purpose of destroying American ships in distant parts of the world, and in answer of Earl Russell to the Council of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce is found the following passage, to wit:—"Sir, I am directed by Earl Russell to reply to your letters of the sixth instant, respecting the destruction by the Confederate steamship Alabama, of British property embarked in American vessels, and burned by that steamer. Earl Russell desires me to say to you that British property on board a vessel belonging to one of the belligerents must be subject to all the risks and contingencies of war, so far as the capture of the vessel is concerned. The owner of any British property, not being contraband of war, on board a Federal vessel captured and destroyed by a Confederate vessel of war, may claim in a Confederate Prize Court compensation." And

Whereas, Action on the part of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, so far as is at present known, has been limited to a reference of the proceedings of this Chamber to their Council, and on the part of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for trade, to her Majesty's Government, as set forth in the communications from Mr. Tinson and Mr. Tennent, Secretaries of their honourable bodies; and

Whereas, Since the month of October last, it has come to the knowledge of this Chamber that the Laurette, T.B. Wales, and other ships have been captured and burned by the Alabama, and that in the first-named a considerable portion of the cargo was on British accounts, and certified to be such, and under the hand and seal of a British Consul; and

Whereas, There is no evidence before this Chamber to show that, in the absence of a recognized Government of which to demand redress, the British Government has issued orders to the naval commanders of her Britannic Majesty's ships of war to hunt down and destroy the Alabama as an offender against the property and honour of Great Britain, as well as an offender against the rights and interests of humanity; and

Whereas, It is alleged that the Alabama is continually supplied from Great Britain with coal and ammunition, by means of which she is enabled to continue her piratical course against American commerce, the consequence being to raise the premium of insurance on American vessels and their cargoes, and to depress the rates of freight in American ships, and to transfer our carrying trade to vessels of other nations, this Chamber is led to the following conclusions:—

First, That through the active instrumentality of the subjects of Great Britain, the so-called Confederate States are furnished with ships, men, arms, and ammunition, with which to war upon the United States:

Second, That without such foreign aid the States in revolt against the Government of the United States would be powerless to effect any injury to American commerce on the high seas.

Third, That this war upon American commerce, carried on by ships built and manned in Great Britain, is not rebuked by the British press generally; is not discouraged by the public sentiment of a once friendly nation, claiming to be governed by high and honourable principles, and is not effectively and thoroughly arrested by the strong will and stronger arm of the British Government:

Fourth, That, as a result of the foregoing facts and conclusions, the merchants of the United States are subjected in a certain degree to the evils that would attend a state of war with Great Britain, and are compelled to witness the carrying trade of their country transferred from their own vessels to British bottoms under all the sanctions and advantages of peace and neutrality to the latter, while the source of this great peril, threatening to drive American commerce from the ocean, is of British origin; now, therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of ten be appointed to take into consideration the foregoing, and to report at a special meeting to be called for the purpose, what action it becomes this Chamber to adopt in the premises.

May we suggest that the English press should be placed under the surveillance of Mr. Stanton, as that gentleman seems likely to lose his place in the Lincoln Cabinet? At present, we assure the Chamber of Commerce that there is no means in England of muzzling the press and forcing it to rebuke the gallant Alabama, or to prevent it rebuking Federal barbarity.

There was a report in Washington, on the 3rd of January, that General Burnside had resigned, and that General Hooker had been appointed to succeed him.

At a meeting of the Democratic Association in New York, the then forthcoming Emancipation Proclamation of the President was denounced as subversive of the Constitution, and a direct provocation of servile war. Resolutions were unanimously passed, requesting New Jersey to take the lead in an endeavour to arrest the war, by inviting the loyal States to meet in a National Convention at Louisville, Kentucky, in February next.

On the 2nd of January, gold in New York was 3½ premium.

In the frauds on the Federal Government, now being investigated, not only contractors, but officers of rank in the army, are said to be compromised. One colonel is reported to have swindled the Government to the extent of $100,000.

ENGLAND.

Pauperism is still decreasing in Lancashire. Since the middle of November there has been observable a progressive amendment: first, a reduction in the rate at which the number of paupers increased; then a contest between the flood and ebb tide, resulting in the steady diminution. The following is the Poor-law Report for this week on the condition of the twenty-one suffering unions:—

(a). Two unions have more:—		Paupers.
Chorley	210	210
Warrington	50	50
Total	260	260
(b). Two unions are in respect of the amount of pauperism the same as in the previous week—Liverpool, Wigan.
(c). Seventeen unions have less:—
Paupers.		Paupers.
Ashton-under-Lyne	1,510	Oldham	540
Blackburn	2,080	Preston	740
Bolton	110	Rochdale	60
Burnley	620	Saddleworth	70
Bury	270	Salford	210
Chorlton	240	Stockport	90
Glossop	30	Toadmorden	30
Haslingden	840	Total	7,570
Macclesfield	40
Manchester	90
NET DECREASE IN THE PAUPERISM OF THE WHOLE DISTRICT.
Second week of December, 1862	4,320
Third ditto	2,580
Fourth ditto	1,050
First week of January, 1863	7,310

These figures do not accurately represent the increase of employment, or the relief of suffering. In many unions a mere transfer of names from the books of the Poor-law officers to those of the Relief Committee presents the semblance, at first sight, of an actual diminution of distress. About 260,000 persons are receiving aid from the unions, of whom a large number are also relieved by the Relief Committee. The Times has contrived to get curiously mystified on this subject, and its figures are never very reliable; but the fact remains that there may be a diminution of pauperism without any improvement of the state of the people, and without any numerical increase on the muster-rolls of the committees, simply by an undertaking on the part of the latter to relieve wholly a certain number of those whom formerly they relieved in part only. Take such a case as that of Blackburn. There were, say, 24,000 receivers of relief, of whom, perhaps, 16,000 were aided from both sources, and 4000 by each separately. There has been a division of labour—the guardians take 10,000, the committee 14,000. This would produce a decrease of 10,000 paupers, and yet an actual decrease also of no less than 6000 in the number assisted by the Relief Committee. This kind of arrangement has had something to do with the recorded reduction of pauperism. On the other hand, there is one kind of amelioration of the state of trade and the condition of the people which tells but little on the reports of the unions. The first effect of an improvement of trade is to allow those masters who were working three or four days a week to work full time; their hands never were paupers, and therefore this improvement in their condition produces no sensible effect on the poor-law returns. On the whole, we are inclined to believe that there has been in many places a real amendment; short time has been exchanged for full time, and some silent mills have been re-opened. To what extent the latter has been the case we shall only learn when we are informed how many persons are now working who were a month ago receiving relief: that is, what is the diminution in the aggregate number of paupers and dependents on the relief committees. It is certain that the improvement must be slow and very partial, because there will not be cotton enough to set a majority of the people at work, and because what there is will not be freely used so long as a possibility exists that the American crop may be released. Nothing but peace between the North and South, or war between England and the North—nothing but the interruption of the blockade—can restore prosperity to Lancashire.

The Mansion-house Committee received last week £47,000, and distributed about £11,000. The Central Relief Committee also received about £47,000, and granted nearly £9000. The latter body has now a balance of £386,000. Inquiries have been made from several quarters as to the necessity of further collections for the present. The committee are of opinion that, although they have funds in hand to last for three months or more, yet as there is no prospect of any immediate termination of the distress, and as at least half the people must be out of work during the whole of the present year, should the American war so long continue, there ought to be no relaxation in the efforts of the charitably disposed. Mr. Farnall read his usual weekly report:—

My Lords and Gentlemen,—I beg to inform you that on the 3rd inst. there was a decrease in the number of persons receiving parochial relief in the twenty-seven unions of the cotton manufacturing districts, as compared with the number so relieved in the previous week, of 7360. This decrease of 7360 is explained as follows:—There is a decrease at Ashton-under-Lyne of 1506, at Barton-upon-Irwell of 13, at Blackburn of 2079, at Burnley of 913, at Bolton of 183, at Bury of 62, at Clitheroe of 60, at Garstang of 4, at Glossop of 26, a Haslingden of 843, at Lancaster of 3, at Leigh of 18, at Macclesfield of 41, at Manchester of 95, at Oldham of 573, at Preston of 742, at Prestwich of 6, at Rochdale of 58, at Saddleworth of 70, at Salford of 212, at Stockport of 87, at Todmorden of 91; making a total decrease of 7685. But there is an increase at Chorley of 206, at The Fylde of 64, at Warrington of 51, and at Wigan of 4; making a total increase of 325, so that there is a net decrease of 7360. On the 3rd inst. there were 253,146 persons in the receipt of parochial relief; in the corresponding week of last year there were 65,406 persons so relieved; there is, therefore, an increase of 187,740. The percentage of pauperism on the population of these Unions is 12·8; in the corresponding week of last year it was 3·3. The expenditure in outdoor relief for the week ended the 3rd inst. was £17,082 1s. 8d.; in the corresponding week of last year it was £3262 18s. 8d.; there is, therefore, an increase of £13,819 5s. The average amount of outdoor relief per head per week, both in money and in kind, on the 3rd inst., was 1s. 5d.; in the corresponding week of last year it was 1s. 2½d. The maximum number of paupers which I have hitherto reported to you was attained by the twenty-seven unions adverted to in the week ended the 6th ult., when there were 271,983 persons in the receipt of parochial relief; since then there has been a weekly decrease of pauperism. On the 3rd inst. there were 253,146 persons so relieved; a decrease, therefore, of 18,837 paupers has taken place, and I am enabled to state that this decrease is mainly attributable to the employment of some of the workpeople, but at the same time I am informed that until the supply and the price of cotton and the relative value of manufactured goods are more positively established than they are at present, even the partial employment of the mill hands must remain in a very precarious position. For the week ended the 6th ult., the expenditure in outdoor relief in these twenty-seven unions was £18,728 8s.; but the expenditure in outdoor relief on the 3rd inst. was £17,082 1s. 8d.; there is, therefore, a decrease in the last week's expenditure of £1646 6s. 4d. In accordance with the arrangements made at your last meeting, I have written to each of the medical officers of the above unions to ascertain the extent to which typhus fever prevails in their respective districts, and I shall be in a position to report to you on this subject on Monday next. On Friday last I attended a meeting of the Chorlton Board of Guardians, by previous arrangement, when I brought under their consideration the complaint of the Messrs. Birley that the Chorlton Board of Guardians in fixing the amount for parochial relief to be afforded to the workpeople of the Messrs. Birley, took into account the amount of aid which the Messrs. Birley gave them. I have now to report to you that I have received the assurance of the Guardians, through their chairman, that they have not adopted this course, but that, on the contrary, they have relieved each of those cases on its own merits, to the best of their judgment, and irrespectively of the aid extended to them by the Messrs. Birley.

From every quarter comes testimony to the same effect—that we can only hope for a scanty and insufficient relief from India, and that the misery of Lancashire—the semi-starvation of her labourers, and the gradual ruin of her capitalists—must go on until it shall please the American belligerents to make peace, or the European Powers to do it for them. Nothing but the cotton crop of the Confederate States can avail, within the next five years, to restore our cotton trade; and in five years that trade will be past the possibility of restoration.

The Members for Halifax addressed their constituents on Tuesday. Sir C. Wood defended the American policy of the Government, and expressed a qualified and not very confident belief in an increased supply of cotton from India. The more any one knows about Indian cotton, the less does he trust in it. The public at large is apt to imagine that the substitution of Surat for Orleans is only a question of time; the Indian Secretary thinks we may probably get more Surat than heretofore, but is doubtful; Mr. Laing, late Finance Minister in India, is very discouraging; and the manufacturers and merchants persevere in an obstinate disbelief. Mr. Stansfeld, after the manner of the man, complained gently of everything and everybody. He mourned over the collapse of Reform; rebuked the Emperor of the French for not withdrawing from Rome; and expressed himself much disappointed at the moral insensibility displayed by the English people in regard to the American quarrel. Everybody seemed, he said, to sympathize with the South, and to have forgotten all they had learned from Mrs. Stowe and Lord Shaftesbury about the wrongs of the negro. Mr. Stansfeld is much liked and respected by his constituents; and his speech, therefore, was received with more gravity than could have been expected.

Mr. Kinglake, M.P. for Bridgewater, addressed a meeting in that town on Monday evening. He reviewed the session in general, and his own conduct in particular, and seemed well satisfied with both. He inveighed furiously against the conduct of France in Mexico, and rejoiced that she was left alone "to carry out her base intentions." He thought that England ought not to recognize the Confederate States, until they were in possession of the whole of the territory which they claimed, and ought not to attempt mediation unless she had the goodwill of both belligerent Powers. If his views are to be carried out, neither recognition nor mediation will be possible while the war lasts. The Power which holds the sea can always hold New Orleans; and the Northern States will never cease to abuse and menace England in a way which, as Mr. Kinglake truly says, would have brought about a suspension of diplomatic relations with any other Power.

A county meeting in Worcestershire, assembled to consider the best means of raising funds for the relief of Lancashire distress, gave an opportunity to several gentlemen to speak out freely on the subject of intervention and the war in America. Sir E. Lechmere "regretted that there was no prospect of a termination of the war." The Earl of Coventry expressed a doubt whether the policy of our Government had been a wise or an enlightened one. How much misery might have been spared, how many lives might have been saved, had the proposal of the Emperor of the French been accepted, and a joint mediation offered. The Earl of Dudley referred to the existence of slavery in the Confederate States as a reason why we should not accord them our sympathy, and apparently as an objection to recognition. Mr. Lygon very properly retorted that we had never pretended to call in question the existence of slavery in the late United States, and he could see no reason why we should now cast it in the teeth of the Southern portion of the Union. He thought that the time had come when we were bound to face the question fairly, and that it was our duty to recognize the new Confederacy. Sir John Pakington (Lord Derby's First Lord of the Admiralty) spoke with more caution. He avoided to commit himself on the American question, and confined his observations to the condition of Lancashire, expressing his strong conviction that no change in the circumstances of the Lancashire cotton weavers had taken place which could justify any relaxation of public efforts on their behalf. This was not a case in which the sufferers ought to be left to the pittance to be drawn from the Poor Law. Those who administered the Poor Law had to act in the interest of those who paid as well as of those who received, and if that proposition was generally true it was especially so with regard to Lancashire, where the shopkeeper and the manufacturer were just now less able than at any former period to contribute their share to it. But who, he would ask, were the men that they were to relieve either by means of the poor rate or by charity? They had been living in prosperity, in independence, he might say, in affluence, drawing their 25s. to 30s. a week wages, and it was a cruel consideration that now, by no fault of their own, they had been thrown on charity for subsistence. Little less than half-a-million of money remained in the hands of the Central Committee. But, though this sum appeared large, they must remember that the expenditure was going on at the rate of nearly £40,000 a week. It was clear, therefore, that the fund in hand, large as it was, unless augmented, would only last a limited number of weeks. Sir John next alluded to the prospects for 1863, as laid before the last meeting of the Central Committee, from which he drew the conclusion that it was necessary the funds should be most carefully husbanded. England had well performed her duty, and it must be most gratifying to the men of Lancashire to see what sympathy had been expressed for them by all classes of their fellow-countrymen, and he trusted that as long as this calamity continued so long would that sympathy be shown to them.

The East Kent election has resulted in the defeat, by a very small majority, of the Conservative candidate. Though due entirely to mismanagement, the loss is severely felt by the party, as the seat was one on which they had securely counted. It is thirty years since a Liberal has been returned for East Kent.

A letter from Gibraltar, received in Liverpool, informs us that, even under the guns of that fortress, the Yankees cannot be persuaded to abstain from the most outrageous insults to the British flag. The Sumter has been sold to a British merchant, disarmed, repainted, and christened the Gibraltar. Having obtained leave from the captain of the port to try her engines in the bay, she was followed about by the Federal steamer Chippewa, with her guns shotted and her men at quarters, until she returned to her anchorage. The Chippewa has since been joined by the Tuscarora, and both vessels are on the watch for the Gibraltar, to attack her if she should leave the port. Of course, they have no more right to do this than to sink the Dover and Calais packet in the Straits, and if they should attempt it, it will be at the peril of having to try conclusions with a British man-of-war. The Yankees pretend that the Sumter was a prize, and so cannot be sold in a British port without an infringement of the Queen's proclamation. This is not true; and if it were true, would not give them the right to touch her, or invalidate the sale. The Queen's proclamation is a purely municipal regulation, and gives no rights to any foreign Power.

The Economist points out that we cannot hope to escape this year, a deficit due chiefly to the progress of distress and want in Lancashire. The revenue for the three quarters of the financial year which have already expired, exceeds, it is true, that of the corresponding quarters of the year 1861; but in that year there was an exceptional deficiency, and notwithstanding the increase in the present year, it is still evident that the result will fall far short of Mr. Gladstone's estimate. Some of the items deserve attention. There is an excess over the estimates in Customs of £650,000, in stamps of £151,000, and in assessed taxes of £408,000; showing that business has, on the whole, been fully as brisk as the Chancellor anticipated, and that the imports have exceeded his calculation. On the other hand, in the Excise, which shows more than anything else the condition of the labouring classes, there is a deficiency of no less than a million and a quarter—or at the rate of more than £1,650,000 a year; the income-tax is short by £900,000; the Post-office by £42,000; and, as not unfrequently happens to Mr. Gladstone, the miscellaneous revenue is short by a quarter of a million. We may expect a total deficit of £1,600,000, even if the expenditure have not exceeded the estimates.

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—The great event of the week is the Emperor's speech at the opening of the Legislative Chambers. His Majesty informed the Deputies that he saw no occasion to remand them prematurely to their constituencies, congratulated them on the progress which France had made in prosperity at home and prestige abroad, and expressed, in conclusion, a hope that the country would continue to give him a Chamber composed of men willing loyally to accept the Empire, and to forego the indulgence of traditional prejudices and party antagonism. He considers himself, in fact, as the rightful ruler of France, and the representative, in his sovereign capacity, of the French people, whose full confidence he believes himself to enjoy; the Deputies are returned to assist at the ceremonies, and render some subordinate aid in the work of government. The Emperor governs, instead of reigning only; and this being the case, he can hardly tolerate the existence of an organized Opposition, whose hostility, being necessarily directed against himself, rather than against his Ministers, assumes the form of open disaffection. Moreover, he knows that the Liberals are all not merely hostile to himself, but pledged to schemes, more or less vague, for the overthrow of his dynasty, and the substitution, under a King or a Republic, of real Parliamentary government, for which he justly holds France to be entirely disqualified. Hence his objection to the presence in the Chambers of men who, under an English system of government, would be their brightest ornaments. The two most significant paragraphs of the speech referred to Italy and to America. On the former point he spoke guardedly:—

Our arms have defended the independence of Italy without assisting revolution, without changing beyond the field of battle the good relations with our adversaries of a day, without abandoning our Holy Father, whom our honour and our past engagements oblige us to sustain.

Courteous to Austria—resolved to sustain the Pope—what must be the Emperor's feelings towards the Government of Turin? Alas! poor Italy. Concerning America, the speech was a little more explicit:—

The indirect revenues constantly increase from the simple fact of the increase of general prosperity, and the situation of the empire would be flourishing if the American war had not dried up one of the most fertile sources of our industry. The forced stagnation of work has caused in several places a misery the alleviation of which demands all our solicitude, and a credit will be asked from you to assist those who support with resignation the effects of a misfortune the cessation of which does not depend upon us. However, I have endeavoured to promote on the other side of the Atlantic counsels inspired by a sincere sympathy, but the great Maritime Powers not feeling themselves in a position to join with me, I have had to defer to a more convenient epoch the offer of mediation which had for its object to stop the effusion of blood and to prevent the exhaustion of a country the future of which could not be indifferent to us.

This is a sufficient answer to the repeated assertions of certain Ministerial and Americanizing journals, that the Emperor has repented his offer of mediation, and is determined to abide by the policy of England. If Lord Russell is willing to starve his countrymen in order to gratify the vindictive ferocity of the North, Napoleon III. is less complaisant and cosmopolitan. For the sake of Europe, even more than for that of America, the sooner mediation is offered, or recognition recorded, the better.

We regret to see that a third warning, placing the paper altogether at the mercy of the Minister of the Interior, has been administered to the Courier de Dimanche, for a very clever but very malicious article on the electoral system, and the influence exercised by officials, from the pen of M. Prevost-Paradol. The irony of the writer was no doubt tolerably provoking; but Ministers should have thick skins, and there is some danger in sitting on the safety-valve, even when the escape of steam becomes disagreeable. We do not believe that brilliant satire can hurt the Imperial Government; but severe repression may do so.

GERMANY.—The King of Prussia remains firm in his adherence to the policy of reaction. In his reply to the New Year's address of the Municipality of Berlin, he said:—

The present position of affairs in Prussia, which has been styled a conflict, has arisen from the confusion prevailing in the public mind.

I intend to maintain and protect the Constitution. I am compelled to carry out by every means within the limits of the Constitution that which I consider essential to the welfare of the country, without regarding the fact of my being at present misunderstood.

It is the duty of all loyal citizens, and especially of municipal councils, to propagate sound views amongst the people.

His Majesty's Ministers seem bent on distracting the attention of the people by a foreign quarrel. It appears that the dispute with Austria has received a new embitterment. A Frankfort journal says that the Minister of Prussia, at Vienna, read to Count Rechberg, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, a very angry despatch, in which Austria was violently reproached, and Prussia threatened to secede from the Confederation, unless she were allowed the military and political leadership in Germany. Count Rechberg asked for a copy, which was refused. On seeing this statement, M. Von Bismark-Schönhausen lost his temper, and sent a communiqué to a Berlin paper, denouncing the Austrian Minister for a breach of confidence, giving his own version of the contents of the despatch in question, and declaring that the statement published in the Frankfort journal must have come from Count Rechberg himself. Of course, it may just as well have been supplied by some unreliable clerk in the Berlin Foreign-office, or in the Embassy at Vienna. But the communiqué is decidedly an insult to the Austrian Cabinet, and it is hardly probable that it will be allowed to pass without notice. Prussia has her own reasons for quarrelling with Austria at this juncture. She has always been intriguing to constitute Germany a closer Federation, excluding Austria on the plea that her non-German territories form so much the most important portion of her empire as to constitute her, in fact, a non-German Power. In such a Federation the lead of Prussia would be undisputed; and for that very reason it seems certain that the other German Courts will never agree to it. Again, the proposal of Austria to enter the Zollverein, and the treaty between Prussia and France, which the minor States of that commercial union are not disposed to ratify, are thought likely to bring about a reconstruction of the arrangements, admitting Austria, and leaving Prussia "out in the cold." Altogether, the latter Power feels that Austria has thwarted her intrigues and gained influence at her expense; and is sore accordingly.

ITALY.—A proposal has been made, apparently in serious earnest, to transfer the Italian capital from the Northern to the Southern provinces. Turin is about as unsuitable a locality as could be chosen; and it is thought by some that the transfer of the Court and seat of Government to Naples might confirm the wavering loyalty of the people, and further the restoration of order in the Southern provinces. The following petition has been circulated for signature in Naples:—

Considering that on the good order and strong organization, as well as civil as military, of these Southern provinces depends in a very great measure the success of the Italian enterprise, and that from the prolongation of the present wretched state of things immense danger may arise for Italy:

Considering that the men and systems hitherto employed in the Government of these provinces have made a sad failure, so much so, indeed, as to make their condition much worse, and to increase the disaffection to the Government:

Considering that the solution of the Roman question, so impatiently expected by all Italy, but especially so by these provinces, may be delayed yet much longer, and that the residence in Turin of the Government and the Italian Parliament is among the principal causes of the grave evils, as well moral as material, of which this part of Italy complains:

Considering that the transference elsewhere of the Government and the Italian Parliament could be productive of no danger or inconvenience to the other provinces of Italy, while their removal to Naples until Rome be free would be an immense benefit to these provinces, the general and profound discontent of which would cease immediately:

The undersigned express the fervid wish that the Italian Government, as well as the Italian Parliament, should transfer their seat as speedily as possible to Naples until the arrival of the great day in which Italy shall have Rome for its permanent capital.

That great day is, we fear, so far off that the question of changing the seat of Government must ere long be seriously entertained.

GREECE.—The Times' correspondent reports that the Greeks still insist on having Prince Alfred for their King, and are by no means disposed to put up with a substitute. They do not consider the proposed cession of the Ionian Islands by any means a sufficient compensation for the refusal, and still cherish hopes that the three Powers may be brought to consent to their wishes. We cannot but fear that great mischief has been done by the long delay in declaring the ineligibility of the Prince. His name has been made the symbol of union and order; his reign has been expected as the best and easiest solution of the many problems that perplex the politicians of Greece; and now the announcement that he cannot be their King has thrown them back into confusion, distrust, and faction. No one knows what will be the issue. The name of a Prince of the House of Orleans has been mentioned; and if the jealousy of the Emperor of the French would allow of such a choice, it might, perhaps, prove eventually better for Greece than the acceptance of the throne by a Prince so young and untried as him on whom the Greeks have hitherto set their hopes. But we fear that the House of Orleans is out of the question.

An address, thanking the English Government for the projected cession of the Ionian Islands to Greece, has been abandoned, as opposed to the wishes of the principal merchants of Corfu.

On Sunday morning last, at about four o'clock, the schooner Retribution, of 1500 tons, John B. Parker, master and owner of the cargo, came into our port. At daylight she hoisted the rebel flag of the Southern States. The authorities, we understand, at once sent the harbour-master on board with the request that the flag be lowered and not again hoisted. The schooner belongs to Charleston, S.C., and is ten days from Wilmington, N.C., with the large complement of fifteen men. She has a cargo of about one hundred bales of cotton, four hundred barrels of spirits of turpentine, and one hundred barrels of rosin, with three guns in the hold! Under what particular form the cargo has been allowed to be landed, we are not prepared to say; certain it has been landed, and will be sold at public auction. Her consignee is Mr. C. W. White. We are told that in consequence of the want of a power of attorney from the owner, no sale of the vessel can be made.—The St. Thomas Tidende, 10th December.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Jan. 14, 1863.

During the past week our cotton market has witnessed considerable fluctuations in value.

Our last report closed on a quiet market with Fair Dhollerahs at 18d.

The three following days the trade bought sparingly. Speculators held aloof, and with a business of 3000 to 4000 bales daily, $\frac{1}{2}$ d. decline was established. Some uneasiness was felt regarding the next American news and many holders became anxious to realize before the arrival of the next steamers from the States.

On Monday the "Scotia's" news were to hand, and their purport had the tendency of further disquieting timid holders. It appeared that a Democrat meeting had been held at New York, when the Hon. James Brook proposed a convention of commissioners from both loyal and disloyal States to meet at Louisville, for consideration of their present difficulties, whilst President Lincoln was to be petitioned to grant an armistice. Although such proposals as these are evidently impracticable and would not, for a moment, be entertained by the Government, yet they served to increase the uneasiness that previously existed here; at the same time it was believed by some that Lincoln would adopt a fresh policy on the 1st of January, and on Seymour making a bold stand on assuming power, he might be so influenced as to adopt a moderate—and what might become—a pacific policy.

Our market accordingly on Monday and Tuesday was very much depressed, and the sales were only 3,000 and 4,000 bales at a further decline. Fair Dhollerahs being done at 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The India accounts slightly counteracted the effects of the American news and imparted more tone to the Manchester market. Goods had advanced on receipt of latter news from Europe, 6d. to 9d. per piece. The Calcutta market at the close was reported excited, and as they had each mail to receive a further advance in the home markets, it was generally believed that this was but the first of a series of better accounts from the East.

This morning a great change has occurred in the position of our market. The "Etna" brings the President's proclamation of emancipation to the negroes in all rebellious States. Seymour in his inaugural address refers merely to his State duties, and expresses no intention of interfering with the present Government. In the West, some severe fighting had taken place without decisive result.

The careful consideration of this news had the effect of removing from men's minds the chance they had previously entertained of an early settlement. Our market opened very excited, and with sales of 20,000 bales, an advance of $\frac{3}{4}$ d. was freely paid, and the tone at the close is still very buoyant. We quote Middling Orleans 24 $\frac{1}{2}$. Fair Dhollerah and Omrawuttee 18 to 18 $\frac{1}{2}$, and Fair Broach 18 $\frac{1}{2}$.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, January 13, 1863.

Our market for yarn and cloth during the whole of last week has exhibited a great amount of tameness, even when compared with the quiet state of things prevailing the week previous, caused chiefly by the small amount of cotton sold from day to day in Liverpool.

Yarns for export have been almost entirely neglected, nevertheless holders maintain great firmness, and do not press for offers.

Yarns suitable for home trade manufacturers, suffered a decline on Friday of from $\frac{1}{4}$ d. to $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per lb. on the prices of Tuesday previous, but very little business was effected, even at that reduction, as the tone in Liverpool appeared to indicate a further weakness. Cloth has also been very quiet, especially qualities suitable for shipment, there being only a small demand from the home houses.

To-day, Tuesday, we have experienced a further depression of feeling, and altogether it has been one of the quietest market-days for some months past. All parties are anxiously waiting the arrival of the American steamer of the 3rd inst. with the President's Emancipation Proclamation.

Export yarns, although not enquired for, are firmly held; but home trade yarns have been sold at another $\frac{1}{4}$ d. to $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per lb. decline.

Telegrams received to-day from Calcutta and Bombay, with dates 26th and 27th ult. respectively, advising higher prices for cotton goods generally, have imparted great firmness to cloths suitable for those places.

FREDERICKSBURG.—The town of Fredericksburg, Va., having suddenly become a point on which public interest centres, we deem it appropriate to give a brief description of the place. It is pleasantly situated in a fertile valley, in Spotsylvania county, on the south side of the Rappahannock River, at the head of tide water, 65 miles north of Richmond and 110 miles above Chesapeake Bay. The population in 1860 was 5090. The town was named in honour of Prince Frederick, father of George III., and was established at an early period of the colonial era. It contains a court house, several Churches, an orphan asylum, three banks, several mills and foundries, three semi-weekly newspaper offices, &c. The Rappahannock affords valuable motive power, available at the falls above. A canal extending to a point forty miles west of the town affords means of transportation for the products of a rich farming country, and the Richmond, Fredericksburg, and Potomac Railroad connects the city with the State capital. Just beyond the limits of the city an unfinished monument, begun in 1833, marks the tomb of the mother of Washington, who died there in 1789.—The Charleston Courier.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

The following letters are addressed to a relative in London:—

RICMOND, Nov. 6, 1862.

My dear —,—We were all much gratified to receive your interesting letter, though it pained me much to hear that your health is not strong. I sometimes think I would give a great deal to be with you on the other side of the Atlantic, and away from the sad scenes by which we are entirely surrounded. We have been blessed with many victories, but the exultation of every one has been saddened by the irreparable loss of valued friends. R— is much separated from me. I have not seen him now for nearly four months. In one of the battles near Manassas his horse was wounded; he has escaped thus far without any scar to mark of the fearful conflict in which he has borne his part.

Surrounded as you are, my dear —, by all the luxuries of life, and under the protection of a powerful and peaceful Government, you can scarcely realize the feelings of inexpressible sadness which sometimes almost overwhelm us. We never despair of the final success of our cause, but we realize the fearful sacrifices by which we are purchasing our independence.

Your friends often inquire about you and express their deep interest in your welfare. I am sorry you have not heard oftener from home. Be assured you are never forgotten, and hereafter I hope the letters we send you may be more fortunate in reaching their destination. Send me your carte de visite. I would be delighted to see your face again, and the "counterfeit presentment" of a well-dressed man would be a novelty in our primitive Confederacy.

God bless you—may we meet again and in happier times.

CHARLESTON, S. C., November 14, 1862.

Dear Cousin,—It falls to my lot to acknowledge the receipt of your letter by Aunt C—, written just before your departure for the Highlands of Scotland—the only one she has received from you since that brought by the Nashville some months ago.

I am here in this city, having been granted a furlough by the authorities at Richmond, owing to a severe spell of illness which I incurred while in Maryland with the army. I was quite ill at Frederick, and barely managed to escape, my comrades being taken prisoners. I have, by great good fortune, escaped injury thus far; though at Manassas, No. 2, I expected one of the many thousand bullets which whistled past my ear would have hit me.

I am still in the ranks. I stood an examination in Richmond some weeks ago; my papers were satisfactory, but my age (20 years), proved an insurmountable barrier to advancement. I am perfectly contented, however, and will serve in that capacity to the end of the war, patiently awaiting something to "turn up."

Aunt C— has had a great many applications for boarding, among whom are the families of Captain P—, and General R—, together with hosts of refugees; but, as she says, the trouble would be too great for her, and she wishes to live in quiet, she has refused them all categorically. Her house, however, is always open to sick soldiers, and she has taken care of a great many. One, a very estimable young man, who was picked up at her door in a fainting condition, and who would not go to have his case treated until too late, died there in September. She has also, in a great measure, supported several of our Norfolk relatives. Dear Aunt C— has such a big heart that she never wearies in her acts of generosity.

Your friend W. B.'s system has been terribly shattered by the campaign through which he served as a private. Though an officer before, through some unintelligible cause he refused the same post (that of 1st lieutenant) when it was unanimously tendered him. He will probably now accept of some lighter duty should his strength return, being totally unfitted to undergo the hardships of a common soldier. Poor Mrs. M— has suffered terribly; her son John, a major of infantry, being killed at Manassas; James so badly wounded as to be still in a critical condition, and George wounded, but not dangerously. Mrs. M— always inquires after you when I go to her house.

Your cousin J. N— has met with a great misfortune. He was captain of a company of heavy artillery stationed at Drury's Bluff, and while drilling his command was attacked by a stroke of paralysis, which for some time disabled his right arm and leg, and painfully affected his mind. Since then his mind has become sound again, and he has recovered the use of his arm and leg, but his hand seems to bid defiance to all remedies. He resigned last week upon his surgeon's telling him that continued service would expose him to a second attack, the consequences of which would be much more serious than the preceding. Being compelled to resign has rendered him quite gloomy, and he is no longer the J. N— of old.

Never in the course of time has there been more patriotism displayed than there now is by the young men of our army. Though suffering deeply from the change from affluence to the hardships of camp, and those of no ordinary description, each and every one labours and fights uncomplainingly and undismayed—resolved that should the Confederacy be subdued, he will fall with it. Every mind is calmly determined that such shall be the case, though we anticipate no such contingency.

While in Winchester, I took the opportunity of visiting Mr. Mason's home, if home it can now be called. I have never seen such venom as the Yankees displayed in the demolition of that house and grounds. The scene presented the strongest exhibition of rancorous hate that could be conceived of.

I hope your trip has proved beneficial to you. As I write in great haste, and under some restrictions, my letter is necessarily condensed, and I only wish I had the opportunity to write more fully.

Extracts from letters lately received from New Orleans.

Dec. 8, 1862.

General Banks has just arrived from the North with a large number of troops; we hear he is to supersede Butler. We trust the exchange will be a beneficial one. It could not be much worse under any circumstances. If I were to attempt to describe the atrocities which have been committed here, you in England would not give them credence. Ladies and infants turned out of their houses, everything of value stolen, packed up, and sent North by men calling themselves officers of the United States army. No sex, no age is safe from insult, and wherever the United States' troops have entered into the country or interior of Louisiana, everything has been destroyed, houses burned, plate and jewels and all valuables stolen, and the women turned almost naked into the fields. In one instance they used a gentleman's library to set fire to his house!

Without European intervention the war will be prosecuted for years, and every day renders the contest more savage; I sincerely believe peace would take place twenty-four hours after it were insisted on by Europe.

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 17, 1862.

We find it most difficult to get on with the sale of the goods sent us, and have visited the grocers even of Fourth District and the Basin to try to sell them; but as we are confined to the city demand, it is slow work. None can trade in the country, except favourites of the military officers. The people are getting daily poorer, eating up what little they have; yet with all our poverty, Colonel Butler and his brother the general, by whose aid he acted, is said to have made since the occupation of this city, not less than $5,000,000. A clerk of Colonel Butler stated in the presence of a dozen gentlemen within a week, that Colonel Butler had made $2,500,000 since he had arrived at New Orleans. Can any man of any sense suppose that that amount of money could have been made by honest and honorable trade, in that time? We are now glad to have the pleasure of reporting that General Butler has been superseded by General Banks, who, we are informed, is a gentleman, and will not rob and steal.

By the papers we send you, you will see General Banks' first order is to suspend the sale of all property on account of the United States Government until further orders; that is well, as they are clearing out dwellings and houses daily, and selling everything at auction. All of Dameron's large stock of carpets were seized and sold this week, because he is living over the lake. It has been deemed crime enough to live within the Confederate lines to have your property seized and sold.

We expect to hear of some hard fighting soon in Mississippi.

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 19.

General Banks has commenced his work in the city by countermanding many of General Butler's orders, some of which you will observe in the papers we send you. He has stopped the sale of all private property confiscated and being sold on account of the United States; and has given up the house of Dr. Campbell, corner of St. Charles and Julia, which General Butler turned the doctor and his family out of and used himself; and has ordered all officers using private houses, that they must either pay all back rent and rent for the future, or leave the houses.

He has also liberated H. M. Wright, who was on Ship Island at hard labour; also Shortridge, who was on his way there, and several other persons who were in prison, some for attempting to run the blockade.

The papers say General Banks will hear all grievances. His course has been very conciliatory so far.

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 20.

We are very quiet here at present. It is reported that General Butler will leave here for Washington on Monday next, the 22nd, and that his brother, Colonel Butler, is under arrest.

You will observe an advertisement in the True Delta we send you, "House wanted by S. Holabird, quartermaster." He wants a furnished house, for which he will pay rent.

How different from the rule of General Butler. His order was, "Leave this house by 4 p.m. to-day, we want it." He took any house in town, and would not allow the owner to remove one cent's worth of property.

General Banks is living at the St. Charles' Hotel, and his officers take no man's property or house without paying rent, &c. We are all much pleased with the crumb of improvement in our condition.

At the date of our latest advices from Charleston, the 17th of December, a Governor for that State had not been elected.

The balloting commenced on the 16th of December. Two ballots for Governor were taken, with the following result:—

FIRST BALLOT.

Hon. M. L. Bonham	59
Hon. J. L. Manning	58
Hon. J. S. Preston	17
W. H. Trescott, Esq.	12
Scattering	21

None of the candidates having received a majority of the votes cast, there was consequently no election.

SECOND BALLOT.

Hon. M. L. Bonham	79
Hon. J. L. Manning	63
Hon. J. S. Preston	3
W. H. Trescott, Esq.	6
Scattering	7

No candidate having received a majority of the votes cast, there was no election.

The Hon. P. C. J. Weston, of Prince George Winyah, was elected Lieutenant-Governor.

A special despatch to the Mobile Register, from Okolona, Mississippi, the 12th of December, says:—"Colonel Bartram's scouts burned 1500 bales of cotton, near Corinth, belonging to Yankee speculators, this week. There has been no movement of the enemy in this direction."

THE ATTACK ON PLYMOUTH, NORTH CAROLINA.—The Raleigh Journal, of the 13th of December, says:—"A portion of the 17th Regiment North Carolina troops (Colonel Martin), two squadrons of the 63rd Regiment North Carolina troops (Colonel P. G. Evans' Partisan Rangers), commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel S. B. Evans, and a section of Captain A. D. Moore's Artillery (10th Regiment North Carolina troops), commanded by Captain Moore, the whole commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel John C. Lamb (17th Regiment), attacked the enemy near Plymouth, on Wednesday morning last, at 5 o'clock, drove them into the town, and, being fired upon from houses, the artillery battered them down. Our forces captured twenty-five Yankees and seventy-five negroes. Captain John M. Galloway, of the 63rd Regiment, from Rockingham County, was severely wounded while leading a charge. Three privates of Moore's battery, and three of the 17th Regiment, were wounded, though not severely. We lost none in killed. One gunboat was seriously damaged by our artillery. Some two-thirds of the town was burned, and was still burning.

A special despatch to the Mobile Advertiser and Register from Grenada, Mississippi, the 13th of December, says:—"The latest reliable intelligence places the Abolitionists at Water Valley, on the Yockanapatafina River, where they burned five houses. They impress all the stock and crops in their reach, and destroy the surplus. Generals Grant and McPherson's headquarters are at Oxford, Mississippi.

At last accounts General Forrest was operating on the Memphis and Clarksville Road, having destroyed a portion of the track over that road and burned the bridge over the Tennessee at Danville.

The Charleston papers of the 17th of December announce that another vessel from Nassau, with an assorted cargo and Government stores, has arrived safely at a Confederate port.

From Southern accounts we learn that not more than 3000 Confederate troops were engaged at Kuston, North Carolina, and that the General did not retire until he had once driven the enemy entirely from his position, and inflicted a heavy loss. The Federals shelled the town, killed many of the citizens, and destroyed several houses.

It is said that no more than one-tenth of Fredericksburg is seriously injured.

GENERAL MANCY GREGO, of South Carolina, who was killed at the battle of Fredericksburg, was in his 47th year. He was appointed a Major in the 12th Infantry, U. S. A., for the Mexican War, in March 1847, and retired on the disbanding of that regiment after the war. In all the elements of a good officer and commander, he exhibited marked aptitude and proficiency, and conciliated the admiring regards of all who enjoyed opportunities of observation. Candour, frankness, and earnestness were ever present and prevalent traits in his character and conduct. In the great issues between the North and South, as now prosecuted to the ordeal of battle, he was emphatically in earnest. In the debates and contest of 1850-52, he was an active and influential leader of the party urging and advocating secession, either with or without co-operation. He was then a delegate to the "Southern Congress," in Nashville. At the opening of this war, he commanded one of the first regiments organized, and was in active service when he was promoted a Brigadier. His services and performances in this grade will be recorded in the history of the war.

DEATH OF GENERAL COBB.—General Cobb's command bore a conspicuous part in the battle of Fredericksburg. General Cobb had posted his men in a field where they were concealed by a stone fence, while he stood behind a house awaiting the approach of the enemy; a shell passed through this house and struck General Cobb, shattering his right leg, from the effects of which he died in a short time. It is stated that Cobb's brigade encountered a force of the enemy four or five times their number, and slaughtered them terribly, waiting until the Federals approached within a short distance. They poured in a deadly volley, which broke their columns, and they refused to rally afterwards. On this field, we are told, the enemy left 1000 of their dead.

COLONEL JAMES D. NANCE, 3rd Regiment, South Carolina Volunteers, was severely wounded at the battle of Fredericksburg, in the right leg and instep of the left foot.

LIEUT. JAMES ARMSTRONG, jun., attached to General Maxey Gregg's brigade, was badly wounded in the leg at the late battle before Fredericksburg.

GENERAL LEE'S DESPATCHES.—The following despatches are published in the Richmond papers:—

To General S. Cooper,—At 9 o'clock on Saturday morning, the enemy attacked our right wing, and, as the fog lifted, the battle ran along the line from right to left until 6 p.m., the enemy being repulsed at all points—thanks be to God. As usual, we have to mourn the loss of many brave men. I expect the battle to be renewed to-morrow morning.

(Signed) R. E. LEE.

To General S. Cooper,—General Hampton reports that he entered Dumfries and captured twenty waggons with stores.

and 500 prisoners, all of which he brought to the Rappahannock. General Sigel is expected at Dumfries to-morrow.
(Signed) R. E. LEE.

ENGAGEMENT AT PORT HUDSON.—The Charleston Courier publishes the following:—

Port Hudson, December 14.

On the afternoon of the 12th inst., the Yankee gunboat Essex and a wooden boat, name unknown, anchored out of the range of the lower batteries. Captain McLain's company of cavalry crossed the river in the night, hired a negro to hail the Essex, which hail was promptly answered, and a small boat sent ashore, when the cavalry fired, killing one and wounding two. Last night, Captain Boone, with his company of light artillery, crossed the river and took possession opposite the wooden boat. At dawn they opened a brisk fire on her, which was answered by her and the Essex. The engagement lasted two hours, when the wooden boat retired behind the iron-clad boat for protection, and both proceeded down the river. The enemy fired in all 110 guns. Captain Boone fired twenty five, twenty of which took effect, some passing through the enemy's boat. The enemy's loss is not known. We had one private slightly wounded in the hand. The enemy were badly worsted and driven off. Captain Boone's company acted with great gallantry. The enemy's pickets extended as far up as Donaldsonville on the shore.

TEXAS NEWS.—The Houston Telegraph, of November 25th, says, that "at a skirmish at Bolivar's Point, two Federals were killed and five captured, and the latter brought to the city."

News from Niblett's Bluff, Louisiana, states:—"The gunboat Cotton had a fight yesterday with the Federal gunboats. After two hours' fighting, the Federals withdrew with apparently one boat badly damaged. Nobody hurt on our side. The enemy are cruising in and around Grand Lake."

BATTLE IN ARKANSAS.—General Hindman's Confederate forces recently attacked the enemy at Fayetteville, Arkansas, defeated them, and captured 400 prisoners.

CAPTAIN ED. WILLIS, of Savannah, a West Pointer, has been appointed Major of the 12th Georgia Regiment, of which he was for some time Acting Adjutant.

Foreign Correspondence.

PARIS, January 13.

The Emperor's speech on the opening of the last session of the present legislature has not, in any one point, fulfilled the expectations that were formed of it. It was expected to be very important, and to contain various precise indications as to the policy which in the opinion of the simple minded people the Emperor always makes up his mind to follow, years beforehand. The speech is not important, and it does not contain anything of the kind. At the same time if it does not contain anything that justifies the extravagant eulogies which the French semi-official papers think they are obliged to put forth, it is but fair to admit that it contains nothing that invites censure. His Majesty, your readers will have seen, begins by alluding to the rumours of a premature dissolution of the present Corps Legislatif, and states that it would have been ungrateful on his part to have done so—an avowal on the candour of which (not unmixed with a slight squeeze of the lemon of irony) the Emperor may be congratulated. For, indeed, it may be said that for subserviency and docility nullum inveniunt parem. After this commencement which, naturally enough, was immensely applauded by the assembled legislators, the Emperor proceeded to sketch, with a light and dexterous hand, all that had been accomplished since the present legislature was first elected, and I am bound to state that the retrospect contains not one word that could give offence to any of the most punctilious of the Foreign Powers. Fancy, for instance, what a statesman, of the stamp of say Mr. Seward or the renowned Cassius M. Clay, would have said had they had to recite events such as the Italian campaign, the defeat of Austria, the annexation of Nice and Savoy, the transformation of the navy, and the no less wondrous transformation of Paris! This retrospect, which might without injustice have been one continued piece of self-laudation, is written in singularly good taste, with an absence of what the French call le moi, that future writers of state papers cannot do better than imitate. The Corps Legislatif is congratulated on its share in the great deeds of the Empire.

The tone of the speech, on the whole, is pacific. The Empire continues to be la paix, as the Debats very judiciously remarks, the wars that have taken place in Italy and elsewhere, are set down as accidents not involving any departure from a general system of which peace is the foundation. Austria is not ungracefully alluded to as "notre adversaire d'un jour;" and if there is a suspicious phrase about sympathy with Serbia and Montenegro, there is also a reassuring sentence about the "rights of the Porte."

The paragraph on the American war is purely retrospective; but, at the same time, it is held to imply that His Majesty has not by any means abandoned his intention of tendering his mediation on the first favourable opportunity. On this point the speech could hardly be more explicit. For fuller particulars we must look to the speeches to be delivered in the Senate and Corps Legislatif, in the course of the debate on the address. It is not, however, thought impossible, that by the time that debate commences, that the French Government may have taken a final decision to preserve from utter ruin a country, of which, to use the Emperor's own words, France (and surely England is in the same case) cannot contemplate the future destinies with indifference.

A great many reports have been current respecting interviews between the Federal envoy here and the Emperor. The semi-official Observer, I see, has stated that the Emperor had assured Mr. Dayton that he had no intention of proposing an armistice—your weekly contemporary, I am able to assure you, has been imposed upon,—no declaration of the kind has been made by the Emperor; and, I may add, beyond the official new year's-day reception, there has been no interview between His Majesty and the American envoy. Moreover, the Imperial speech shows by its reference to the American war, that no statement of the kind could possibly have been made.

The first setting of the Chambers took place this afternoon, when the two "Blue-books" corresponding to your Secretaries reports laid before Congress simultaneously with the presidential message, were laid on the table. I have been unable to do more than take a hurried glance at them. In the general resumé of the Ministry of Foreign affairs, the paragraph which relates to the United States is guarded in the extreme; after briefly describing the refusal by Russia and England to join in the tender of mediation, the document proceeds to make the following important announcement:—

"Evidently there can be no occasion on our part to resume alone the initiation of a project, which, according to our primitive idea, should have been carried out with the concurrence of our allies, but we have taken care to make it known at Washington that we were quite ready if any wish was expressed to that effect, to facilitate either alone or in conjunction with any other Power, and in whatever form might be suggested to us the work of peace in which it had been our wish to associate Russia and Great Britain."

The general news of the week is neither remarkable for its importance nor from its interest. The Archbishopric of Paris has been conferred upon M. Darboy, Bishop of Nancy, a downright anti-ultramontane, hitherto known chiefly by his having written (some few years back) a most eloquent protest against the bigotry, superstitious idolatry, and rabid intolerance of M. Veuillot and churchmen of his school. The appointment is likely to be popular everywhere save among the Church. The numerous good things which Cardinal Morlot combined with his archiepiscopal emoluments (in themselves a miserable pittance, only £800 or $4000 per annum,) are not to be the perquisite of his successor. The grand Almonership, together with the Cardinal's hat and the seat in the Senate are, it seems, to be bestowed on one of the offshoots of the Imperial family—the Abbé Bonaparte—of whom little is known save that he is a young man, and is a son of the Prince de Camille.

The Italian imbroglio appears to be enjoying a brief period of repose; and however partial they may be to Italy, the public are, in truth, not sorry to let it rest for a period. To all appearance, the relations are anything but friendly. The Tuilleries frown at the Palais Royal, and the Palais Royal turns its back on the Tuilleries. The Pope waxes affectionate and sentimental in his New Year's address to veterans of the Crimea and Solferino—congratulates them in all sincerity on the "glorious duty" they are fulfilling at Rome—is affected to tears at the idea of his "little godson;" sneers at Italy, as "I know not what kingdom;"—the whole of which finds a place in the front page of the Moniteur. The Italian minister puts up with wonderful equanimity with the rebuff, and the public, in a state of bewilderment, mentally exclaim, like the man in the play—"Ah ca! Messieurs, qui trompe-t-on ici?"

Whether the liberals or the clericals labour under a misconception as to the real way the wind blows respecting themselves, one class there is that cannot indulge in any illusion as to the views respecting them in high quarters—I mean the press. Since I last addressed you, two remarkable avertissements have been launched by M. de Persigny—the first, on the 5th, was given to the Opinion du Midi, a paper published in the pleasant town of Nîmes. M. Augier's celebrated anti-clerical piece, Le Fils de Giboyer, had been announced for performance there: whereupon, the Bishop of Nîmes Vicar-General penned a letter denouncing the Government for allowing such a piece to be performed, denounced the manager who got it up, the actors that performed it, the author who wrote it, and the spectators that went to see it, and published the letter in the Opinion de Midi. Telegrams were thereupon interchanged between Nîmes and Paris. The Prefect hesitated to give an avertissement to a bishop's coadjutor, but M. de Persigny, to do him justice, knows no scruples of the kind. He immediately ordered the avertissement to issue. The second warning was to the Courier du Dimanche for an able and amusing article of M. Prevost Paradol on "Universal Suffrage." This avertissement has done M. Paradol not the slightest harm, but en revanche, has done a good deal to the Government, whom M. de Persigny's excessive zeal leads the public to look on as bent into reducing to silence, or driving into exile, the only political writers the brilliancy of whose talents the effectual extinguisher has been wholly unable to affect.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S PROCLAMATION.

WASHINGTON, Thursday, Jan. 1, 1863.

By the President of the United States of America—a Proclamation.

Whereas, on the twenty-second day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, a Proclamation was issued by the President of the United States containing among other things, the following, to wit:

That on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty three, all persons held as slaves within any State or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall there be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforth, and for ever free; and the Executive Government of the United States, including the Military and Naval authority thereof will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons, and will do no act or acts to repress such persons or any of them in any effort they may make for their actual freedom. That the Executive will, on the first day of January aforesaid, by Proclamation, designate the States and parts of States, if any, in which the people therein respectively, shall then be in rebellion against the United States, and the fact that any State or the people thereof, shall on that day be in good faith represented in the Congress of the United States by Members chosen thereto at elections wherein a majority of the qualified voters of such States shall have participated, shall in the absence of strong countervailing testimony, be deemed conclusive evidence that such State and the people thereof, are not then in rebellion against the United States.

Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, by virtue of the power in me vested, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, in time of actual armed rebellion against the authority and Government of the United States, and as a fit and necessary war measure for suppressing said rebellion, do, on this first day of January, in the year of our Lord One thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and in accordance with my purpose so to do, publicly proclaimed for the full period of one hundred days from the day of the first above-mentioned order, and designate as the States and parts of States wherein the people thereof respectively are this day in rebellion against the United States, the following, to wit:—

ARKANSAS, TEXAS, LOUISIANA—except the parishes of St. Bernard, Picquemin, Jefferson, St. John, St. Charles, St. James, Ascension Assumption, Terre Bonne, Lafourche, St. Mary, St. Martin, and Orleans, including the City of New Orleans—MISSISSIPPI, ALABAMA, FLORIDA, GEORGIA, SOUTH CAROLINA, NORTH CAROLINA, and VIRGINIA—except the forty-eight counties designated as West Virginia, and also the counties of Berkeley, Accomac, Northampton, Elizabeth City, York, Princess Ann and Norfolk, including the cities of Norfolk and Portsmouth, and which excepted parts are for the present left precisely as if this proclamation were not issued.

And, by virtue of the power, and for the purpose aforesaid, I do hereby declare that all persons held as slaves within said designated States and parts of States are, and henceforward, shall be free, and that the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authorities thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of said persons.

And I hereby enjoin upon the people so declared to be free, to abstain from all violence, unless in necessary self-defence, and I recommend to them that in all cases, when allowed, they labour faithfully for reasonable wages.

And I further declare and make known that such persons of suitable condition will be received into the armed service of the United States, to garrison forts, positions, stations, and other places, and to man vessels of all sorts in said service.

And, upon this—sincerely believed to be an act of justice, warranted by the Constitution—upon military necessity—I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favour of Almighty God.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this 1st day of January, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and of the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-seven.

(Signed) ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President, Wm. H. Seward, Secretary of State.

GOVERNOR SEYMOUR'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

(From the New York Times.)

I have solemnly sworn to support the Constitution of the United States with all its grants, restrictions, and guarantees, and I shall support it.

I have also sworn to support the Constitution of the State of New York, with all its powers and rights, and I shall uphold it.

I have sworn to support the duties of the office of Governor of the United States, and with your aid they shall be faithfully performed.

These constitutions and laws are meant for the guidance of our official conduct, and for your protection and welfare.

The first law recorded for my observance is that declaring that "it shall be the duty of the Governor to maintain and defend the sovereignty and jurisdiction of the State."

The next strict injunction on the Constitution is, that Governor shall take care that the laws "are faithfully executed," and so help me God, they shall be.

He would not dwell, on the present occasion, on our National affairs.

Our position as a State has been happily alluded to by my predecessor. My views on the subject will be laid before the Legislature. While knowing that his position gave him but little control over national affairs, he (Seymour) yet ventured to trust that before the end of his term of service the country would be again great, glorious, and united, as it once was.

PRESIDENT DAVIS IN MISSISSIPPI.—The Jackson Mississippian, of the 21st, announcing the arrival there of President Davis and Gen. Johnston, says :

We are happy to see the President in good health and spirits. His presence in the State which has honoured and loved him so long at this critical juncture will be worth almost as much as "an army with banners." Everybody seemed to be reinvigorated and better contented, when it was ascertained that the President had arrived. We augur much good to the cause to grow out of his visiting and encouraging the troops, and overlooking personally our various defences. With his keen and quick soldierly tact he can tell at a glance what is needed to save us from the devastation of the Northern vandals; and we doubt not that new life and vigour and a more heroic and determined spirit will mark the conduct of the soldiers wherever he goes.

A Committee of the House of Representatives visited the President this morning to invite him to address the Legislature. His reply was, that he had come to work, not to speak; but that he would do in Mississippi what he would not anywhere else. He would meet the Legislature either publicly or privately, advise with the members in secret session, or deliver an address in the Hall to the people. He left for an important point yesterday evening, but will return in a day or two, when he will comply with the invitation of the Legislature and the universal wish of the people.

"The reception of the President among his old friends and neighbours was, of course, most cordial; and notwithstanding the vast responsibility, which would weigh heavily upon any other man, yet he met his friends with the same pleasant warmth and courteous, unassuming candor of former and less eventful times.

[] FRAUDS ON THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.

The New York Tribune publishes the following respecting the frauds on the Government :—

The outbreak of this rebellion was so sudden and unexpected, and its first developments were so startling, that the nation was taken by surprise, and for a moment was unable to provide for the calamity which seemed impending. But the attack upon Sumpter acted as a galvanic shock, and we awoke to a sense of our danger. In answer to the President's call for troops, offers of regiments and companies poured in from all quarters. In a few weeks we had an army in the field, armed, equipped, clothed, and fed. All will recollect those first days of excitement in this city, when regiment after regiment was sent away, when recruiting officers swarmed in the streets, and from week's end to week's end there was nothing heard but martial music, and nothing seen but marching battalions. One day the capital was said to be in danger; another the route to Washington was closed; a third the rebels were preparing to raise an army in Maryland. The most fervent appeals were made by the Executive, the Ministers, and the press, for troops to be rushed to Washington without an instant's delay. All was hurry and confusion here. Citizens gave of their means with splendid liberality; corporations and societies vied with each other in contributions to individual regiments; and, finally, at the monster meeting in Union-square, the Union Defence Committee was organized. It was a time of great national peril and distress, and we were willing to lavish any amount of money and make any personal sacrifices for the national good. This was the opportunity for rogues and thieves to reap their golden harvest; it was a time for them to assume the cloak of patriotism and perpetrate enormous frauds. Foreigners whose career had been infamous at home foisted themselves off upon us as able soldiers and honest patriots, and won the confidence of our best men by specious pretensions. We had no time to scrutinize their antecedents; we were only too glad to think that they were what they seemed to be, for we needed the help of every man we could find. The Union Defence Committee contributed funds toward the organization and equipment of thirty or forty regiments, in some cases defraying the whole course of subsistence, clothing, arms, and equipment of officers and men. They could not do otherwise, for at that time there was no fund in the hands of the officers of either Staff in the army out of which the expenses could be paid. Congress was not in session, so no Act could be passed to provide for the emergency. All the President could do was to make such assurances as he felt authorized to, that the fair and honest expenses of recruiting should be provided for as soon as Congress met. So recruiting officers paid their men who boarded and lodged their recruits partly in ready money and partly in promises. Friends of colonels and line officers advanced them sums, the general public subscribed for special or general purposes, and finally, as we above stated, the Union Defence Committee was organized. No matters went until some time in August 1861, when, Congress being then in session, an appropriation of $20,000 was made for the "recruiting, organization, and drilling of recruits." By the provisions of the Act of the Adjutant-General's department was made the custodian of this fund, and the mustering officers on duty in the different cities were made the disbursing officers. Colonel D. B. Sacket, Inspector-General of the United States' Army, was at that time on duty here as mustering officer, assisted by several other army officers, and on account of the rush of volunteers who answered the President's first call, they were overwhelmed with business. According to the Act of Congress making him disbursing officer, he hired a building in White-street, where he removed his entire business as mustering officer, and where he opened a disbursing-office, and employed several clerks to assist him. The first instalment which he received from the Government was $5000, which was exhausted, of course, in three or four days; for, as soon as it became known that the Government was prepared to pay the expenses of recruiting regiments, all those who had claims upon the Government for this purpose came down upon Colonel Sacket in a perfect swarm. He, however, received no more money for three or four weeks, and all that while the bills were accumulating in his office by scores, and the office was crowded with people clamorous for payment. Finally he received another check for $100,000, and late in November, 1861, he got a further instalment of about an equal amount. The investigation which has been made by the special Commissioner, Mr. Oleott, has been in reference to bills for subsistence and lodging of recruits, which comprise a specific statement of the number of lodgings and rations furnished, on separate accounts, beside an abstract giving the sum total, and these accounts are certified to by the officers recruiting the men, signed by the special contractor, and the bill should be endorsed as approved by the colonel commanding the regiment. In the haste and confusion which resulted upon the opening of the disbursing office by Colonel Sacket, in some cases the Colonel's name was omitted from these bills. Colonel Sacket, on assuming the duties of disbursing officer, addressed a letter to the Controller of the Treasury, asking him how far the mere certificate of the volunteer officers should be taken as a guarantee of the correctness of bills, and whether he should require an affidavit from the officer in each case or not, because it is notorious that on the organization of our volunteer regiments a large number of worthless scamps, who had taken to the military profession for want of something else, had crept in. To this letter Colonel Sacket received no reply, and was thus thrown upon his own judgment, and did as well as he could under the circumstances. In the recruiting service there are two kinds of contractors—the general contractor, who puts his bid in answer to the advertisement of the United States' official, and who is bound to furnish rations and lodgings at a certain specified rate to any extent which the Government may require, and whose bills are paid at regular intervals; he is obliged to give sureties for the performance of his duty. The other is the special contractor, who is the petty keeper of a larger beer-saloon or boarding-house about the city, and who has had a recruiting-office opened upon his premises, and has perhaps boarded a certain number of men, from half a dozen to fifty, who, from time to time, as they were recruited up to the number of a dozen or more, have been taken to camp, where they came under the care of the regimental quartermaster. As far as the general contractors are concerned they cannot perpetrate any fraud except by the connivance of the Government officials, but the special contractors have more latitude. If the recruiting officer happens to be a dishonest man, or even an easy-tempered honest man, who can be used by the special contractor, between the two the Government can be defrauded to any amount on the signature of the special contractor to false bills, backed by the certificate of the recruiting officer, and these signatures would in themselves be almost a sufficient guarantee to the disbursing officer as to the correctness of the account. When this pressure came upon the disbursing officer for the payment of bills, of course the special contractors rushed there, but, as much of the time there was no money, they would lose their time and patience, and finally be driven to take their claims to brokers. These brokers, at first, did their business in a fair way, sometimes requiring 10 or 15, and sometimes as high as 75 per cent. to cash the bills, the amount depending upon how they could handle the special contractors. The broker, being a man of capital, would advance the money and wait until the disbursing office was in receipt of funds from Washington, when he would present his bills at one time and get a cheque for the whole amount. The disbursing officer, to protect the Government as much as possible from fraud, not only required an affidavit from the special contractor in doubtful cases, but he employed a detective, whose business it was to go about the city, and when a bill was presented visit the man's place and satisfy himself by examination of the premises and by the statements of the contractor and of his neighbours whether the number of men charged for in his bill had been subsisted by him or not; and then this detective had to make a certificate and take it to the disbursing officer, who would usually cash the bill without further investigation. If the business had been conducted in a straightforward manner, there would have been no trouble about it, but it turned out otherwise. Lieutenant Colonel Nichols, U. S. A., relieving Colonel Seekat on the 11th of December, 1861, and during the latter part of his term of office, which lasted until the 9th of June, 1862, this brokerage business was in full blast, and it went on increasing until Midsummer, when Captain F. S. Land was placed in charge of the disbursing office, succeeding Lieutenant-Colonel Nichols. The brokers about this time had got to doing a very large business, and had their affairs organized so as to employ runners to go about the city to get all the fair bills they could, and also to make out false ones. They were not satisfied with the profits of shaving correct bills, but they began to resort to fraudulent ones. The clerks in their office would make out false bills, and the names of special contractors would be procured by various tricks and sometimes even forged, as also would be the names of the commanding officers. These runners would find an ignorant German lager-beer saloon-keeper, who could not read, speak, or write English, and ask him if he had not boarded recruits for such and such a regiment. He would reply that he had. They would then inquire the amount of his bill, which, perhaps, would be $37, and would offer to buy it for $25. The man, after haggling and bargaining would consent, and the next day they would bring him certain papers, and tell him that they were merely formal receipts, and on his signing them they would give him the $25. The papers would be folded in such a way that there would be only room for the contractor to sign his name at the bottom, and he would not be made acquainted with the nature of the document he was signing. Not content with swindling the Government, even in this infamous way, these runners would take the names at random and put them on the false bills as special contractors, forging their signatures, and sometimes the signatures of the colonels of the regiments, and the broker and the recruiting officer would divide the spoils after the claim was cashed. During the two months that the Commission has been engaged in this investigation, from thirty to forty forgeries have been discovered of this nature. There seem to have been two favourite classes of frauds. In one the special contractor is induced to sign blanks, which are afterwards filled up fraudulently, and the name of the colonel or recruiting officer is omitted or forged; and the other is where a contractor has a bill for a small amount—say, $200—and who, after having gone to the disbursing officer several times to collect it, without success, goes to a broker, who says the bill is not made out correctly, and takes it and tears it up, at the same time offering the contractor $50 for his claim. The contractor protests, but, as he has been to the disbursing office several times, and knows that he is in the broker's power, after haggling and bargaining, he accepts the proposition. The broker then tells him to come again at a subsequent time, and he will have the bill made out correctly. He comes again, and is shown one leaf of the bill, on which he sees a certain sum charged which is larger than the amount rightfully due; and on his asking why it is so he is told by the broker that he has one or two other little bills, the amounts of which he has put into this one. The contractor signs all the papers, which often contains claims for fifty times the amount of his just dues. Still another mode is where the recruiting officer brings blanks to the special contractor, but does not show him any part of the paper except the space where his name is to be signed. In a day or two afterwards he comes to him again, and tells the contractor he must go before a notary and swear to his bill. He goes before the notary, who, being in the pay of the swindlers, does not administer any oath or ask him any questions, but after the contractor signs his name, signs his also, and attaches his notarial seal, and the poor dupe is thus entrapped into signing an affidavit and a bill which is a fraud from beginning to end. There are cases where the Union Defence Committee have paid the regular price of 40 cents per ration to special contractors for their bills on vouchers given by the officers of the regiment, and the special contractor has been obliged to refund 5 cents, per ration to the colonel of the regiment, and 10 per cent. of his gross receipts to the quartermaster. In other cases the bills of special contractors have been swelled by the addition of extra rations, the proceeds of which would be divided by the recruiting officers. The Commission commenced to investigate the frauds perpetrated by certain suspected brokers, and after having disposed of their cases, the Secretary of War placed in his hands a bill which had been collected in Washington by the colonel of a regiment, who had made a sworn affidavit to its correctness. The bill was accompanied by a great number of sub-vouchers for rent of recruiting offices and subsistence and lodging furnished to recruits, and it was found, on examination, that out of the whole number only two names on the sub-vouchers were real, and those two had been forged; the other men had no existence whatever. The colonel of the regiment had perjured himself and committed forgery besides. This led to an investigation of the affairs of the regiment, and it was found that he had swindled the Union Defence Committee, individual citizens of this city, the general Government, and every one of his officers and soldiers, and that he had made out of the frauds probably $100,000; that he had turned officers of his regiment out of their place on frivolous pretexts, and sold their commissions; and that he had been engaged in a wholesale system of swindling of the meanest and lowest kind, fit scarcely for a third-rate pickpocket. The papers in this case have been placed in the hands of Judge-Advocate General Holt, and the man has probably been arrested and will be subjected to trial by court-martial. The developments in this case, when fully given to the public, will be among the richest and raciest ever made, and will show that the colonel has been a swindler for a number of years, and been guilty of all sorts of crimes, and that he was a regular Jeremy Diddler, and had succeeded in getting the endorsement of some of the best men in the city of New York. It is not proper for the interests of the Government that the names of these parties should be given to the public. The probability is that the affairs of other regiments recruited in this city which are to be investigated will yield results equally interesting. Within a week after this commission commenced its labours, it was ascertained that bills to the amount of many thousands of dollars, which had been all prepared ready to put through the disbursing office, were withdrawn and destroyed, and that one bill of $6,000, which had been so prepared, was withdrawn in this manner; thus saving the Government that sum. It is estimated that the Government has been swindled by these various means through the disbursing office in this city alone to the amount of $700,000, and this is a sample of what is going on throughout the United States. The frauds are in every department, and the probability is that the Government, has not paid one bill in fifty of any kind that has not been fraudulent in greater or less degree. The newspapers at the request of the Government have kept quiet about this Commission, and the public having been put in possession of none of the facts, knowing nothing of the tremendous system of frauds carried on, have supposed, when one man after another was arrested and imprisoned, that the Government was organizing a system of despotism without cause. The fact of the matter is that, instead of the Government having committed wrongs, it has not arrested one-twentieth part of the men implicated in these frauds, and all, or nearly all, those who have been in confinement have been released. There is no desire on the part of the Government or the Commission to cover up anything, and these facts are furnished at as early a period as it has been safe for the interests of the Government to do so. It is difficult to understand how many of the frauds upon the disbursing office in this city have been consummated so as to deceive the officers in charge. For instance, it must be well known to the merest tyro that there are less than two hundred men in a battery of artillery, and yet bills for more than double this number have been paid for some batteries. It would also seem the easiest thing in the world for the disbursing officer to ascertain through his regular detective, and by means of personal questioning of the special contractor, whether John Smith or William Brown, of a certain number, in a certain street, had the facilities to feed and lodge 100 men or only five, or whether Captain —'s company left the city with his regiment on the 1st of August or 30th of December; and yet bills in such cases have been paid over and over again without apparent question. Again, there might, it would seem, have been some correspondence between the disbursing officer here and the Adjutant-General's office in Washington, which would prevent thievish colonels and captains from recovering the amount in both offices. But all these things will doubtless be explained in due season."

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

Agency for the Continent: G. FOWLER, 279, Rue St. Honore, Paris.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 15, 1863.

The News of the Week.

Seldom, even in this eventful period of American history, has a steamer brought so solid a budget of news as was brought by the Etna on Tuesday last. We have the report of a great battle in the West, already going on for three days, with no decided result, as the Northern papers ominously state, except immense loss on both sides; a Proclamation by the President of the dismembered Republic, freeing all the slaves in those States and parts of States where his authority is laughed to scorn; an Inaugural Message by the newly-installed Chief Magistrate of the most powerful State in the fragmentary Union, vowing unflinching fidelity to a Constitution which has been rent and tattered by the higher powers until scarcely a semblance to the original remains. We have, also, within the week, a Proclamation by the President of the Confederate States, denouncing before God and man the instruments of the Federal authorities as felons, and decreeing for them the punishment of such. With all this wealth of news, there comes not a ray of light by which to read the near and yet still darkening future. All that is discernible, with any degree of clearness, is, that the attempt of subjugation will be as fiercely and as hopelessly as heretofore persisted in by one side, as resolutely and successfully resisted by the other; and that the war must go on—if not in one way, then in another; if not by campaigns, in Virginia, then by campaigns in the West; if not by campaigns, then by predatory incursions; if not by land, then by sea—until the seemingly untiring patience of the by-standers shall at last be exhausted.

On the result of the great battle in Tennessee it were premature now to speculate. Suffice it that the Northern accounts, the only ones we have, bear a close resemblance to all the first reports of Federal defeats from the same quarter, since the rout of Manassas down to the last known disaster at Fredericksburg. Had the battle, which ushered in the new year, been a Federal victory, we may fairly assume that every city of "the loyal States" would have blazed with bonfires before the steamer left for our shores, and no uncertain rumours would have been permitted to reach us. Nor would the reports insist, with such evil-boding repetition, upon the fearful loss and slaughter which appear to be the only incontestable feature of the battle. Unfortunately victories and defeats on this theatre of war have long ceased to possess any other than this tragic interest. To the final result they have contributed but little, and can contribute but little; and in the West they have been even less decisive than in the East. The defeat of the Confederates in a great pitched battle would surprise Europe, but it could scarcely give to their enemies more than the temporary possession of a few additional square miles of abandoned and devastated country, and no defeat that the Federals might sustain can be more disastrous than those they have already borne. Were it possible for either combatant to strike at the heart of the other, then battles might decide the contest; but since space and climate have to be conquered as well as armies in the field, the bodies of dead and dying men serve only to rear on higher the impassable barrier which separates the two peoples.

The only effect of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation will be to strip the contest of its last pretence of resemblance to civilized warfare. It will ensure the rigid construction and merciless execution of the retaliatory measure of the Confederate President, which had been in a degree anticipated and neutralized by the removal of the man against whom it was more especially directed. If there was a man in the Southern States who still thought that this war was one for political objects, he must now know that to him and to his countrymen it is a war for man's dearest possessions—wife, children, and home. Since the dark ages no war has been waged in which such stakes were involved in failure. If we could assume that the wicked scheme of Northern fanaticism was practicable and on the eve of execution, mankind would stand aghast at a spectacle of indescribable horror, to which neither Hayti nor the Sepoy massacres afford a faint parallel. The machinery of civil and municipal government by which one-third, in many districts over one-half, of a numerous population are ruled and accustomed to be ruled, would be broken at a single blow. Four millions of a heretofore quiet and industrious peasantry would rise in frantic fury against the hands that fed and clothed them. The fiercest instincts of a race, only a few generations removed from the lowest degree of savageness, would be goaded on to a fiendish banquet of torture and blood. Fortunately, and for the honour of humanity, these things can happen only in a few horrible exceptions. The bond by which in the Southern States the white man holds the negro to servitude, whatever may be the abstract opinions on its nature, is yet not that bondage of cruel force and individual tyranny which the ignorance or malignity of the Harriet Beecher Stowe school love to describe it. It is a bond into which, whatever be its imperfection, natural affections enter, and in which reciprocal duties are recognized and practised. It was appointed that the South should undergo this last fiery ordeal to vindicate her national fame from many foul slanders, as she has already vindicated herself from grievous others, and she has foreseen this ordeal, and is prepared to meet it with a calm reliance on the justice of Heaven.

The inaugural address of Governor Seymour, of New York, has disappointed expectations,—partly because the inaugural, a mere public oration, in which aught but generalities are out of place, has been very commonly confounded with the Message to the Legislature, in which the Chief Magistrate of the State makes his official recommendations and indicates his policy—and partly also because, in all probability, too much has been expected from the official action of the Democratic candidate. Neither he nor his party—did they wish it ever so fervently—have it in their power to offer to the people of the North the free choice between peace and war. Such an option was possible before the first blood was drawn; it is not now, when to stop or to go on are alike ruin, and the last gleam of hope is in the alternative to go on. Could the Governor of New York place his city and State where they were on the 17th of April, 1861, and then give them the option, no doubt that the vast majority would, with one accord, elect for peace. But it is often as difficult to interrupt a state of war, once become chronic, as to interrupt a state of peace; and for the same reason in each case—that it is necessary to divert the energies of a whole people into new channels. It is peculiarly so with the North. Its entire population finds employment, food, and wages through the war; its capital finds investment; its individual ambitions find a vent. With peace, a population four times as numerous as that now suffering in Lancashire, those who live by the army pay and those who live by providing the wants of the army, will be thrown out of employment. With peace comes the striking of the national balance-sheet, which converts the millions of imaginary treasure into fairies' gold. With peace disappears, in fact, the only commerce and the only industry which has thus far filled up the vast gap left by the loss of the South. There are some hideous diseases of the human body, for which amputation is the only cure, and that amputation is certain death. So it is with this swollen and swelling exerecence on the Northern body politic, into which all its saps of life have collected. Great Britain might make peace with her revolted colonies, great as was the loss of pride; she might have made peace with her mightiest adversary—the conqueror of our century—while in the height of his power; she might reasonably rejoice over peace with Russia, though the objects of the war were but partially accomplished. In all these cases, Great Britain might at any time make peace, because even the greatest of these wars was a far distant one, and in which but a scarcely appreciable proportion of her population and resources were actually and indissolubly engaged.

The war in America, it is true, cannot last for ever, even without foreign intervention; but so long as it lasts each interest that is involved in the war will make the most of it, and strive to prolong it. At this time there appears as yet no prospect of a termination, except through the recognition of the Southern States, the inevitable consequences of which act of bare justice we have pointed out in our last. Of this we perceive a gleam of hope in the speech of the powerful monarch who presides over the destinies of France, and whom friend and foe alike pronounce the greatest of living statesmen. This speech, not the least interesting event of the week, reviews the foreign policy of the Empire during the last six years, with a clearness and frankness which show the ruler's desire of educating his people in constitutional forms. As regards the attitude of France in the American war, the speech could hardly have been more explicit. It indicates the Emperor's conviction, that to England in this matter belongs, properly and naturally, the initiative; that the rejection by England of his repeated overtures has heretofore been the chief, almost the only, cause of his benignant intentions being defeated, but that he has not abandoned these intentions, nor remitted his efforts to make England share them. Whether in the last resort he is prepared to act without her concurrence, we could not expect to learn from a document of this nature, which, besides, is rather a review of the past, than a glance into the future; but in that past we have a sufficient guarantee that in any wise and just prospect of pacification the influence and moral weight of France will not be wanting.

Retribution.

One thing, we think, should have been borne in mind by those who have censured the proclamation in which the President of the Confederate States announces his intention to exact retribution for certain gross outrages committed against unarmed citizens in the places occupied or overrun by the Federal troops. For more than eighteen months the Confederates have endured, without once transgressing the laws of war, a series of systematic and habitual violations of those laws by the invaders of their country. However sorely provoked, they have never forgotten their civilization or sullied their honour by a single cruel, savage, or lawless action. On the field of battle they have never refused quarter to their enemies; and except on the field of battle they have never shed blood. They have always respected private property in the enemy's country; they have never committed any wanton violence, or perpetrated any needless devastation, during their raids into Pennsylvania, Southern Illinois, and the Unionist districts of Western Maryland. They have burned no houses; they have never insulted women; they have never plundered stores or dwellings; they have destroyed nothing but bridges, telegraphs, and railroads that formed the military communications of the enemy, and have appropriated nothing but the most legitimate spoil of war—the property of the hostile Government. They have done more; they have spared the dwellings, the goods, and even the persons of traitors. While the Federal soldiery is engaged in its work of rapine and destruction in Virginia and Tennessee, a few wretched citizens of those States—creatures as little worthy of the name of men as of the privileges of citizenship—are actually in the Federal camp or in the Northern States, stirring up the foes of their country to fresh efforts against her. By every law of the land, of nature, and of war, these men are liable to be hung if taken and to be treated as outlaws until they are taken. But the plea of a divided allegiance—of an imaginary loyalty due to the Union otherwise than through the State, and obligatory after the State has withdrawn from the Union—though it has no foundation in law or in conscience, and is a mere fiction of the Republicans, invented to serve their present necessities, has been allowed to save these men from the doom they have so richly merited. They have been permitted to desert to the enemy; and their property often appears the single oasis in the wilderness which Federal devastation has made around, respected by the invaders in consideration of the owner's treason, and by the Confederates out of reverence for law and obedience to orders. There is, indeed, a story, which has recently been concocted by General Butler, or his creatures in charge of the press at New Orleans, that seven citizens of that town, enlisted in the Federal service, were shot as traitors, when captured in a marauding expedition, by sentence of a Confederate court-martial; but we see not the least reason for believing the story. It is altogether at variance with probability, and with the notorious and invariable practice of the Confederates. It rests only on the authority of a journal which every one knows to be under the absolute control of General Butler, and therefore to be utterly undeserving of credit; and it is not corroborated by any sort of evidence. If the men alleged to have thus perished ever existed, ever enlisted, and ever were shot, we feel pretty sure that they were shot not as traitors, but as spies, deserters, or offenders in some other way against the military code. Of course, citizens of the State of Louisiana in arms against the State and the Confederacy to which it has linked its fortunes, are morally and legally traitors, and have justly deserved death; but the only effect of enforcing such a principle would be to give to the Federal Government a plausible pretext for murdering in cold blood the Confederates taken in the disputed States of Missouri and Kentucky, and to damage the Southern cause in the eyes of Europe. While a quasi-civil war continues, executions for merely civil treason cannot be held justifiable; unless in case of actual aid given to one party by a citizen living within the jurisdiction of the other; as if a citizen of Richmond were detected in correspondence with Washington, or a New Englander in conveying information to Richmond. If the execution reported by General Butler's retainer had taken place as alleged, it could hardly be defended. But we do not believe a word of the story; and we repeat that the invariable usage of the Confederates has been to respect the laws of civilized war—to shed no blood except on the field of battle, and to commit no havoc save what was imperatively required by strategic necessities.

Every one knows that the practice of the Northern armies has been the very reverse of all this. They have repeatedly and deliberately butchered prisoners or peaceable citizens in cold blood. They shot two men in Missouri in presence of their family, and on the door-step of their home. They hung some twenty peaceable citizens of Tennessee for no other crime than that of living near a place in which a Federal escort had been surprised, and the general whom it protected killed in the melee. They shot ten prisoners of war at Palmyra, with all the circumstance and ceremony that could be adduced to give to a deliberate murder the air of a military execution, because a Federal scout, who has since returned home, was missing for a few days. They have always burned and plundered without mercy wherever they have passed; their track is marked by burnt dwellings and devastated fields; they have robbed every house within their reach of everything worth carrying off, insulted and maltreated the inmates, and finally fired the place before they left. They have made a desert of Northern Virginia and of the district along the banks of the Mississippi. In a word, they have made war after the fashion of savages; descending even so low as to employ—according to the boast of one of their own organs—negro incendiaries to set fire to those Southern cities which defied assault and were willing to take their chance of bombardment. For all these crimes no retribution has yet been exacted; no retaliation has been inflicted on the Northern frontiers; none of the Federal banditti who have committed such ravages have been hanged or shot. It is only just that these facts should be recalled to mind, when we find President Davis censured for having at last deemed it necessary to threaten with condign punishment the most atrocious of all the criminals who disgrace the Northern service.

We cannot think that any Englishman—we are sure that no English gentleman—can wish that a wretch like Butler should escape the gallows. One journal, whose impartiality is almost as remarkable as its wit, recently expressed a doubt whether hanging were not to good for him, and suggested the additional discipline of the lash. If, therefore, any one really doubts the propriety of Mr. Davis's decision in regard to this arch-scooundrel, it must be not on any ground of sentiment or of mercy, but simply because he doubts the expediency of retaliation in any case whatever. For if ever a commander of an invading force deserved to be treated, not as a soldier, but as a felon and an outlaw, General Butler has earned such treatment. The crime for which he is sentenced to death is that of deliberate, wilful, and utterly unprovoked murder. When the Federal gunboats appeared before the Crescent City, and while the latter had not yet surrendered—certainly, while it was not yet in possession of the invaders—the Stars and Stripes were hoisted by some marines on a public building, and hauled down soon afterwards by an indignant crowd. Among that crowd was a respectable citizen, Mr. Mumford, who was afterwards hanged by order of General Butler, for the alleged crime of hauling down the flag. If this be not wilful murder, what is? President Davis demanded explanations from the Federal Government, through the military authorities on each side; and explanations were promised, but never given. After a considerable interval, being fully informed of the facts, and finding that the enemy has nothing to say—no excuse or palliation to offer—he issues his order that the assassin shall, whenever and wherever caught, be immediately hanged. Soon afterwards the murderer is withdrawn from the scene of his crimes, to another, and perhaps a safer, sphere of action. The proclamation is justified, therefore, so far as General Butler is concerned, both by its cause and its effect.

But the proclamation menaces with punishment not only the general, but the commissioned officers serving under him, who are, when captured, not like their chief to be hanged immediately, but to be held as robbers and criminals deserving death, and reserved for execution accordingly. Is this order justified? Clearly so, we think. It is not provoked simply by the murder of Mr. Mumford, but by a long series of infamous outrages committed against the men and women of New Orleans by General Butler's officers, under the auspices of their chief. These outrages are recapitulated by the President, and we believe that no one will read the list without being satisfied that it affords ample reason for treating the perpetrators of such atrocities not as soldiers, but as felons. We believe, that there is no Power on earth which, in the position of the Confederate Government, would treat the garrison of New Orleans, if captured, as prisoners of war. Notwithstanding the strictness of the military code, there can be no objection to the doctrine of the proclamation, that commissioned officers are answerable for crimes habitually committed by them under the orders of their chief. They have the power to retire from the service, rather than execute such orders; and if, being to that extent free agents, they choose to continue the officers of an army commanded by a Haynau, a Butler, or a Pope, they make themselves answerable for the acts in which they participate. In the present instance there can be no doubt that Butler's officers have lent themselves willingly to his tyranny, and robbed, oppressed, and maltreated the women and children of New Orleans as much for their own pleasure as for his. On what pretence, therefore, can it be urged that, if captured, they should be treated like gentlemen and soldiers, and not like the brigands they are?

A point apparently more doubtful, yet remains to be examined. Mr. Davis threatens that all the negroes taken in arms against the Confederacy shall be given up to the authorities of their respective States, to be dealt with according to the laws of those States; and that officers commanding negroes shall be treated in like manner. At this the Abolitionists are furious, of course; and as the justification of the menace is not, as in the former case, self-apparent, it is possible that some more reasonable men may be deluded by their reclamations. The simple truth is, that negro regiments mean servile war, and that servile war a series of Cawnpore massacres in every State wherein the Federals may succeed in kindling the flame of insurrection. Let us ask ourselves how the mutineers of Bengal were treated; and how, had the Russian war lasted till 1858, Russian officers found in command of Sepoys would have been treated—and we shall see that Mr. Davis has only threatened what we did, or should have done, in a parallel case. There are enemies whom you cannot treat as soldiers engaged in lawful warfare; and among such enemies are insurgent slaves and those who excite them to insurrection. It is not to be imagined, however, that a regiment of negroes would, when captured, be put to the sword. The officers would probably be hanged with as little ceremony as our Indian heroes showed towards the captured accomplices of Nana Sahib; a few of the men would likewise be hung as an example to the rest; the majority would simply return to the condition from which they were taken, and in which, till evil advisers came among them, they were happy. One other consideration deserves notice. It is not in the least likely that this clause of the proclamation will come into practical operation. Negro regiments cannot be raised, and white officers cannot be found to command them. In one or two cases negroes have been armed and have accompanied marauding expeditions from New Orleans; and this is the extent of the service they are likely to render to the Federal cause. They are not bad hands at stealing—though in that art the troops of General Butler need little assistance—but they have as little idea of fighting as the Pennsylvanian regiments that marched home from the battle-field of Manassas, to the sound of the Confederate cannon, before yet their comrades were engaged.

Nothing can be said, then, against the justice or propriety of reprisals in these particular instances. On the contrary, if ever there were a case in which retaliation was just and necessary, it is justified and imperatively required by the crimes perpetrated by Federal officers and sanctioned by the Federal Government. The only arguments that can be brought against the proclamation of President Davis are such as go to prove that all reprisals are useless and inexpedient. To such reasonings it is sufficient to answer that retaliation is the only method of enforcing the laws of war against an enemy who systematically disregards them; that though it may not be rashly resorted to on every provocation, no Government that respects its own honour and the lives of its subjects can refrain from exacting vengeance for wholesale and habitual murder and rapine on the part of an invader; and that every nation in turn has in extreme cases had resource to them. Even during the Crimean War, we believe, a Russian officer, convicted by a British court-martial of having given orders to bayonet the wounded, was shot at Scutari. If Butler ought not to be hanged, then was that man murdered. If his officers have not deserved the doom with which they are threatened, then England, in hanging and shooting the officers of Nana Sahib, committed a crime against humanity and civilization. Mr. Bright and

Mr. Peter Taylor, in their hearts, no doubt sympathize as cordially with the author of the Cawnpore massacre as with any other enemy of their country; but if they dare not publicly defend the Nana, they should, for very shame, cease to constitute themselves the apologists of General Butler, or of the Government which delights to do him honour.

The Recognition of the Republic of Texas.

In considering the question now most prominently before the British Government and people, it would be impossible to cite a historical precedent more in point, or to find a more complete analogy in the circumstances of the two cases, than is afforded by the recognition of the Republic of Texas. Excepting that of the Kingdom of Italy, the recognition of Texas is the most recent instance of the admission of an "insurgent Power" into the communion of nations; and by a singular chance that recognition was accorded to the feeble Republic by the same English Minister who now refuses it to her as the member of a powerful Confederation. The facts of the case are briefly these.

The vast unsettled region between the Rio Grande and the Sabine River—now the prosperous and flourishing State of Texas—was originally a part of the "Province of Louisiana" and with this province ceded, or rather sold, by the first Napoleon to the United States, under the Presidency of Mr. Jefferson; but was by the United States again ceded a few years later, in 1821, to Spain, as part payment for the territory of Florida. From that period until her appearance before the world as an independent nation, Texas followed the fortunes of Mexico. Settlers from the United States and from Europe were attracted by the invitation of the Spanish Government, repeated by that of Mexico, when Spain abandoned her pretensions to her former colonies. Emigrants now rapidly poured in, and in 1836 the whilom desert had already a population of nearly 150,000 souls, mostly Americans. But little sympathy could exist between a population so widely differing in race and language and that of the older settled States of the Mexican Federation, and although politically a part of that Federation, Texas was really a colony of the United States. The list of grievances was complete when, by one of those innumerable convulsions which still sweep over Mexico, the established forms of State Government were abolished to give place to a centralized rule, with military governorships. This was deemed by the people of Texas a wrong sufficiently great to justify secession from Mexico; and assembling in Convention, after the fashion of their American kinsmen, they declared themselves, on March 2, 1836, a free and independent nation. An attempt on the part of the Mexican Government to vindicate its authority resulted, in the same year, in the defeat at San Jacinto, in which the Mexican President and Commander was himself taken prisoner by the Texans. Mexico, however, did not relinquish the hope of bringing back the insurgents, but the distraction of her internal affairs delayed any vigorous renewal of her efforts. Meanwhile the young Republic spared no pains to obtain her recognition by the principal Powers. Envoys were despatched to Washington, London, and Paris, and on the 3rd of March, 1837, exactly a year and a day after the declaration of independence, Texas was recognized by the United States. The Envoy of Texas was admitted to official intercourse by the Governments of both France and England, and the former in 1839, the latter in 1840, entered into treaties of amity and commerce with the new nation. Three years later, after an existence of seven years as an independent Republic, governed by an elective President, Texas formed a treaty with the United States, by which, in 1843, she became one of those States. It was this "annexation," as it is termed, which, with the renewed attempts of Mexico to regain her lost possession, led to the war between this Republic and the United States, and it was not until after a protracted struggle, and the occupation of the capital by the American army, that Mexico finally renounced her pretensions in 1848, nor was it until that date that the boundaries of Texas were definitely and permanently fixed. In 1861 the Convention of Texas repealed the ordinance passed eighteen years before, by which the Republic had entered the American Union as a State, and a short time afterwards she entered, with due formality, into the newly formed Confederation, as a member of which she now a second time claims recognition.

The Annual Register for 1840 announces the acknowledgment of the Republic of Texas in the following suggestive words:—

TEXAS.—On the 16th of November a commercial treaty, between Great Britain and the Republic of Texas, was signed in London by Lord Palmerston and General James Hamilton, the Envoy from the Republic to England. By this treaty the independence of the infant State was recognized, and the basis of the commercial stipulations was perfect reciprocity. It was hoped that this would tend to bring about a reconciliation between Mexico and the Texans, and cause a settlement of the boundaries of the last-mentioned Republic, in which the former would acquiesce.

It will be observed from the preceding facts that not only were the causes and mode of the secession of Texas from the Mexican Federation similar to those of her second secession from the American Federation, but that her claims for recognition were as nearly as possible identical with those of the Confederate States at present. Mexico had signally failed in the attempt to conquer her, but had not abandoned its attempt, and stood ready to renew it at the first favourable opportunity. Her boundaries were not yet definitely ascertained; but as there could be no doubt that her independent Government was de facto established, it was rightly hoped that the recognition of this fact would be the speediest manner of adjusting such and other questions of dispute between the two countries, in which other nations had no concern except to tender their friendly offices as mediators. There was at the time the same talk now so commonly heard, that the recognition of the new Republic would lead to the re-opening of the African slave trade, and much more to the same effect, and Lord Palmerston is highly eulogized by the historian of Texas for "his act of patriotic firmness in the face of prejudice and clamour." But here the parallel ends. Texas, when recognized by England and France, was a weak and insignificant Power, scarcely entitled, historically or politically, to be styled a nation. The Confederate States are a great military and naval Power, which has already permanently secured for itself a distinctive and honourable place in history. Trade with Texas in 1840 could be of but infinitesimal value to the British realm. The trade with the Confederate States is one of the most important and valuable in the world. To recognize Texas was to consummate the dismemberment of the Mexican Republic and to aggrandize prospectively a Power whose too rapid increase might reasonably awaken alarm. The recognition of the Confederate States will be the permanent establishment of a balance of power in the New World, to the lasting benefit of both Europe and America, and the best interests of civilization. The recognition of Texas had not for its object to stop one of the most sanguinary wars of modern times; the recognition of the Confederate States will dry the source of untold miseries, snatch one of the most productive regions of the globe from devastation, and restore peace and plenty to two continents. There is such a parity in the circumstances of the two cases, and there is at the same time so enormous a preponderance of just and weighty motives in the latter, that it is difficult to understand how the same man can reason and act so differently in the two. A scarcely settled wilderness, which not a single adult inhabitant could claim as the land of his birth, where not a white settler's child had yet reached man's estate, is recognized in 1843 as an independent nation. In 1862 the title is withheld from a people of eight millions, of British race and speech, defending the homes and the graves of their ancestors, and making the world ring with their deeds of valour and heroic fortitude.

Within thirty years England has thrice recognized an independence achieved and maintained by foreign aid, despite the most solemn treaties of 1815. To-day, when no such treaties bind her, in opposition to every prompting of commercial or political foresight, she refuses to recognize the independence of a nation which, unaided and in the face of the most appalling disadvantages, has baffled the efforts of a million of armed men to subdue it. We are told that no precedents exist to warrant such recognition, and yet the Premier of the present Administration himself made the precedent when Secretary for Foreign Affairs only twenty years ago.

Statistics of Southern Trade.

EXPORTS AND IMPORTS.

The trade of a country is naturally divided into two classes—foreign and home—and these are again subdivided. The foreign trade embraces the exports and the imports, and the home trade consists in producing and preparing for export, in receiving and distributing the imports, and in producing and distributing the commodities that are consumed within the country. It is only by looking at these several sources of revenue, and combining them, that we are able to form an accurate estimate of national resources and wealth.

At first sight it may seem somewhat difficult to give statistics of Southern trade, from the way in which it has been incorporated with that of the other sections of the late Union. The returns of the exports and imports at Southern ports do not afford even proximate information as to the amount of the Southern foreign trade. As a proof of that the commerce of Southern ports has not increased with the development of the resources of the country, and the imports have borne no proportion to the exports. In 1820 the imports into Charleston were equal to one-half the exports, and a few years since the imports were not more than one-eighth the exports. The Southern trade has been carried on through the North, and therefore official returns, so far as they relate to the particular commerce of Southern ports, are valueless for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the trade of the South.

Yet it happens, fortunately, that the official returns of the United States are so full and complete that we can, with certainty and precision, distinguish the commerce of the two sections. They separate the articles exported, and certain leading articles of export are of almost Southern growth. We present the returns for the year ending June 30, 1859, because it was the last year undisturbed by the influence of political agitation and war; but if we had taken the year ending June 30, 1860, the exports of cotton would have been larger.

According to the Treasury report of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1859, the total exports of the United States were:—

Southern produce and manufacture of
United States	$335,894,385
Foreign exports	20,895,077
Total	$356,789,462

The following were Southern produce:—

Cotton	$161,424,023
Tobacco	21,074,038
Rice	2,207,148
Naval Stores	3,695,474
Sugar	196,735
Molasses	75,699
Hemp	9,279
Total	$188,693,296

To this must be added an amount for the exports of articles not exclusively Southern produce, including grain and manufactures; and if we estimate this at $12,000,000, we shall be underrating it. These amounts, together, are:—

Exports exclusively Southern produce, as per United States' returns	$188,693,296
Exports not exclusively of Southern origin, say	12,000,000
Total	$200,693,296

In the exports from United States we have included

Gold and Silver Coin	$24,172,442
Gold and Silver Bullion	33,329,863
Total	$57,502,305

In comparing the commerce of North and South, this ought, with an exception we shall afterwards notice, to be deducted from the exports; and doing so, we have the following results:—

Exports of United States, 1859:—

From the South	$200,693,296
" North	98,593,861
Total	$299,287,157

We have not yet arrived at a fair comparison between the two sections of the late Union. In the Northern returns we have included "Foreign exports," that is, the export of articles not the production or manufacture of the United States. But this is evidently merchandize in transit, and is no more to be considered United States' exports than would be a venture of a New York merchant of a cargo of cotton goods shipped in an American bottom from the Port of London to Hong Kong. Deducting, then, the amount of the foreign exports from those of the North, it leaves them $77,698,399. The only part of this calculation that can be impugned is the deduction of the bullion from the Northern exports, on the ground that it is to a great extent the production of California. We will, then, allow that the whole stock of gold and silver bullion exported, $33,329,863, is to be placed to the credit of the North. This makes the result :—

Southern Exports..	$200,693,296
Northern Exports..	111,028,262
Excess of Southern Exports	$89,665,034

In arriving at this result we have given the North the benefit of every possible doubt, and if we had not done so, we do not question that the Southern exports would have shown double those of the North. But accepting the above calculation, we must in the comparison remember the difference of population. In round numbers the North was nineteen millions, and the South twelve millions, including the slaves, or equal to three to two. Assuming the exports to be a measure of the productiveness, prosperity, and industry of a country, and taking the Southern exports as the basis, the exports of the North, considering its relative population, ought to have been—

The actual exports were	$301,039,944
The comparative deficiency	$190,011,682

Or, to put the fact in another form, the exports of the South in 1859 were equal to $16½ per head of the population, including the slaves, while the exports of the North did not exceed $6½ per head of the population.

Before giving the imports for 1859, it may be interesting to present a return of the leading exports of the United States for several years, including flour and provisions and manufactures which are mainly but not entirely Northern.

Year.	Cotton.	Tobacco.	Flour and Provisions.	Rice.	Naptha.	Total.
1790	$ 42,285	$ 4,349,567	$ 5,991,171	$ 1,753,769	$	$ 19,666,101
1803	7,920,000	6,209,000	15,050,000	2,455,000	2,000,000	42,205,961
1807	14,232,000	5,476,000	15,700,000	2,307,000	2,309,000	48,609,392
1816	24,106,000	12,809,100	20,587,376	2,378,880	2,331,000	64,781,896
1821	20,157,484	5,648,902	12,341,360	1,494,367	2,752,631	43,671,894
1831	31,724,682	4,892,488	12,424,701	2,016,267	5,686,690	59,218,583
1836	71,284,925	10,058,640	9,588,359	2,548,750	6,107,528	106,916,680
1842	47,593,464	9,540,755	16,902,876	1,907,387	7,102,101	91,709,242
1847	53,415,848	7,242,086	68,701,921	3,605,876	10,351,364	150,574,644
1851	112,815,317	9,219,251	21,946,651	2,170,997	20,136,967	178,620,138
1859	161,434,923	21,074,038	37,987,395	2,207,148	32,471,927	278,392,080

It will be perceived that the wonderful development of the cotton culture has not checked, much less diminished, the production of other articles of export. It may seem that rice has remained stationary, but it will be sufficient to remark that whilst in 1850 there was less exported, than in 1851—not quite $2,000,000—the value of the rice crop that year was, according to the census, $8,612,539. It is the same case with sugar, of which the production is considerable, but it is almost entirely consumed in the country.

The total value of the United States' exports for 1859, including foreign exports of bullion and coin, was $356,789,462, and the total imports for the same fiscal year were $338,768,130.

A large portion of the imports is necessarily sent South, but not a portion equal to the Southern exports, because Northern commissions, charges, and profits have to be deducted. What these charges amount to there is no official documents to prove, and we therefore do not attempt to give an estimate; but we will adduce a few statistics from the United States' returns, that plainly indicate to what extent the South was victimized by the fiscal policy of the North, and how that policy was detrimental to the interests of the commerce of Europe :—

The total value of imports free of duty in 1857	$ 79,768,130
The total value of imports paying duties ad valorem	259,047,014

The Southerners were not permitted to levy an excise or duty upon their cotton, tobacco, or rice, before it left their States, but before they could get manufactures for their produce, they had to pay heavy duties for the benefit of the national exchequer, and for the protection of Northern manufacturers. A division of the country was made to bear the fiscal burdens of the whole country, and at the same time to give, to the extent of the duties, a monopoly to the Northern manufacturers, by which they, the Southerners, were the pecuniary sufferers. The Morrill tariff was not a new scheme, but the development of an old system.

With regard to the profits of the North, we must not forget the item of freights. The imports of the United States in 1859 were thus divided :—

In American vessels	$216,123,428
In foreign vessels	122,614,702

With respect to the trade of this country with the United States, the subjoined returns give some useful information :—

In 1859, England
Imported from the United States	$174,945,853
Exported to	125,754,421
Excess of imports	$49,191,432

The Bank-Note Forgeries.

Of all promises to pay the Bank of England note has the widest currency. It is taken readily everywhere, and often commands a premium. The only limit to its circulation is the fear of forgery. Within the last twenty years that apprehension had died out in England. It is not long ago that in remote country districts it was quite impossible to get a Bank of England note changed. The people were not accustomed to any other notes than those of the local bank. Those notes they knew well, and treasured above silver and gold. The legal tender note they would not take. It might be good, but they could not tell, and a stranger would have to remain in pledge for his hotel bill, until his Bank of England note could be sent to the country town for change. Now Bank of England notes are driving the notes of private companies out of the field—the great extension of communication, the more frequent intercourse between the country and the town, the increase of banking facilities, have made the autographs of the Old Lady of Threadneedle street familiar in all parts of England. Forgery has been comparatively rare, and always easy of detection. However well the forged note might be engraved, a cursory examination of the paper upon which it was printed would detect the cheat. For nearly 150 years the paper for Bank of England notes has been made after a peculiar process, which no one has succeeded in imitating. It has been made all that time by one firm and on one spot. In 1720 Messrs. Portal and Co. made the paper for the Bank of England notes, at Laverstoke, in Hampshire; and in 1863 Portal and Co. are still making it at Laverstoke. During all these years, the forgery of bank notes has employed all the energy and ingenuity of clever scoundrels; but until the middle of the year 1861, so great was the care taken by the proprietors of these paper mills, that all attempts to abstract paper from them failed. The Bank of England note was making its way as well through Europe as England. The paper furnished so sure a means of detection, that Continental money-changers made no scruple about cashing the notes. In the month of August last, this confidence was rudely shaken. A bank-note, which had been the most convenient currency, suddenly became a security difficult to negotiate. No one even in England, would change a note without knowing well the person for whom he did it. Every man had to go to the Bank of England himself, and for a few weeks a large stock of gold became an absolute and inconvenient necessity. On the Continent the bank-note became almost useless. The moneychangers held aloof from the accursed thing. The cause of this little convulsion was the issue of an announcement by the Bank of England to the effect that forged notes were in circulation printed upon genuine paper, and offering a reward of fifteen hundred pounds for the discovery of the persons concerned in abstracting the paper from Messrs. Portal's mill. The Bank had been for some little time aware that paper had been stolen. In the working of the mills some deficiency of the paper has always been occasioned by tearing or carelessness, but in 1862 it increased so much that it led to an inquiry, and the result was the discovery that a very considerable quantity of the bank-note paper had been stolen from the mills. This alarming fact the proprietors communicated to the Bank, which awaited with some anxiety the presentation of the forged notes, for the preparation of which the paper was, of course, stolen, and as soon as one appeared it issued the notice to which we have referred.

The persons concerned in this robbery, and in the printing and circulation of the notes, were tried last week at the Old Bailey. The offer of the reward induced a youth, who had been the principal agent in the robbery, to come forward and give information, which led to the apprehension of the guilty parties, and of another person whom the jury has pronounced not guilty. In the spring of 1861 William Burnett and a young woman named Ellen Mills, who passed as his wife, were liberated upon a ticket of leave, some years of a sentence passed upon them for receiving stolen goods having been remitted. They seem to have at once betaken themselves to Whitechurch, in Hampshire, whether with a pre-conceived plan of attempting to steal bank-note paper does not clearly appear. The couple lodged at the house of a sister-in-law of Burnett, and there met Henry Brown, a young man of 21, employed on the mills. According to the statement of Brown, confirmed by that of Mills, the woman spoke to him about getting some paper from the mills, and ultimately succeeded in inducing him to take some. At first he took but a small quantity, his plan being to abstract it from the size-drying machine, which was attended by a girl at each end, but so placed that neither could see Brown take the paper from the place where he stood; his business there was to see that the machine did its work properly. He gave the paper so stolen to the woman, and Burnett afterwards asked him to get more; he did so. According to his own statement, a man named Brewer, employed in the mills as a mould-maker, discovered his dishonesty, and ultimately became a partner in the crime, stealing the paper in great quantities, and employing Brown to carry it to Burnett and his wife in London. The jury, however, by acquitting Brewer, have declared their disbelief of his statement, and it must, therefore, be assumed that Brewer had no hand in the robbery. What is certain is, that through the boy Brown, Burnett obtained a large quantity of paper, for which he gave Brown several small sums of money, who seems to have led a drunken, dissipated life on the same. The paper obtained, Burnett had, of course, to dispose of it to some persons connected with the parties engaged in forging and printing the notes; and here the prisoner Buncher, a butcher in Strutton-ground, Westminster, appears upon the scene. Buncher, it was proved at the trial, was an agent between the forger of the notes, and the persons disposed to utter them. He bought, apparently, the notes from the forgers, and sold them at a regular price to persons ready to incur the risk of passing them. Burnett found in him a ready customer for the paper, which Buncher, as soon as he possessed of, forwarded to a man named Griffiths, at Birmingham, who was captured by the police when actually at work printing notes. In the possession of Griffiths the police found several plates from which, by Griffiths' own avowal, all the forged notes in circulation during the last few years had been printed, and a quantity also of the genuine paper. Griffiths, as soon as he found that he was caught, made a clean breast of it, gave up to the officers some plates and paper which were hidden in a place which they would not have found. At the trial Griffiths and Burnett pleaded guilty; but Buncher and Brewer, also put upon their trial, denied their guilt. The principal evidence relative to the abstraction of the paper was that given by the accomplices, Brown and Mills, and that evidence, by their acquittal of Brewer, the jury must be taken to have disbelieved. There was plenty of evidence which proved Burnett, Buncher, and Griffiths, guilty, if not of any actual participation in the paper robbery, at least of concern in some part of the forgery and robbery of notes; and as the statute declares that every accessory to the commission of a felony is equally guilty with the principal felon, that was quite sufficient. A man named Williams pleaded guilty to being in possession of a plate, upon which was engraved a portion of a Bank of England note. An electric-gilder of the name of Cummings was separately arraigned upon the charge of being concerned in the forgery, but Mr. Justice Blackburn directed the jury to acquit him, on the ground that the evidence of the accomplices, Brown and Mills, was not corroborated and confirmed on any material point by independent and untainted testimony; although his lordship took care to intimate that there could be no moral doubt of his guilt. Griffiths was sentenced to penal servitude for life; Buncher to penal servitude for twenty-five years; Burnett to penal servitude for twenty years; and Williams to penal servitude for four years.

This trial will no doubt restore, in the fullest degree, the public confidence in the Bank of England note. In the first place, it may fairly be assumed that Messrs. Portal and Co.

and the Bank of England will take the necessary precautions to prevent such another robbery being committed; in the next place, the capture of Griffiths and Buncher is likely, for the time at least, to put a stop to all attempts to forge the notes of the Bank. Griffiths asserted that he had printed all the forged notes which had been uttered during seventeen years, and gave up the plates from which he printed them. This statement may have been exaggerated. It is probable that there is some other manufacture of the same kind, but the elegance and accuracy of Griffiths' plates and the excellency of his printing rendered his forgeries especially dangerous. Next, the removal of the middleman Buncher must prove a great blow to the trade, even if capable manufacturers of notes should be ready to resume it at once.

Forgery of this kind, to pay at all, requires very careful preparation and trusty agents. Men like Griffiths, Burnett, and Buncher, are not easily replaced by the criminal classes.

Two incidents in these proceedings deserve notice; the first, the vehement affection of the prisoner Burnett for the girl Mills. As soon as he found she was arrested he admitted his own guilt, but protested that she was innocent, and begged the police to make her a witness for the prosecution; the second the jealousy with which the English law protects even a prisoner of whose guilt there can be no possible doubt. The jury would certainly have convicted Cummings if the judge had not directed them to acquit him. A criminal has thus escaped the punishment which was his due; but if the rule of law which requires that the tainted evidence of accomplices should be corroborated on some material point by independent testimony should be violated to insure the conviction of a man whose guilt is morally clear, it may also be infringed to secure the condemnation of an innocent man. Better a criminal should escape than an innocent man be condemned.

The Underground Railway.

We do not think it possible for any one to travel for the first time on the Metropolitan Railway without paying some homage to the triumphs of Science. In a peculiar manner, all the chief improvements of the present century are combined in the new enterprise. Steam is the motive power, the traffic is regulated by electric telegraphy, and the carriages are lighted with gas. The Metropolitan Railway is not only a remarkable evidence of engineering skill, but it is peculiarly an English undertaking. It was not constructed to carry out a theory, but to meet a necessity. Our streets were inconveniently crowded, and there was a prospect of a dead-lock to London traffic. Moreover, it was necessary for the completeness of our railway system that the various termini should, in some way or other, be brought into, and meet in the heart of the City. To do this in the ordinary way would not only have involved a sacrifice of property, that would have rendered any scheme of the kind too costly to execute, but a surface line of railroad would have done more to embarrass than relieve the traffic of our main thoroughfares. It was under these circumstances that the idea was conceived of making an underground railway. The Thames Tunnel is wonderful and useless; the Metropolitan Railway is not less wonderful, and immensely useful. It will be a convenience to those who reside in the country and have occasion to visit London, and as soon as the plan is completed, it will, by connecting with the South-Eastern bring all England into more easy communication with the Continent. A person then residing in the Western, Eastern, Midland, or Northern Counties will be able to reach Dover and Folkestone without the stoppages, trouble, and expense attendant on having to proceed from Paddington, King's-cross, or Shoreditch, in a cab. It is then a national, we may almost say an international, undertaking.

The late Mr. Pearson, City Solicitor, was one of those men who are firmly persuaded that any difficulty will yield to perseverance, or he would have abandoned the scheme as hopeless. As soon as it was proposed, it was met with sneers and playful allusion to the temporary insanity of the projector. When it was seen that Mr. Pearson meant to carry out his design a number of new objections were started. It would never pay. People would never use an underground railway. It would weaken the foundation of the houses, and we should have half London in ruins. But Mr. Pearson worked on without heeding such criticisms, and at length a Bill was obtained for the construction of the line. But though the Bill was passed in 1854, the works were not commenced until 1859.

The difficulties of the construction cannot be thoroughly appreciated by those who did not watch the progress of the works. To tunnel for three miles and three-quarters through a variety of soil is in itself a formidable task. The plan adopted was to make an open cutting, then form a massive and capacious tube of brick-work in the parts of the line that had to be covered in. When the soil was loose gravel the labour of making the cutting was considerably increased, and in many instances the progress of the works was stopped by springs of water, which had to be exhausted before it could be continued. Nor was this all. In tunneling London the engineer had obstructions which never occurred in tunneling in the country. Underground London is far from being an unoccupied space. There are sewers, gas-pipes, water-pipes, and telegraphic-wire tubes, all of which the railway had to avoid or to replace. In some parts of the line the sewer had to be removed either temporarily or permanently. Amongst other evils we were threatened with a pestilence from the interference with the sewers and from turning up the earth that had become saturated with the leakages from the gas-pipes. We need hardly remark that no such catastrophe ensued.

Instead of being a dark gloomy tunnel, the Metropolitan Railway is well lighted, and when it is in full working order we doubt not will be at all times well ventilated. To effect this it was necessary to get rid of the smoke and steam that locomotives usually give forth. This was so important that at first it was intended to apply the atmospheric practice of propulsion; but this would, to a great extent, have cut off the ready intercourse between the railways and the connecting line. Mr. Fowler, the engineer of the line, has constructed a locomotive that condenses its own steam, and consumes its own smoke in the tunnel, but which at the same time works as an ordinary locomotive on the open railways. We may also observe that the system of signalling is at once complete and simple, and we trust it will prove so efficacious as to give the Metropolitan Railway the enviable distinction of being free from those appalling accidents which have happened on other lines.

The Underground Railway is a monument of skill that reflects the highest credit on Mr. Fowler, the engineer, and an enterprise well worthy of our national reputation for the performance of vast and difficult works.

RECOLLECTIONS OF SIBERIA.*

This is not a book which can be safely recommended to persons of sensitive nerves or susceptible imagination. It would haunt their thoughts for days, and their dreams for months. We read it with shuddering, sickening horror; we laid it down with a grateful sensation of relief. But the fault is not the writer's. He tells his tale with simple, straightforward distinctness, and displays no tendency to exaggeration or sentimentalism. The effect of that tale on his readers is due merely to the facts which it relates, and to the character of the system of which it affords a glimpse. We had hardly believed that such horrors had ever existed on earth, much less, that they existed still. When frightful crimes have been attributed to the Southern slaveholders—crimes of which we knew them to be wholly innocent—we have resented the imputation as a slander not merely on the South, but on the human race. And yet here we find, flourishing under the auspices of the Power with which the Northern Abolitionists profess the strongest sympathy, and cultivate the closest alliance, a system of cruelty infinitely worse than anything that the ingenuity of Mrs. Stowe or the venom of Beecher, Phillips, or Horace Greeley ever attributed to the slaveholders of South Carolina. None of the frightful inventions which have awakened the wrath of Europe against slavery, and excited the enthusiasm of New England in the cause of emancipation, war, and plunder, approached the hideous realities which M. Pietrowski reveals. If every slave-owner were a Legree, and every Legree were always in an access of drunken brutality, the condition of the Southern slave would hardly be so bad as that to which, at any moment, the Polish or Russian freeman may be reduced by the will of his autocratic master. We have all heard of deportation to Siberia; we have all an idea that it means something exceedingly frightful; but not one of us, probably, had conceived a tithe of its horrors until now. What life is in that earthly Tufano M. Pietrowski tells us; simply and quietly, without complaint or declamation. He tells of what he has seen and known, rather than of what he himself has suffered; and yet his own sufferings must have been truly terrible. And be it remembered that these things are not merely historical facts, but living realities. It is not yet twenty years since the author was sent to Siberia; Siberia is still what it was then, and still it receives from time to time a swarm of Polish exiles, doomed to expiate among felons and assassins—now as peasants on Crown lands, now as labourers on public works, now in the mines, but always subject to the vilest maltreatment, and always living in dread of corporal punishment as cruel as degrading—the crime of still believing in their country. Still every horror of which we read is in existence; still the servitude herein described is inflicted on numbers of men, and not a few women, of the best families in Poland; and the yoke of Alexander is not sensibly lighter than the yoke of Nicholas. The Emperor has abolished serfdom; but he treats his freeborn subjects much as the worst among them treated their serfs; much as the Abolitionists of Massachusetts would desire to treat the white population of the South. It is a crime to wear the Polish colours; it is punishable to wear mourning; the Polish language is almost tabooed; and Poles of all ranks must send their children to the common Government schools, to receive a Russian education, on pain of a fine on the parents, and corporal punishment on the children.

* The Story of a Siberian Exile. By M. Rudin Pietrowski. Followed by a Narrative of Recent Events in Poland. Translated from the French. (London: Longmans, 1863.)

Now and then, to relieve the tedious monotony of tyranny, assemblages of the people, unarmed and orderly, are surrounded, fired upon, and sabred by Cossack soldiery; the very churches are invaded, and the kneeling worshippers sometimes beaten, sometimes arrested, now and then merely expelled and violently driven home. In April 1861 Warsaw was treated almost as a town taken by storm; and yet there had been no insurrection, no resistance, nothing but the meeting of an unarmed crowd, among whom were women and children, to pray for those who had been butchered on a somewhat similar occasion. Those who dare to organize or take part in such demonstrations, under Russian rule, run no ordinary risk. They draw down on themselves punishment far worse than death; on their countrymen severities so monstrous that Europe refuses to believe in them. We have heard stories of outrage to women which would have astonished General Haynau and gladdened the heart of Butler; of atrocities suffered by old men and boys which would bring the vengeance of the civilized world on any Government whose speech was understood and whose country was visited by strangers—atrocities infinitely worse than any charged on the late dynasty of the Two Sicilies. The author, or suspected authors, of any remonstrance or demonstration may be sent to a long life-in-death in Siberia; or they may be put to death at once, not publicly by axe or gibbet, but secretly, by tortures the most horrible that human pen ever described. We extract, for the benefit of those who wish to know of what cruelty men are capable, the following minute account of three favourite methods of punishment in Russia:—

The knout is a strip of hide, a thong which is steeped in some preparation, and strongly glazed, as it were, with metal filings. By this process it becomes both heavy and extremely hard, but before it hardens care is taken to double down the hedges, which are left thin on purpose, and in this way a groove runs the whole length of the thong, except the upper part, which is supple, and winds round the hand of the executioner; to the other end a small iron hook is fastened. Falling on the bare back of the sufferer the knout comes down on its concave side, of which the edges cut like a knife. The thong thus lies in the flesh, and the operator does not lift it up, but draws it towards himself horizontally, so that the hook tears off long strips. If the executioner has not been bribed, and does his business conscientiously, the person under punishment loses consciousness after the third stroke, and sometimes dies under the fifth. A peculiarity of the Russian law may be also noted here, which orders that the number of blows from the knout shall always be an unequal one! The scaffold on which the sufferer is placed is called in Russ "a mare" (kobylya). It is an inclined plane, to which the man is tied with his back uncovered. The head is firmly fastened to the upper part, the feet to the lower end, and the hands, which are also knotted together, go round below the plank; any movement of the body becoming in this way impossible. After receiving the prescribed number of strokes, the poor wretch is untied, and on his knees undergoes the punishment of being marked. The letters vor (meaning thief, or malefactor) are printed in sharp-pointed letters on a stamp, which the executioner drives into the forehead and into both cheeks, and while the blood runs, a black mixture, of which gunpowder is an ingredient, is rubbed into the wounds; they heal, but the bluish mark left remains for life. In old days, after thus marking a man, they sometimes tore off his nostrils with iron pincers; but a ukase of the last years of Alexander I. definitively abolished this additional piece of barbarity. I have myself encountered in Siberia more than one criminal thus hideously disfigured, but all dating from a time anterior to the publication of the ukase in question. As for those who had the triple inscription of vor, I have seen an incalculable number in Siberia; but I believe women cannot be punished in this way, and I never met with one who wore the triple brand.

The plète, so often and so erroneously confounded with the knout, is a less fearful instrument of punishment. Three stout thongs are weighted at the ends with balls of lead, the other extremity winds up the arm of the executioner, and according to the law it ought to weigh from five to six pounds. When it comes down on the back it strikes like three sticks; it does not tear up the flesh like the knout, but the skin breaks under the blows, which make a lesion of the spinal column, break the ribs, and I have been told detach even the viscera from their places; and those who have suffered under the plète, if they have received any great number of lashes, generally fall into consumption and perish. In order to give himself greater purchase, the person wielding it makes a run, and does not strike till close to "the mare." I have said that it is possible to gain over the operator, and in this case he can manage not to touch the instrument with the little finger of the hand. This lessens the blow, although the attention of the superintending officer is not attracted by the practice, and any reader by experimentalising with a stick may convince himself that it does so. If, however, the sentence stands for a great number of strokes, the executioner is then bribed to inflict the first with tremendous violence, and as much upon the sides as possible, so that that life is sooner extinct, and death puts a speedier end to the sufferings of the victim.

A third species of punishment is running the gauntlet (skvos-stroï, literally "through the ranks"); it is generally reserved for soldiers, and yet many of my countrymen have suffered thus for political offences. It is inflicted with long rods newly cut, which have been steeped in water for some days to make them more pliant. Soldiers are arranged in two files, but each man stands at some distance from the other, so that all may strike with a long swing without being in each other's way. The condemned person, stripped to the waist, passes through the ranks, his hands are tied in front upon a musket of which the bayonet rests on his chest; the butt-end is held by the soldier who leads him. He walks slowly, receiving the rods on his back and shoulders, and if he faints and falls he is picked up again. A ukase of Peter the Great fixes the maximum of blows at twelve thousand, but it is seldom that more than two thousand are given at one time, unless for the sake of "setting an example;" in general, after two thousand, the patient is carried off to the hospital, and when healed of his wounds he pays the rest of his penalty.

From these punishments persons of noble birth are exempt by law; but they can be degraded from their rank, and as convicts in Siberia be made liable to the knout or the rods at the pleasure of the officials set over them. This liability, though he escaped the actual infliction, was one of the worst miseries of M. Pietrowski's condition when sentenced to hard labour in Siberia.

He was an exile since 1831; and his return to Poland appears to have had a political object. He arranged his plans in Paris, obtained a passport in the name of Joseph Catharo, a native of Malta, and therefore a British subject, and started for Poland in the beginning of 1843. He settled in Kamieniec as a teacher of languages, pretending total ignorance of Polish and Russian, and finding, of course, great difficulty in communicating with his pupils, many of whom were acquainted with no other tongue. To only a select few of his compatriots he entrusted his secret; they were faithful; and for many months he managed to elude suspicion. At last he was tracked, not by the local police, but by the superior authorities. The Imperial Government knew all the plans and proceedings of the Polish emigration; it got scent of Pietrowski's departure from Paris, discovered his route, and finally seized him, in December 1843, at Kamieniec. Great was the surprise of the town; great the consternation of everyone who had been on terms of intimacy with the prisoner. Many of his friends and pupils, including some of those who were in his secret, were also arrested. For a long time he persisted in his assumption of British nationality, and in declaring himself ignorant of Polish and Russian; the authorities informing him that they knew perfectly who he was, and that it was useless for him to persevere in his denials. Aware of the truth of this assertion, he chose an opportunity, when confronted with a number of his acquaintance and a few accomplices, to admit the charge of being a returned emigrant, and of having entrusted the knowledge of this fact to some of his countrymen; desiring that they should know the extent of his confessions, and shape their own course accordingly. After this he was despatched, under the charge of a superior officer of the police, by whom he was treated with great courtesy, to Kiow. From an accident on the journey, which seems to have inflicted a severe injury in the head, and from the irons placed on him, he suffered very greatly. After an interview with Prince Bibikoff, one of the veterans of the war against Napoleon, and famed for his severities in Poland—who, however, treated the prisoner with civility, and even kindness—his fetters were removed, and he was allowed to take some exercise during the continuance of the trial, or rather inquiry, which was to decide his fate, and that of those who had been arrested with him at Kamieniec. Nothing could be obtained from him; he persisted in his assertion that homesickness had been the only cause of his return to Poland; and was eventually sentenced, not to simple deportation, but to ratorga, or hard labour in Siberia for life. From the moment of hearing his sentence, he resolved to attempt his escape, although fully aware that the knout, and some extreme form of penal servitude, would be the penalty of failure, and that success does not, more than once in a century, attend these desperate attempts. He was conveyed to Omsk in a kibitka, a jolting Russian carriage, escorted by two soldiers; at Omsk he was sentenced to work in the distilleries at Ekaterinski-Zavod. Here he did the work of a common labourer, and associated with felons, until he was promoted through favour and good conduct to lodge with a countryman, and to perform the duties of a clerk. But even from the first his lot was a fortunate one.

One may get off with the katorga in some of the factories or Government distilleries, as I did at Ekaterinski-Zavod; but how many miserable beings labour in the horrible mines at Nerchinsk, with irons on their feet, and only hoping for some falling in of the mine to put an end quickly to a life which has nothing more to hope or to expect in this world. The verdigris mines are those which are the most dreaded. The disciplined gangs of Orenbourg, and other places, have the reputation of leading a life yet more awful than that at Nerchinsk. There the rod and the bastinado are the daily bread of our poor students and artisans, who are in general banished thither. There remains the fortress of Akatouia, not far from Nerchinsk, the last punishment reserved for the greatest criminals, and for convicts who revolt, or are taken in the attempt to break their ban. Here it was that Peter Wysocki, after the bad success of his conspiracy in Siberia, was at last shut up. I know nothing of this mysterious place, and I can say nothing about it, for I have never seen any one who had penetrated its mystery; but I only know that, throughout Siberia, the very name is pronounced with an indescribable terror.

Attempts to escape are commoner among criminals than among political offenders; the latter having more fear of the terrible consequences. Conspiracies have been formed among them to revolt, and force their way by arms and numbers into Persia or China, out of the reach of the Russian tyranny; but these have invariably failed, and brought down on their authors inflictions so frightful that the reader turns sick at the bare description. Such was the conspiracy of the Abbé Sierocinski, which had extensive ramifications, and was only betrayed—as conspiracies invariably are—at the last moment. Six of the principal offenders were sentenced to run the gauntlet, to receive 7000 lashes “without mercy;” and every one of them was liberally flogged to death; not one living to receive the whole number of blows awarded. The description of this execution is perhaps the most horrible in the book; yet it is but one among many similar tales of horror. Some such punishment as this the author knew was in store for him if he should be taken in his attempt to escape. Nevertheless, having made all his preparations, he quitted Ekaterinski-Zavod on the 8th of February, 1846, with a forged pass and about 180 paper roubles (£8) in his pocket, intending to avoid the trunk roads, and make his way by the north to Archangel, hoping there to find some foreign vessel which would take him on board. He had provided himself with the costume of a well-to-do Siberian peasant, and representing himself now as a commercial traveller, now as a workman on the tramp to find work at some Government factory, he journeyed for two months on foot, occasionally sleeping under a roof, but most often making for himself a bed under the snow, at the roots of some large tree, and running the risk of being frozen to death rather than that of being taken by the police. On one occasion he was awakened in the middle of the night, and asked for his passport, by the inhabitants of a village in which he had stopped; but they could not read; and his pass, being on stamped paper, though altogether worthless and informal, imposed upon them. In the early part of April 1846 he reached Vélki-Oustiong. From thence he made his way, with comparatively little trouble, as a pilgrim intending to visit the monastery of Solovetsk, to Archangel. Failing to find a ship there, he went on to Vyhegra; thence he obtained a passage to St. Petersburg, and escaping, by rare nerve and good fortune, the perils of the capital—terrible perils for the fugitive—he got on board a vessel bound for Riga. Thence he went on foot, by land, through Poland—steadfastly adhering to the rule he had laid down for himself, not to bring any one into danger by entrusting them with his perilous secret, and passing as an itinerant purchaser of hogs' bristles. He crossed the frontier, fired at, but apparently not pursued, by the Russian guard, and found himself safe in Prussia. Even here, however, his dangers were not over. Falling asleep in the streets of Königsberg, he was arrested as a vagrant, and detained for some weeks on suspicion. Finally, he informed some of the principal persons in authority who he was; whereupon he was told that he must be surrendered to Russia, in pursuance of a convention for the mutual rendition of political fugitives. He was allowed, however, to appeal to Count Eulenberg, President of the Government, through whose interposition he was released on bail; M. Kamke, a stranger to him, coming forward to give security. He was afterwards warned by the police that orders had been received for his extradition, and was allowed to make his escape. We do not pretend to have done justice to the narrative of his sufferings and his adventures—no abstract could do so. Seldom was any story more full of interest and excitement; never was such a story more simply, vividly, and clearly told by its hero. There is no affectation about M. Pietrowski—neither the affectation of complaint nor that of reserve. He speaks frankly of his miseries, but he does not dwell extravagantly upon them; and he does justice to his enemies without calling attention to his own generosity. Few authors ever leave on their readers' minds so pleasant an impression of their personality. No one who can endure the horrors of which his narrative is necessarily full will lay down the book without a strong desire to make the individual acquaintance of M. Pietrowski, and a strong admiration for the simple, frank style in which his story is told.

There is much that deserves grave consideration in the second part of the volume, which contains a very temperate account of recent events in Poland, and very life-like pen-and-ink portraits of Count A. Zamoyski, and the Marquis Wielopolski; but we have not space for any detailed notice of its merits.

RECOGNITION OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

An ingenious advocate can generally invent some plausible theory to make a bad case passable, or to damage the good case of his adversary. Now and then legal smartness is at fault, and judge, jury, and audience perceive that the counsel for the defence is arguing for his fee, without the slightest hope of winning a verdict. Those who oppose the recognition of the independence of the Confederate States have made the most of their case, but all their skill and perseverance have not succeeded in convincing unprejudiced persons that recognition is unjust and inexpedient. When secession had just taken place it was found impossible to deny that sovereign States had a right to secede from a Federation; but it was said that the constitutional right was of little consequence, since there had been an appeal to the sword, and that the South must prove her capability of maintaining her independence before we could acknowledge it. With this the North was perfectly satisfied, and the Lincoln Government promised to put down the “rebellion” in sixty, and then in ninety days. Instead of the South being subjugated, the North has only weakened itself by a vain and prodigal waste of life and treasure. When the Confederates had triumphantly maintained their independence, it was suggested that Europe ought to wait until the North recognized the Southern Confederacy. This was so opposed to common sense, and to the teaching of history, that it has not had much weight. A long string of precedents was adduced, to prove that the countries from which States have seceded or revolted have not been the first to recognize the independence of the new Power, and not one instance has been, or can be, adduced in which this has not been the rule. To get rid of this awkward fact, we were treated to a ridiculous plea, that would have been unworthy of notice, but for the great ability with which it was urged. The revolutions of Greece and Belgium were not precedents, forsooth, because, the cases were not perfectly analogous to that of the Confederate States. No precedent ever was or ever will be exact, and an agreement in the main features is sufficient. The offer of mediation, as proposed by the Emperor of the French, was not accepted on pretence that the Federals would reject it, whereas it is well known that there is, and was at that time, a peace party in the North only wanting such an opportunity for manifesting its pacific intentions. Perhaps the most extraordinary reason given for not recognizing the Southern Confederacy is, that the act would be inoperative and useless. If it were true, would it be valid ground for withholding a right because in some persons' opinion the right is of no practical advantage? What would be thought of a reply to a claim for a peerage, that though the title was clear, the peerage should not be granted, because it would not benefit the claimant? But the persistence with which the recognition of the Confederate States is opposed proves indubitably that in the opinion of its opponents it would not be without practical effect. Recognition does not mean armed intervention, it would not alter the resources of the belligerents, and yet the Lincolmites and the contractors who are getting rich on the misery of their country, oppose it vehemently. Why? Because they know that recognition would make the hopelessness of the contest apparent to the people of the North, and would issue in peace.

We have before us three pamphlets,* which, though differing from each other in the views taken of recognition, severally contain cogent arguments in its favour. Mr. John W. Cowell directs attention to the sufferings entailed on England by the “masterly inactivity” of our Government, and the injustice of such a policy to Lancashire. He maintains that by the conduct of the Federals we have been released from sacrificing our interests to a vague construction of the law of nations, and which, our author remarks, is not truly a law, because “nations have not constituted any common judge, any common court, with authority to declare it, or with power to administer it. The law of nations is thus seen to be wanting in the essential attributes of a law, and is erroneously termed ‘Law.’ It has never been declared; and if it had been, there exists nowhere any power to sanction or administer it.” Nevertheless Mr. Cowell is prepared to meet the arguments founded on international law, and he contends that our Government has violated that law by its policy of “masterly inactivity.” We were expressly bound, by treaty, to admit the independence of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia. The North might or might not have a right to make war on the South, but the assumption of sovereignty was indefensible.

Our Kings, for many centuries, assumed and employed the style and title of Kings of France; you will see this on all their coins up to 1814, and George III. concluded the Treaty of 1763, styling himself King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland. No nation objected to the nominal barren assumption of this title, but had any of our Kings demanded “to act or to do” on the part of the Crown of France, he would have been laughed at. You must note this distinction. It was not the duty of our Governors to deny to the Washington Government the use of any title they might choose to assume; it was their duty to refuse them the exercise of any rights which they claimed by a false, or an illegal title. Had they performed, instead of violating, this simple duty, you, instead of starving, would now be enjoying as good wages as ever. When the newly-arrived American Minister requested the English Minister, in the month of May 1861, to present him to our beloved and venerated Queen, it was the duty of the latter to present him by whatever title his credentials gave him, but it was also his duty, paramount and special, to apprise him that by so doing he did not admit him to be entitled to act in any way, directly or indirectly, for the sovereign States of Georgia, Virginia, and the Carolinas, and others, and that he should recognize no blockade which the Washington Government might institute if they assumed to proclaim it in the name of, and as acting on behalf of, a Confederation of States which had ceased, both actually and legally, to exist. Such, or a similar, course it was the duty of our Governors, your trustees, to have pursued, and it is directly owing to their non-performance of it that you and your families are now dying of cold and hunger.

"Confederate Notes" deals with the cotton supply and the institution of slavery. The author describes the extent of the cotton growing regions of the world, but we are inclined to think he does not make sufficient allowance for the peculiarly advantageous position of the cotton fields of the Southern States. We have no doubt cotton of excellent quality can be grown in Australia, but we are not at all sure that the Australian farmer can compete with the Southern planter. We commend M. B. H.'s observations on the prospects of Indian cotton culture to those who think that our Eastern Empire is to take the place of the Southern States. Our author refutes the charges brought against negro slavery in the South, by the statistics of the United States census of 1850. He cites the case of Jamaica to prove the evils of inconsiderate emancipation, and he quotes from Wilberforce, Buxton, Canning, and Lord Brougham, very decided opinions as to the natural and actual inferiority of the negro.

The Rev. E. L. Blackman argues that it is our interest to recognize the Southern Confederacy, because it would be highly dangerous to the peace of the world if, whilst all other continents are divided into different nationalities, America constituted one nation; and further that we can justly recognize the Confederate States.

When England and Europe recognized the independence of the United States, they did so as of thirteen independent and sovereign States, banded together by a federal compact. But as we recognized their right to retire as sovereign States, so did we their individual right to secede from their Federal Union whenever, as a sovereign State, any one of them should choose to do so. It was never disputed in the States themselves but that they had the right to secede. On the contrary, they have always been careful, all of them, to be recognized as sovereign States. This right was distinctly recognized at the time of the secession. No proof has since been given to surrounding nations that they had not this right to secede. And until this proof be supplied, we can only regard the Northern States as attempting, under the guise of suppressing a rebellion, to subjugate by main force the eight millions of inhabitants of the Southern States.

With respect to slavery, Mr. Blackman observes that if encouraging the North would result in emancipation, and immediate emancipation was a consummation to be desired for the negro, he could not, even then, advocate the Federal cause, because he protests against doing evil that good may come. He does not believe in the doctrine that the end justifies the means. Besides, the success of the North would not help the negro. His slavery would be exchanged.

for the loathing which would prompt a man rather to grasp the hand of an assassin or a crimp, than to touch with his finger tips the black "freeman's" palm. Not allowed to ride in the same carriage with even the lowest and most degraded of the white men; should he attempt it, he is ruthlessly dragged out, and spat upon. Nay, even the very presence of God, before whom all men are equal, cannot procure for him the recognition of equality. He may not kneel beside the white man, even to pray for their common salvation. This is the "freedom" which the North will give to the slaves of the South.

THE REIGN OF TERROR IN NEW ORLEANS.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

IRELAND, January 3, 1863.

Sir,—Being a subscriber to THE INDEX during my temporary residence in this my native country, I take the liberty of sending you the following extracts from a private letter I have received from New Orleans.

My family reside in that unfortunate city; I have lived there for twenty-four years. Everything I am worth is in real estate. In order to save an invalid wife from being turned out into the streets, and to save my property, I took their accursed oath on the 23rd of September last, and left home on the 25th. If you think the following extracts worthy of publication, you are at liberty to publish them. For the sake of my family, I wish my name suppressed.

Very respectfully, —

New Orleans, December 10.

Dear H —, Times are getting worse and worse every day. Mrs. W. G. R —, of this city, and the wife of Colonel Thorpe, of the Federal Army, were fellow-passengers in the Marion from New York. The following conversation took place on board. Mrs. Thorpe asked Mrs. R — "What sort of society have you in New Orleans?" Mrs. R — replied, "Rather exclusive." "What sort of roads have you about New Orleans for driving on?" "Why?" replied Mrs. R —, "have you brought a carriage and horses with you?" "No," replied Mrs.

Thorpe, "but my husband will get them from confiscated property." The spoliation of plantations still continues. The crops are seized—horses, mules, horned cattle, sheep, wagons, &c.; even ladies' wardrobes, children's shoes, pictures &c., are all carried off. The furniture is sometimes sold at auction, and sometimes sent North. The seizure of houses in the city still continues, under the most heartrending circumstances.

The most respectable ladies, young and old, are turned into the streets, and beg their way from house to house, just as God may send a friend to receive them; and these friends, in turn, may soon share the same fate. Federal officers give ladies' dresses (stolen from the plantations) to their boon companions, the coloured wenches, who sport them at their churches and balls, where those same officers dance with them and call them their sisters, &c. These wenches are liberally rewarded, for favours extended, from the plunder of many a once comfortable and happy home. When the Federal officers take possession of a house and don't appropriate the plate to their own use, the moment the soldiers are placed on guard the small articles soon disappear. A few days ago a house was seized, and some articles of ornament were missed. The sentinel was asked if he took the articles? He said no; but the wife of Major Warner was in the house, and the missing articles were found in her possession. Billy Wilson's New York Zouaves are encamped on the Metairie Ridge, and make a professional business of highway robbery. They robbed a man on the Shell-road the other day. All those attached to the Federal army, either civil or military, are sending for their families to the North, and as they arrive like Thorpe's wife, they look out for the windfall of the confiscated property.

On Thursday, the 27th of November, there was a private party given by a family, to which all the officers of the foreign vessels in port were invited. A Yankee officer called at the house, and gave notice they could not hold the party without permission from General Butler. The lady of the house got permission from General Butler, he, I suppose, not wishing to refuse, on account of the foreign officers. The wife of Dr. Campbell, whose magnificent dwelling Butler now occupies, sent a pair of candlesticks as a present to the Jesuit church. A negro servant told General Butler, he immediately sent for the candlesticks, and they were delivered up to him.

Jacob Barker is a candidate for Congress for the City District; he is said to be the best of the "Liberals;" and is opposed by Michael Hahn, a pettifogging German lawyer, and General Butler's candidate.

To enumerate all the incidents of tyranny and oppression that are daily transpiring in and around this city would fill a volume.

Yours, —

THE "ALABAMA" AND THE "ARIEL."

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

COLON, United States of Colombia,
December 15th, 1862.

Sir,—The steamship Ariel, Captain Jones, having left New York for this port on the 1st inst., was overhauled off the east end of Cuba on the 7th inst., at 2 o'clock p.m., by the Confederate steamship Alabama, Commander Semmes; which kept her two days and a half, brought her as far as off Morant Point, Jamaica, took what treasure she had on board, about $12,000 ($1500 in gold coin, balance in Lincoln United States' Treasury notes). Captain Jones gave release bond for about $260,000 ($120,000 on vessel, balance on cargo).

There were 120 marines on board the Ariel, from whom arms and ammunition were taken, and then they were paroled. I have conversed separately with some ten or twelve of the passengers, and they all speak in the highest terms of praise of the kind and gentlemanly bearing of Lieutenant Lowe and those that were with him boarding the Ariel; at first many of the lady passengers were much frightened, but the conduct and kind words of their visitors soon calmed them, as well as the male passengers, when they were assured that their persons and their private property should be respected, and some expressed regrets at parting from their gentlemanly captors, and all were agreeably disappointed. The scandalous and libellous accounts that are published by the muzzled press of the Northern States have poisoned the public mind in regard to the character of Commander Semmes' officers and crew, and this accounts for the fears entertained at first on board the Ariel. Lieutenant Lowe, upon leaving the Ariel, had not a button left on his coat, they having been all removed by the ladies as mementoes.

General Julio Arboleda, the Commander-in-Chief of the party in this Republic opposed to General Mosquera, was assassinated on the 12th of November, whilst crossing the Barruecos Mountain, near Pasto, which event will probably close the civil war in this country.

THE PROCLAMATION OF PRESIDENT DAVIS.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES—A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, a communication was addressed on the 6th day of July last (1862), by General Robert E. Lee, acting under the instructions of the Secretary of War of the Confederate States of America, to General H. W. Halleck, Commander-in-Chief of the United States' Army, informing the latter that a report had reached this Government that William B. Mumford, a citizen of the Confederate States, had been executed by the United States' authorities at New Orleans, for having pulled down the United States' flag in that city, before its occupation by the United States' forces, and calling for a statement of the facts, with a view of retaliation, if such outrage had really been committed under the sanction of the authorities of the United States.

And whereas (no answer having been received to said letter), another letter was, on the 2nd of August last (1862), addressed by General Lee, under my instructions, to General

Halleck, renewing the inquiries in relation to the execution of the said Mumford, with the information that, in the event of not receiving a reply within fifteen days, it would be assumed that the fact was true, and was sanctioned by the Government of the United States:

And whereas, an answer, dated on the 7th of August last (1862), was addressed to General Lee by General H. W. Halleck, the said General-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, alleging sufficient causes for failure to make early reply to said letter of the 6th of July, asserting that "no authentic information had been received in relation to the execution of Mumford, but measures will be immediately taken to ascertain the facts of the alleged execution," and promising that General Lee should be duly informed thereof:

And whereas, on the 25th of November last (1862), another letter was addressed, under my instructions, by Robert Ould, Confederate agent for the exchange of prisoners, under the cartel between the two Governments, to Lieutenant Colonel W. H. Ludlow, agent of the United States under said cartel, informing him that the explanation promised in the said letter of General Halleck, of the 7th of August last, had not yet been received, and that if no answer was sent to the Government within fifteen days from the delivery of this last communication, it would be considered that an answer is declined:

And whereas, in a letter, dated on the 3rd day of the present month of December, the said Lieutenant-Colonel Ludlow apprised the said Robert Ould that the above-recited communication of the 19th of November had been received, and forwarded to the Secretary of War of the United States; and whereas this last delay of fifteen days allowed for answer elapsed, and no answer has been received:

And whereas, in addition to the tacit admission resulting from the above refusal to answer, I have received evidence fully establishing the truth of the fact that the said William B. Mumford, a citizen of the Confederacy, was actually and publicly executed, in cold blood, by hanging, after the occupation of the city of New Orleans, by the forces under General Benjamin F. Butler, when said Mumford was an unresisting and non-combatant captive, and for no offence even alleged to have been committed by him subsequent to the date of the capture of the said city:

And whereas, the silence of the Government of the United States, and its maintaining of said Butler in high office, under its authority, for many months after his commission of an act that can be viewed in no other light than as a deliberate murder, as well as of numerous other outrages and atrocities hereafter to be mentioned, afford evidence too conclusive that the said Government sanctions the conduct of the said Butler and is determined that he shall remain unpunished for these crimes:

Now, therefore, I, Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States of America, and in their name, do pronounce and declare the said Benjamin F. Butler to be a felon, deserving of capital punishment. I do order that he shall no longer be considered or treated simply as a public enemy of the Confederate States of America, but as an outlaw and common enemy of mankind, and that, in the event of his capture, the officer in command of the capturing force do cause him to be immediately executed by hanging.

And I do further order that no commissioned officer of the United States, taken captive, shall be released on parole, before exchange, until the said Butler shall have met with due punishment for his crimes.

And whereas, the hostilities waged against this Confederacy by the forces of the United States, under the command of said Benjamin F. Butler, have borne no resemblance to such warfare as is alone permissible by the rules of international law or the usage of civilization, but have been characterized by repeated atrocities and outrages, among the large number of which the following may be cited as examples:—

Peaceful and aged citizens, unresisting captives and non-combatants, have been confined at hard labour, with chains attached to their limbs, and are still so held in dungeons and fortresses:

Others have been submitted to a like degrading punishment for selling medicines to the sick soldiers of the Confederacy:

The soldiers of the United States have been invited and encouraged, in general orders, to insult and outrage the wives, the mothers, and the sisters of our citizens:

Helpless women have been torn from their homes and subjected to solitary confinement,—some in fortresses and prisons, and one especially on an island of barren sand, under a tropical sun; have been fed with loathsome rations that had been condemned as unfit for soldiers; and have been exposed to the vilest insults:

Prisoners of war who surrendered to the naval forces of the United States, on agreement that they should be released on parole, have been seized and kept in close confinement:

Repeated pretences have been sought or invented for plundering the inhabitants of the captured city, by fines levied and collected under threats of imprisoning recusants at hard labour with ball and chain. The entire population of New Orleans have been forced to elect between starvation, by the confiscation of all their property, and taking an oath against conscience to bear allegiance to the invader of their country;

Egress from the city has been refused to those whose fortitude withstood the test, and even to lone and aged women, and to helpless children; and after being ejected from their homes, and robbed of their property, they have been left to starve in the streets or subsist on charity:

The slaves have been driven from the plantations in the neighbourhood of New Orleans until their owners would consent to share their crops with the Commanding-General, his brother, Andrew J. Butler, and other officers, and when such consent had been extorted the slaves have been restored to the plantations, and there compelled to work under the bayonets of the guards of United States' soldiers. Where that partnership was refused armed expeditions have been sent to the plantations to rob them of everything that was susceptible of removal:

And even slaves, too aged or infirm for work, have, in spite of their entreaties, been forced from the homes provided by their owners, and driven to wander helpless on the highway:

By a recent general order, No. 91, the entire property in that part of Louisiana west of the Mississippi River has been sequestered for confiscation, and officers have been assigned to duty, with orders to gather up and collect the personal property, and turn over to the proper officers, upon their receipts, such of said property as may be required for the use of the United States' army; to collect together all the other personal property, and bring the same to New Orleans, and cause it to be sold at public auction to the highest bidders—an order which, if executed, condemns to punishment, by starvation, at least a quarter of a million of human beings, of all ages, sexes, and conditions, and of which the execution, although forbidden to military officers by the orders of President Lincoln, is in accordance with the Confiscation Law of our enemies, which he has effected to be enforced through the agency of civil officials:

And, finally, the African slaves have not only been incited to insurrection by every licence and encouragement, but numbers of them have actually been armed for a servile war—a war in its nature far exceeding the horrors and most merciless atrocities of savages:

And whereas, the officers under command of the said Butler have been in many instances active and zealous agents in the commission of these crimes, and no instance is known of the refusal of any one of them to participate in the outrages above narrated:

And whereas, the President of the United States has by public and official declarations signified not only his approval of the effort to incite servile war within the Confederacy, but his intention to give aid and encouragement thereto, if these independent States shall continue to refuse submission to a foreign Power after the 1st day of January next, and has thus made known that all appeal to the law of nations, the dictates of reason, and the instincts of humanity, would be addressed in vain to our enemies, and that they can be deterred from the commission of these crimes only by the terrors of just retribution:

Now, therefore, I, Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States of America, and acting by their authority, appealing to the Divine Judge in attestation that their conduct is not guided by the passion of revenge, but that they reluctantly yield to the solemn duty of redressing by necessary severity, crimes of which their citizens are the victims, do issue this my proclamation, and by virtue of my authority as Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the Confederate States, do order:

1. That all commissioned officers in the command of the said Benjamin F. Butler be declared not entitled to be considered as soldiers engaged in honourable warfare, but as robbers and criminals deserving death; and that they, and each of them be, whenever captured, reserved for execution.

2. That the private soldiers and non-commissioned officers in the army of the said Butler be considered as only the instruments used for the commission of crimes perpetrated by his orders, and not as free agents; that they, therefore, be treated, when captured, as prisoners of war with kindness and humanity, and be sent home on the usual parole that they will in no manner aid or serve the United States in any capacity during the continuance of this war, unless duly exchanged.

3. That all negro slaves captured in arms be at once delivered over to the Executive authorities of the respective States to which they belong, to be dealt with according to the laws of the said States.

4. That the like orders be executed in all cases with respect to all commissioned officers of the United States when found serving in company with said slaves in insurrection against the authorities of the different States of this Confederacy.

In testimony whereof I have signed these presents, and caused the seal of the Confederate States of America to be affixed thereto, at the city of Richmond, on this 23rd day of December, in the year of our Lord, 1862. JEFFERSON DAVIS.

By the President, J. P. Benjamin, Secretary of State.

THE DOINGS OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES' STEAMER ALABAMA.

The St. Thomas (W.I.) Tilende gives some particulars, borrowed from the Grenada Chronicle, of the recent movements of this celebrated cruiser. It appears that after her escape from Martinique, she proceeded to the Blanquilla Isle, where she had arranged to rendezvous with her coaling ship, the Agrippina. The whaling schooner Clara S. Sparkes (American) was overhauled there by the Alabama, and detained, probably to prevent the master from giving news of the Alabama's whereabouts until her departure. Captain Semmes told the master of the Sparkes, that if he had been caught three miles from the land under sail, the schooner would have been burnt. The master of this craft states that the Alabama is provisioned for eight months. She mounts six heavy broadside and two large rifled pivot guns. According to a written statement handed to the master of the Sparkes by Captain Semmes, the following is a list of the captures of the Alabama during a cruise of two months:—

Ship Ocmulgee , of Martha Vineyard.....	Sept. 5
Brig Starlight , of Boston.....	" 7
Barque Ocean Rover , of New Bedford....	" 8

On board of the last named ship was the American Consul at the Mauritius, and the captain's wife, who were landed at Martinique.

SALE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES' STEAMER SUMTER.

This vessel was sold on the 19th December, by authority of the Confederate Government, for the sum of $19,500, at the port of Gibraltar, where she had for some time been laid up awaiting repairs. Her name has been changed to "The Gibraltar," and after the necessary repairs are completed, she is to be converted into a passenger steamer. The United States' Consul at that port attempted to resist the sale, and, this failing, to injure it by a protest. The sale, however, being clearly legal, no notice appears to have been taken of the Consul's action.

Thus ends the warlike career of this remarkable vessel, the first that displayed the flag of the new-born nationality of the South on the high seas. The astounding boldness of the exploits of the frail little steamer, and the success which attended all her movements, are still fresh in the mind of the reader, and have rendered her name historical.

THE ARTICLE FROM THE "RICHMOND WHIG."

The following is the article from the Richmond Whig, referred to in the telegraphic summary of news. It is not a fair, and certainly not a dignified expression of Southern feelings toward England. The Richmond Whig is the organ of the opposition in the Confederate States, and accustomed to speak in terms quite as unmeasured about President Davis, the Ministers of his Cabinet, the Generals of the Confederate armies, and other men who have the implicit confidence of the nation. But while we must receive the Whig's outburst with this due degree of caution, we should not disguise from our readers that the people of the South do feel themselves aggrieved by what they consider the withholding of bare justice to them on the part of the British Government, and there is danger that if England much longer presents the only obstacle to their recognition by other European Powers, the indignation now expressed only by a small vociferous minority, may become the restrained but not less intense feeling of a nation with whom we have every reason to desire amicable relations.

THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT AND THE AMERICAN WAR.

(From the Richmond Whig, Dec. 29.)

The grovelling and cold-blooded selfishness of the British Ministry towards the Confederate States is fast engendering toward that country a bitterness of feeling in this that cannot fail to tell upon the future relations of the two Governments, and still more materially upon the business intercourse of the people. If we credit appearances, nine-tenths of the British people are with us and for us, an equal or greater proportion of the press, and a large minority, if not a majority, of the Ministry. Yet, so passive is their sympathy, that they permit, almost without remonstrance, those two old painted mummies, Russell and Palmerston, to place the British nation in an attitude toward us heartlessly and cruelly unjust. There can be no doubt that those who direct the policy of England secretly rejoice in the fact that the late United States are arrayed against each other in bitter strife, literally threatening the complete annihilation of each other, thus relieving her of a powerful rival, of whom she lived in continual dread.

As the Mississippian says they desire the restoration of the Union less than any other event, and feeling that that result is impossible, they do not wish to see the independence of the Confederate States established until the people both North and South are prostrated in strength, bankrupted in finance, and disgraced as a free people. With a hypocritical profession of anxiety that the war may cease, they have pursued the very course calculated to inflame and prolong the contest. They have patted the Southerner on the shoulder, saying "Bravo! my gallant young lad, we admire your courage," insidiously from time to time encouraging our people to persevere, and recognition will soon come. At the same time they heap abuse upon the North, taunting her with her inability to whip the Southern gamecock, only for the purpose of exasperating that section. They have acted the part of a brutal bystander, losing no opportunity to intensify the hot contest raging between two alienated brothers. They have a purpose to gain in this savage and perfidious policy, and the wickedness of the Northern people in waging an unholy war upon the liberties of the South enables them to carry it out.

The Confederate States needed no encouragement to stimulate them to the assertion and the maintenance of their rights. They acted alone upon their own judgment and convictions of duty; but we cannot help revolting at the inhuman demonstrations of the Government of England. We have been undecieved in regard to it. We judge the English Ministry rightly now; and, next to the abominable North, we have a right to hate them more than any other Government upon earth. If it were possible that the old United States could be restored—an event for ever beyond the pale of possibility—the English Government would find a wholesome and intense hatred for them both North and South, which was only equalled by that which their brutality inspired in the breasts of our grandfathers.

The fact is remarkable, that Napoleon, to whose people we are not connected by the ties of a common language and kindred, and whose interest in the cessation of hostilities in America, is not one-third as great as that of the English, should offer terms of mediation in the spirit of humanity, the object of which was to gain an armistice, in order that the effusion of blood might be stayed, and the parties in the strife might settle honourably their difficulties, and that the humane offer should be coldly rejected by England, whom we have called our mother. Even Russia, from whom we had no right to expect anything, and who had nothing to gain, could not treat with indifference an offer which common humanity so strongly recommended. The failure of the mediation scheme, if, indeed, it turns out to be a failure, is attributable entirely to the heartless selfishness, and base tears, and short-sighted policy of England, our mother.

The Confederate States will remember England in the future. There was a time when she could have made fast friends of us, but that time, we believe, is going by for ever. We look upon her present Government as little less corrupt than that of the North. The conduct of her Ministers in our affairs has been characterized by sordid lust and base fears. A threat from Seward will silence Earl Russell more effectually than the wails of the suffering poor of his country. Treachery being the predominant characteristic of both the Yankee and the English Premiers, we are not surprised that there is a mutual hostility to the South, and perhaps a tacit understanding to despoil us of the products of our country. Seward is by far the shrewder knave of the two, and his voice seems to be as potent with Earl Russell as it is in the Cabinet at Washington. Certain it is that he has dictated in most supercilious terms the course which he wished England to pursue since the establishment of the blockade and the recognition of the Confederates as belligerents. Up to the consummation of the latter event, the wily Yankee fox had not put his thumb upon the old English Premier. Since then, however, the conduct of England has been directed by Seward,

A LONG WAR.

(From the Charleston Courier of Dec. 16th and 17th.)

THE CRISIS.

The enemy is in motion. The campaign he has been preparing for with so great energy and with so immense an outlay of treasure is begun. The clash of arms and the crash of cannon falls upon our ear from two portions of the vast field of war. Battle has been joined by the hostile forces at Fredericksburg and Richmond, and pleasing tidings have come from the generals in command at these important points. Thus far success has crowned our arms, and inspired with a higher confidence, we await with even minds and trustful hearts the results of the great battles that are impending.

The contests that have taken place, though not accompanied with the loss of life that might have been apprehended, have nevertheless cost us three generals, eminent for efficient service and great abilities, and many brave men have shared the fate of Gregg, Cobb, and Hood. The country weeps at the grave of these martyrs of liberty, bewailing her own loss in their premature death, and pouring out her tears in sympathy with the loving hearts smitten by their bereavements.

The work of blood is again begun. Having revived from the crushing defeats he suffered during the summer and fall campaign, with augmented strength and redoubled resolution, the foe is pressing down upon our extended lines. Nothing daunted by previous failures, he aims to wrest from our grasp the capital of our Confederacy, and to cut off direct communication between Richmond and Charleston. To accomplish these purposes he has brought to his aid all his vast resources, and he will attain these objects if they can be compassed by energy, enterprise, generalship, and valour.

We content against large odds. We are inferior to the adversary in numbers and equipments. He will take advantage of his greater strength in these particulars, and endeavour to conquer us by brute force, to overwhelm us by his heavier columns. And that he will do battle with fierce and stubborn courage, we cannot doubt, when we consider that he fully appreciates the momentous crisis. He is aware of the tremendous importance of success, and he will tax to the highest degree the skill of our generals and the pluck of our soldiers.

We oppose to this terrible array of men and the implements of war, generals of unsurpassed genius and talents—men, who combine with perfect discipline and boundless confidence in their chieftains a courage that has asserted itself on many a hard fought field, and excited the wonder and admiration of enlightened nations—a cause, than which none more noble and grand ever moved man to deeds of heroic daring, and in whose vindication desperate fighting and fervent prayers are alike acceptable in the sight of heaven. And there mingle with the potent influences yielded by a just and righteous cause the memories of brilliant victories won in the face of serious disadvantages. The men who now stand up in defence of liberty, honour, home, and every precious interest, are the very men who fought and conquered at Seven Pines, Manassas, and Sharpsburg, and we are certain that, if it be possible, they will repel and discomfit the malignant foe.

As we contemplate their deeds with pride and gratefulness, so we commit our cause into their hands with confident hearts, beseeching the aid of that Power who ruleth in the armies of heaven and earth, that He would vouchsafe us help and send us victory.

A WORD OF CAUTION.

With such generals, and such men, and such a cause, it is reasonable to reckon upon coming out of this terrific contest completely triumphant. But final and glorious success does not preclude reverses and defeats. We may be called upon to bear discomfitures at important points, but these disagreeable events should not impair our confidence in the eventual triumph of our righteous cause. Indeed, when we consider the superior numbers of our foe and his vast resources, we should prepare our minds for those calamities that in all probability will try our fortitude during the course of the present campaign. We have boundless confidence in the abilities of our generals, and in the valour and resolution of our soldiers, but there may be such untoward agencies in operation at some points of our long extended line of defence, that the most brilliant display of generalship and of heroism will be inefficacious in securing victory. In spite of sagacity, vigilance, energy, splendid combinations, and gallant fighting, we may have to retire from some field under the mortification of defeat.

It is the part of wisdom to moderate our expectations. We should not be too much elated by victories, nor cast down by reverses. If we maintain an even mind under prosperity, our spirits will bear us up under the shocks of adverse circumstances. But if we count upon uninterrupted success, and a speedy issue with honour and glory out of this bloody struggle, we shall in all likelihood be disappointed, and those disappointments falling upon us in that frame of mind, we will be fiercely assailed by doubts and fears, and perchance bring reproach upon ourselves by unworthy despondency and injurious crimination.

We wage war with a powerful enemy. He possesses all the means and appliances for carrying on this gigantic contest. His army numbers nearly a million of men, who are completely armed and equipped, and he enjoys great advantages over us wherever his gunboats can be brought to his aid. The larger portion of that immense force have already confronted death on the field of battle, and neither are his generals deficient in abilities nor his men in courage and determination. He is impelled and sustained by the bitterest animosity and the most insatiable avarice. He is resolved to accomplish his base purposes, and he is regardless of the blood and treasure the attempt may cost. We must must reckon upon hard, fierce, sanguinary battles. The foe will do his utmost, and we will have to do our best fighting. It will be no cause for apprehension and discouragement if we meet with some reverses, or if the victories we win are not so signal and decisive as we hoped they would be. It will rather be a cause for wonder if brilliant success, unmarked by a single reverse, mark the achievements of our arms. Heaven may signalize our cause, and reward our valour and endurance by blessing us with uninterrupted victories, but it will be presumptuous in us to expect this mark of the Divine favour.

If we reckon upon success in every quarter, bad tidings will sorely disquiet our spirits, and under the painful sense of the harm we have suffered, we will be disposed to censure the unsuccessful general, and in so doing, we may be guilty of perpetrating a great wrong and injustice. Let us not forget the blunders we have made since this war begun, and the disappointments we have suffered. And while we cherish an abiding confidence in our generals and soldiers, and refuse to permit a doubt of eventual success to enter our minds, let us be prepared for reverses, and if they come, let us show that our patriotism is sustained by a fortitude that discouragements cannot shake. And if we bear reverses with even hopeful spirits, we shall receive victories with hearts reverently grateful and duly humble, European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised, classified, and liberal SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING. Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies. Through the medium of a liberal advertising patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade. The object of this Agency is threefold:—

1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property &c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.
We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance, and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The result of the battle, or rather battles, of Murfreesborough is still shrouded in comparative mystery by the Federals. It seems certain that the battle was well contested by the Federals, who fought bravely, and with great resolution. Skirmishing commenced on the 29th of December; the first great battle was fought on the 31st of December, when the Federals were repulsed with terrible slaughter, the particulars of which, so far as they have transpired, we gave in our last issue. The fight was renewed on the three following days, and on the 4th of January the Confederates abandoned their positions, and retired on Tullahoma, on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railway, the last-named place being the Confederate base of operations. It is clear enough that it was not a Northern victory, for the Federals admit a loss of 6500 killed and wounded, several thousand prisoners, and 28 pieces of artillery, and that Generals Willick and Fry were among the prisoners. General Bragg reports that on the 31st of December he took 4000 prisoners, two brigadier-generals, 31 pieces of artillery, and some 200 waggons and teams. We may be sure the Federals have not confessed the full extent of their loss; but it is remarkable that for once they estimate the Confederate loss at less than their own—at 4500 killed and wounded, and 1000 prisoners. Was the battle of Murfreesborough, then, a Confederate victory or a drawn battle? It is admitted by their enemy that they took trains of provisions, a large quantity of artillery, and that they inflicted fearful losses. The only doubt that can be thrown on the Confederate victory is the evacuation of Murfreesborough. Allowing the Federals the full benefit of this doubt, we must remember the Confederates retired in good order with their prisoners and booty; and that though the Federals entered Murfreesborough, they were not able to follow their enemy. We do not find any fact in the Federal accounts that gives any idea that the Confederates retreated—for it is absurd to say an army retreats which retires in good order, with a large booty, from the front of an enemy too much cut up to molest the movement. The conclusion we arrive at, from the imperfect information of the affair, is that the battle of Murfreesborough was a severe disaster to the Federals, even if the Confederates did not gain all they expected by the engagement. We must bear in mind that, at this juncture, it is of vital importance to the Washington Cabinet to conceal any great disaster; and it is therefore possible that some time will elapse before we hear the truth about the battle of Murfreesborough—just as there was a long interval before the Federal disaster at Shiloh was suffered to transpire.

General Wheeler made a complete circuit of the Federal army with his cavalry. He destroyed 300 waggons, loaded with baggage and commissary stores, captured an ordnance train, and several thousand stands of small arms. Another cavalry corps captured a large supply of waggons and horses.

Amongst the killed are reported, General Rains, Colonels Mc'Nair, Anthony, Black, Fisk, and Lieutenant Thiest. No authentic list of killed and wounded is yet received in Europe.

The Federals report that all the negroes captured by the Confederates "were immediately shot." We do not understand how they could know this, even if it were true. If any negroes were shot, it was not because they were acting as teamsters. We repeat, the Federals could not know that all the captured negroes were immediately shot, and we must wait for Southern reports to know what truth, if any, there is in the rumour.

The attack on Vicksburg was not decided, or, at all events, the result was not known on the 8th inst. at New York. The Richmond papers give the following account of the first assault:—

Vicksburg, Dec. 30.
On Saturday the enemy made four desperate attempts to force our lines on the Chickasaw Bluffs, with heavy loss. The 17th Louisiana greatly distinguished itself, repulsing, unaided, the assault of three full regiments of Yankees. On Sunday morning the enemy again advanced on our lines, and were repulsed with heavy loss. All the troops behaved gallantly, but special mention is made of the 28th and 17th Louisiana Regiments, the former regiment maintaining the ground all day against superior forces. Our loss on Sunday was one killed and two wounded; 8th Tennessee, four killed and six wounded, Captain C. A. Gently, among the killed; 17th Tennessee, two killed and two wounded; 81st Tennessee, one killed, none wounded. One of General Lee's couriers had his leg shot off. Wofford's Artillery lost one sergeant killed. No particulars of the casualties in other regiments. On Monday afternoon 8000 of the enemy advanced upon our regiments on the right wing of the Chickasaw Bayou to storm the works, but were mowed down in large numbers, and upward of 400 prisoners taken, with five stands of colours. The enemy were driven back to their boats, and afterwards sent in a flag of truce for permission to bury their dead, under which some of the prisoners escaped.

It appears that another assault was made, and that the Federals, under General Sherman, fought their way to within two miles of the city, where they were met by General Joseph E. Johnston, and after a severe contest, driven back to the first line of defence. In this encounter the Federal General Morgan was killed. It is not known whether the attack was renewed. The Southern papers seem confident that Vicksburg will be able to hold out against her present assailants, although the opposing force is considerable, General Sherman having 40,000 troops under his command, and the gunboats of Commodore Farragut to co-operate with him. The mail now over-due may bring us some definite intelligence as to this protracted struggle.

In a despatch to General Halleck, dated January 4th, General Grant boasts that "his soldiers have subsisted off the country, and that there will be but little in North Mississippi to support guerillas in a few weeks more." This is not a Southern report, but the admission of a Federal General that he is desolating the country which he has invaded. To stop this barbarous mode of warfare, we see no other remedy than retaliation. If the Confederates were to desolate a few Northern towns, it might teach the Federals a useful lesson.

A body of Federal cavalry 5000 strong has destroyed nine miles of the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad, burning the important bridges over the Holston and Watauga Rivers. This is a serious loss to the Confederates. The Lynchburg Republican says, "It will take several weeks to repair the damages at a time when the road is taxed to its utmost capacity."

Another dash into Dumfries has been made by a detachment of Stuart's cavalry under the command of Major Herring. Some sutlers' waggons and a quantity of public stores were captured. It is rumoured that General Stuart has cut off the telegraph communication between General Burnside's army and Washington.

A Federal official account has been published of the capture of Van Buren, Arkansas. General Grant reports that General Sullivan defeated the Confederates under General Forrest, at Lexington, Tennessee, on the 1st, capturing six cannon and many prisoners. The Confederate loss in killed and wounded is put down at 1400, and that of the Federals at 800. From what has transpired of General Forrest's movements, we are bound to say this report is more than doubtful.

The loss of the Monitor—though a severe blow to the North, for it shows that the most costly ships are only fitted for special services and are coast batteries rather than vessels of war—may be a useful lesson to the maritime Powers of Europe. For home service we may make our ironclads heavy and invulnerable to any battery that can be sent across the ocean to attack them; but for foreign service the armour of our ships must be comparatively light. We now know the exact scope and value of ironclad batteries of the Monitor class. They are substitutes for, or adjuncts to, coast batteries. On the last day of the old year the Monitor, then off Cape Hatteras, sprung a leak, and in spite of every effort to save her, sunk a few hours afterwards. The storm was not particularly severe, but the moderate gale was sufficient to wash the waves over the turret. The water, we are told, entered at every crevice intended for the admission of air, and it is not quite clear, from the accounts, that there was a leak, or that the Monitor did not sink from the weight of water which entered from the turret and air holes. The Rhode Island, a paddle-wheel steamer, went to the rescue of the crew of the sinking ship, but did not save all on board. It is reported that five officers and nineteen men belonging to the two vessels were missing. The Monitor was on her way to Wilmington, North Carolina, with other ironclads, with the design, it is said, "of cutting off the railroad communication between Richmond and Charleston."

The proclamation of President Lincoln has caused great dissatisfaction in the Border States. Officers of Kentucky regiments have, in many instances, resigned their commissions, and the privates give free expression to their discontent. Mr. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, remarked, in the Federal House of Representatives, that "there was not one man in three hundred in Kentucky, in favour of the Emancipation Proclamation." The effect produced in New York may prove useful. It has convinced many who were heretofore hoping against hope, that the restoration of the Union is impossible. Even the glowing reports of the Government, of the military operations in the South-West could not relieve the feeling of depression. Mr. Lincoln and his party are regarded by the Democrats with feelings of the most bitter hostility on this account. The proclamation has not freed the slaves, but it has not been inoperative, for it has increased political dissension in the North.

Every day brings us fresh evidence of the intensity of the Abolitionists' hatred of the negro. Mr. Noel introduced a bill into the Federal House of Representatives, which was afterwards passed, to provide for the issue of ten millions of thirty years bonds, as compensation for the emancipation of Missouri slaves, and upon the condition of "the Government pledging itself to the deportation and colonization of the freed men." The freed negro may go to Africa, or to the bottom of the Gulf of Mexico, but he must not stop in the country of his loving brethren—the Northern Abolitionists.

An "Emancipation Jubilee" was held on the 5th instant, at the Cooper Institute. The admission was fifteen cents. The proceedings commenced by the performance of a band of "coloured minstrels"—not Christy's troop. After this, the Rev. John J. Raymond prayed, and the following is the report of his prayer:—

"We thank Thee, O God," he prayed, "that Thou hast seen fit, in Thy good providence, to raise up one Abraham, surnamed Lincoln, whom Thou hast ordained and set apart, and sanctified and inspired in spite of the conflicting occurrences of the time, to dare, after due notice given, to give forth a proclamation, carried into effect on the first day of January, in the year of grace, 1863, by which millions of men and women are for ever set free. ('Bless God!') Glory to God in the highest. ('Amen!') Glory to God for this achievement. ('Bless God!') 'Glory; 'Hallelujah.' Abraham Lincoln has eclipsed all that Washington has done—all that any preaching President has done. ('Amen; 'so he has.') He is a man whom God should bless, and the people delight to honour. ('Amen; 'yes, he is; 'so he is.')

The profane impertinence of the above has never, in our recollection, been equalled. To claim the Divine sanction for the adoption of servile war, as a military measure; to utter a solemn lie about the present effect of the proclamation; to indulge in the political laudation of Mr. Lincoln, were sufficiently disgusting; but the concluding clause, in which the Rev. John J. Raymond coarsely says that Mr. Lincoln "is a man whom God should bless," and to which the audience responded "Yes, he is," is monstrous blasphemy. In order that the anti-christian character of the New England abolition movement may be appreciated, we quote the following verse from a song that was sung by the assembly:—

John Brown was John the Baptist, of Christ we are to see, Christ who of the bondmen shall the Liberator be,
And soon throughout the sunny South the slaves shall all be free.
For his soul is marching on.
Glory, &c.

The Rev. Dr. Cheever, said:—

May John Brown's soul come down and animate our generals, and the President, and the Cabinet. His soul is big enough for any twenty of our generals. (Cheers and laughter.) We are willing to vote ourselves in the bosom of Father Abraham now.

The irreverent joker need not have prayed for the soul of John Brown animating the Federal generals; Butler, Turchin, McNeil, and others have already exceeded the brutality of John Brown, the midnight assassin.

Governor Seymour's Message to the Legislature of his State must have disappointed those who expected that it would have been a protest against the continuance of the war; but though it declares "the Union to be indissoluble," it cannot be very acceptable to the Lincoln Government, for it exposes the unconstitutional conduct of the Administration, directs district attorneys and sheriffs to allow no person to be imprisoned without due process of law, and denounces the Confiscation Acts and the Emancipation Proclamation as being as unconstitutional as the "rebellion." The exigencies of the Democratic party, perhaps, need that they should say that the dissolved Union never can be dissolved—that what has happened has not happened, and never can happen; but if the Democrats will insist upon a strict observance of the Constitution, the war must come to an end, for the attempt to subjugate the Confederate States involves a palpable violation of the Constitution. Governor Seymour gives a hint to Mr. Lincoln and his coadjutors which is not calculated to make them feel particularly comfortable. He says that unconstitutional acts cannot be shielded by unconstitutional laws—that is, that the acts of indemnity passed by Congress will not prevent the punishment of offenders at the fitting opportunity.

The decision in reference to the charges against the Police Commissioners is postponed. Governor Seymour cannot get rid of them before April, except by the concurrence of the State Senate, and that body is too evenly divided for him to rely on it for support in any extreme measures against the Republican officers.

Mr. Chase is in want of money, and has applied to Congress for authority to issue some more paper. He asks for $50,000,000 of greenbacks to pay arrears due to the army. Mr. Wilson informed the Senate that "many soldiers had been waiting for months, and some had gone home into the poorhouse, and their families were paupers, because they had not been paid as promptly as they should have been." A Government must, indeed, be in a fix when it cannot pay its soldiers. Mr. Chase also asked for $50,000,000 in six per cent. ten year bonds, and $50,000,000 in currency, to meet the immediate wants of the Government. Mr. Spaulding introduced into the Federal House of Representatives a bill for the issue of $600,000,000 of Treasury Bonds, "for the payment of the creditors of the Government, and to meet the exigencies of the public service." These demands and bills give us an insight into the omissions of Mr. Chase's financial statement. The indebtedness of the Federal Government is enormous and rapidly increasing. The prospect of their new issues of paper produced a panic which sent up the premium in gold to 37 per cent. At last advices gold was 36 per cent.

General Banks has rescinded many of his predecessor's tyrannical decrees; amongst others that by which the churches were closed because the ministers refused to pray for Mr. Lincoln. Meantime, General Butler is being feted in the North. At a reception in New York one lady observed, "She was happy to grasp the hand of the only man who could manage the Secessionists of New Orleans, and she hoped he would do the same good work in Charleston." The Government has also rewarded his services by appointing him to the command of the Southern Department, to include South Carolina, Georgia, and other States. The infamy of the Federal Government does not lessen the infamy of Butler, and it justifies the Southern detestation of the North to the civilized world.

President Davis, after visiting Mobile, Vicksburg, and other places, passed through Charleston on his return to Richmond.

As was expected, the contest for Speaker in the Albany Assembly has been very close. The votes were told twice, and on both occasions there were 63 votes for each candidate—Mr. Dean and Mr. Sherwood.

The Boston Daily Advertiser of January 7th. says that the Confederates captured and destroyed at Holly Springs property to the value of $3,000,000. Some accounts give a much higher estimate.

The desire for peace is finding expression in the North. Besides the address we elsewhere reproduce, a pamphlet has been published in New York, which is thus referred to by a New York paper:—

"Peace, Peace!"—This is the title of a small pamphlet from the pen of Mr. Lindley Spring, of this city, which gives vent to the yearning desire on all sides for the stoppage of this wicked, fratricidal, and useless war. God grant that the desire of the writer may soon be realized.

Mr. Spring may (we have not seen his pamphlet) seek for peace on an impossible basis; but whether he does so or not, he represents a wide-spread feeling in favour of putting an end to the war.

In the course of the inquiry into the conduct of General Porter, some despatches were read, in which General Halleck's mistakes and misdirections are exposed. For instance, in a despatch received August 25th, General Porter says, "I do not like to direct movements on such uncertain data as those furnished by General Halleck. I know he is misinformed of the location of some of the corps mentioned in his despatches." General Halleck seems to have been in the habit of sending one corps to look for another in a place where it was not to be found.

It is reported that a force of 500 or 1000 men has been organized by Cortinas for a raid into Mexico. This Cortinas is the same person who has, on former occasions, invaded Texas, having, on one occasion taken the town of Brownsville.

ENGLAND.

The decrease of pauperism in Lancashire still continues, but not at a rate which would justify the sanguine expectations entertained by the less-informed section of the public. There is an apparent diminution of 8600, but the real reduction does not much exceed 3000, as will be seen by the annexed statistics of the Poor-Law Board:—

(a). Six unions have more:—
	Paupers.		Paupers.
Chorley	100	Manchester ..	160
Chorlton	440	Warrington ..	80
Liverpool	500
Macclesfield ..	60	Total	1,340
(b). Two unions are in respect of the amount of pauperism the same as in the previous week—Glossop, Salford.
(c). Thirteen unions have less:—
	Paupers.		Paupers.
Ashton-under-Lyne	1,100	Rochdale ..	400
*Blackburn ..	5,470	Saddleworth ..	110
Bolton	180	Stockport ..	980
Burnley	110	Todmorden ..	60
Bury	60	Wigan	30
Haslingden ..	940
Oldham	130	Total	9,960
Preston	390

* The clerk of the Blackburn Union states that "the decrease this week is owing to the arrangement entered into between the Guardians and the Relief Committee."

NET DECREASE IN THE PAUPERISM OF THE WHOLE DISTRICT.
Second week of December, 1862 ..	4,320
Third ditto	2,580
Fourth ditto	4,050
First week of January, 1863 ..	7,310
Second ditto	8,620
Total	26,880

It would be rash to venture even yet upon any decided predictions; but we believe that the opinion expressed from the first by those best qualified to judge is still entertained by them, and that they do not look forward to any rapid or extensive improvement. Even the most sanguine of those whose authority carries any weight on this question do not venture to anticipate that the cotton trade will afford during the present year half the amount of the usual employment. At the best, then, we must expect in Lancashire a loss of from ten to fifteen millions per annum while the American war continues. The capital of the manufacturers will waste away; the condition, moral and physical, of the work-people, will steadily deteriorate; the élite of the operative class will be removed by emigration; and if the present state of things should last for two or three years longer, it will take a generation to repair the havoc which the American war has made among the richest, most industrious, and most intelligent population in the world. The apathy of English statesmen while this work of ruin was in progress excites the amazement of their thinking countrymen, and provokes the contemptuous astonishment of the civilized world. They manage these things differently, if not better, elsewhere. But in questions of foreign policy the Government of the day is almost despotic; and although Lord Russell has outraged all the favourite prejudices and the deepest convictions of his countrymen—though he has neglected their interests and betrayed their principles—though he has surrendered English territory and sacrificed English honour—though he has insulted the allies and cringed to the enemies of his sovereign—though he has done everything that the country abhors, and left undone everything that she requires—we hardly expect to see him removed from office by any attack directed against the foreign policy of the Administration. Soberly and often as she has been disappointed in him, England has still confidence in Lord Palmerston; and even those who most desire his overthrow do not disguise from themselves that no other statesman has the same hold on the respect of Parliament and the affections of the nation.

The Central Relief Committee held a general meeting at Manchester on Monday. Mr. Farnall read the following report:—

There is a decrease at Ashton-under-Lyne of 1105, at Burnley of 228, at Bury of 205, at Clitheroe of 41, at the Fylde of 134, at Glossop of 1, at Haslingden of 141, at Oldham of 134, at Preston of 327, at Freestwich of 102, at Rochdale of 399, at Saddleworth of 111, at Stockport of 981, at Todmorden of 149, and at Wigan of 26—making a total decrease of 4147; but there is an increase at Barton-on-Irwell of 47, at Bolton of 109, at Chorley of 101, at Chorlton of 198, at Garstang of 9, at Lancaster of 18, at Macclesfield of 59, at Manchester of 156, at Salford of 3, and at Warrington of 75—making a total increase of 776; so that there is a net decrease of 3371. On the 3rd inst. there were 253,146 persons receiving parochial relief; on the 10th inst. there were (inclusive of Blackburn) 244,367, so that a decrease of 8837 paupers has taken place, and since the 6th ult. a total decrease of 27,676 paupers had taken place. The percentage of pauperism on the population of these unions is now 12.3; in the corresponding week, of last year it was 3.4. The present percentage of pauperism on the population in the Blackburn union is 14.3; it having been 18 per cent. in the previous week. For the week ending the 6th ult. the expenditure in outdoor relief was £18 728 8s., but the expenditure in outdoor relief for the week ended the 10th inst. was £16,633 15s. 1d.; these is, therefore, a decrease of £2094 12s. 11d. in the latter week. The expenditure in outdoor relief at Blackburn for the week ended the 6th ult. was £1336 8s. 7d.; for the week ended the 10th inst. it was £945 10s. 3d.; there is, therefore, a decrease of £390 18s. 4d. in the latter week.

On the 8th inst. I issued a circular to each of the 155 medical officers in the 27 unions of the cotton districts, requesting them to answer the following questions:—First, are you at present attending cases of typhus fever in your district? secondly, if so, do they exceed those you were attending this time last year? and state the number in excess; and, thirdly, is this typhus fever of a malignant and dangerous character, and does it originate in a want of food and clothing? The medical officers have returned to me 141 of my forms of queries duly filled up, and I am now enabled to report that 111 of these districts are wholly free from typhus fever; that in 17 other districts typhus fever in a mild form exists; and that in 13 other districts typhus fever of a malignant character exists, there being 105 of these cases, of which 27 are in the Fever Hospital at Preston, 24 are in Manchester Fever Hospital, 14 are in the Farnworth workhouse, 10 are in the Hyde district, and 10 are in the Accrington district, while the remaining 20 cases are in eight districts which need not be specified. The excess of these cases, as compared with those in the corresponding week of last year, is 94.

Mr. Ridley, the medical officer of the Preston Fever Hospital, informs me that "the fever has probably originated in want of food and clothing, and in mental depression," and "that to these causes and its very contagious character may be attributed its rapid spread in low, dirty, and poor neighbourhoods." He also says, "there is a considerable decrease; the number on the books on the 12th of January is 27; on the 29th of November it was 68." Six of the medical officers of districts where malignant typhus fever exists, are of opinion that it did not originate in the want of food and clothing; six other medical officers are of the same opinion as Mr. Ridley, and they state that low diet and insufficient clothing are strong predisponents, and they call my attention to the sanitary condition of the districts in which this form of fever is found. I trust that these remarks will incline every board of guardians and every local committee to take care that the scale of relief, so frequently and so strongly recommended by your committee, shall be invariably adopted and maintained.

A debate subsequently took place upon the extension of relief to persons holding shares in co-operative societies, which are not transferable. Lord Derby expressed his opinion that the general rule, which forbids relief to persons having property of their own, might in such cases be advantageously relaxed.

The Birmingham Chamber of Commerce held its anniversary dinner on Thursday. Responding to the toast of the members for the borough, Mr. Scholefield defended the existing state of the law of maritime warfare. Mr. Bright differed with him altogether; he thought that the Congress at Paris had stopped short at a wrong point, but the remedy, in his opinion, was not retraction, but a further advance. He thought that we ought to give up the right of blockade, and of commercial captures. He found fault with the warlike spirit which induced us a year ago, "to send 10,000 men across the Atlantic to threaten a nation which could put a million of men under arms." He was glad that our statesmen were not quite too old to learn; he rejoiced in the surrender of the Ionian Islands. He would like to see Gibraltar ceded. In return we might obtain from Spain a commercial treaty, and the effectual abolition of the Cuban slave trade. The orator forgot to tell his hearers what security we could have that Spain would keep her future promises better than her past. Adverting to the state of the cotton market, he censured severely the language of Ministers on the American question.

They are, said he, no better informed than the rest of us; but their predictions are supposed to rest on knowledge, and do infinite harm by alarming commerce and confounding speculation. After an angry tirade against the Times for its hostility to the Northern States, the unaccredited representative of America prophesied the triumph of Radicalism and Abolitionism all over the world, and sat down amid the cheers of an audience which would cheer yet more loudly the recognition of the Southern Confederacy and a declaration of war against the countrymen of Captain Wilkes.

When Mrs. Beecher Stowe was in this country, a number of ladies of the highest rank got up an address to the women of America on the subject of slavery, which received, we believe, some half million of signatures. Mrs. Stowe has retaliated somewhat late by a reply complaining of the fearful encouragement afforded by England to a slaveholding Confederacy. This reply has elicited a rejoinder from Archbishop Whately expressing the opinions of the majority of Englishmen on this subject; a rejoinder which, courteous as it is, administers a severe rebuke to the insincerity and impertinence of one of the most over-rated of those who imagine themselves strong-minded women. We do not believe, he says, in the sincerity of Northern Abolitionism. We believe that the revolt of the Southern States was at least as just as that of the Thirteen Colonies. We are not conciliated by the railing and threats of the Northern press. We consider that, according to precedent, the Confederacy must speedily be recognized; we think that the negro is better off in the South than in the North. The Archbishop concludes:—

I have now laid before you the views which I conceive to be most prevalent among us, and for which I am not myself responsible. For the safe and effectual emancipation of slaves, I myself consider there is no plan so good as the gradual one, which was long ago suggested by Bishop Hinds. What he recommended was an ad valorem tax upon slaves, the value to be fixed by the owner, with an option to Government to purchase at that price. Thus the slaves would be a burden to the master, and those the most so who should be the most intelligent, and steady, and, therefore, the best qualified for freedom; and it would be his interest to train his slaves to be free labourers, and to emancipate them, one by one, as speedily as he could with safety. I fear, however, that the time is gone by for trying this experiment in America.

Dr. Whately ought to have known that such an experiment was never possible, the Federal Government having no power to impose direct taxes in this exceptional manner on a single species of property. In one respect, English opinion has done injustice to the North. If it had wished to abolish slavery throughout the Union, it could not have done so. How often is it to be repeated that the Federal Government has no more power over the institutions of the States than has the British Parliament?

A deputation of nobodies, from a body professing to represent the remnant of the once powerful Emancipation Society, waited on Mr. Adams last Friday, to express their admiration of General Butler, their sympathy with Mr. Seward, their entire faith in Mr. Lincoln, and their hearty approval of his proclamation. The address, which was read by a gentleman of whom no one ever heard before, repeated the old clap-traps which no one wishes ever to hear again. Mr. Peter Taylor—a person known by his proneness to use very extraordinary terms of vituperation in the House of Commons—said that the proclamation would tend to keep the peace between England and America, which he said had been always in danger from slavery—how, he did not, and of course could not, explain. Nobody believed him, and the reporters cut him short. Mr. Baptist Noel, a quasi-popular preacher, praised Mr. Lincoln's devoted adherence to the Constitution, which protects property in slaves, and especially forbids confiscation. Dr. Newman Hall, a minister of some Dissenting sect, abused the press after the fashion of Radicals and Dissenting ministers, who are never favourable to any other liberty than their own. Mr. Jacob Bright affirmed that the Lancashire operatives sympathised with the North. Mr. Adams saw the character of the deputation at a glance, and did not trouble himself with sense or facts. He spoke of a majority of the people of the United States as having declared against slavery by electing Mr. Lincoln, who, it is needless to remark, was chosen by about two millions out of five. He thanked them for their sympathy, and he promised to convey the expression of their approval to his Government. If he keep his word, he will waste paper to very little purpose. There is scarcely a newspaper among the many which support the Confederate cause, that does not number among its readers hundreds of gentlemen possessing ten times the influence and repute of all the members of the Emancipation Society put together.

The second Totnes election has resulted in the return of a Liberal, a relative of the Duke of Somerset, by a majority of eight votes.

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—M. de Persigny is persisting in the system of avertissements. The Temps has received one for a very mild article on the Imperial speech, and other journals have shared the same fate. It is proposed that the Liberal press shall abstain from articles on French questions; in fact, as the correspondent of the Standard says, send the Government politically to Coventry. We are afraid that the Government would not care.

The Emperor has addressed a letter to General Forey, commanding the forces in Mexico. It may be taken as a declaration of the objects of the French invasion of that country. The city of Mexico is to be taken; a National Assembly is to be summoned, and a stable Government to be established; either a monarchy, if not incompatible with the national feeling, or some other Government which will be able to hold its own. His Majesty says:—

We have an interest in the Republic of the United States being powerful and prosperous, but not that she should take possession of the whole of the Gulf of Mexico, thence command the Antilles as well as South America, and be the only dispenser of the products of the New World.

There can be no fear on this score. The Republic so spoken of has already ceased to have more than a fictitious existence.

GERMANY.—The Prussian Chambers met on the 14th, and the Royal Speech was read by M. Von Bismark Schonhausen. It declares that, in the absence of a legal budget, the expenditure for 1862 has been regulated with strict regard to economy and efficiency; expresses a hope that such expenditure will receive the retrospective sanction of the Chambers, and promises that the budgets of 1863 and 1864 shall shortly be laid before them. It expresses the intention of the King to adhere to the French Treaty of Commerce even at the risk of dissolving the Zollverein, and takes a high tone with reference to the conduct of Austria and her supporters in the Federal Diet. The President of the Chamber of Deputies presented a number of addresses, approving the firm stand made by the Chamber in defence of the Constitution; and it is reported that the reply to be made to the Royal Speech will be in a similar tone.

It is said that the Duke of Saxe-Coburg—Prince Albert's brother—is to be King of Greece. In that case the affairs of the Duchy will be administered by a Council of Regency in his name, at least, until Prince Alfred of England attains his majority. The Duke has no children, and Prince Alfred is to succeed him in the Duchy.

The hostility between the Governments of Austria and Prussia is manifested by the declaration said to have been made by the President of the Prussian Ministry that, in order to get rid of the obligations contracted towards Austria by the Zollverein in 1853, Prussia would give notice of her intention to withdraw from that famous league. It would seem that the Court of Berlin is bent on isolation, alike from its subjects and its allies.

DENMARK.—The despatch of the Danish Minister in answer to Lord Russell's impertinent lectures has been published in the English papers. The Minister declares that the exclusion of Federal interference from Sleswig is necessary to the independence of the kingdom; and that its endurance in Holstein is an act of grace and not of duty; that the States of the Bund are sovereign independent, and that the Diet has no more right to meddle in Holstein than in Prussia or German Austria; although "material power is an argument less easily set aside than a just claim." Sleswig is non-German; and the King of Denmark has made no engagement with the Diet in regard to Sleswig. The Federal authority, therefore, cannot extend beyond the frontier of Holstein; and the Government of Denmark, warned by the results of the voluntary explanations in regard to Sleswig, by the contradictions of the German Powers and the impertinence of Lord Russell, declines all further negotiation in regard to its non-Federal territories. Lord Russell professes a desire to preserve the integrity of the Danish State, but his advice would destroy it entirely. Finally, Denmark will grant Holstein all that is demanded, but will allow no intermeddling in her non-Federal dominions. The effect of such a despatch—placing England in the position of an ungenerous friend and unfaithful ally, forcing on a small Power unrighteous demands preferred by others for dishonest purposes—is very painful to English feelings. It makes Lord Russell look yet smaller than Nature created him; but the shame which he has incurred is inevitably, though unjustly, reflected on his country.

ITALY.—The correspondence of the French Government with its representatives at Rome and Turin has been laid before the Legislature. Once more Lord Russell has made himself contemptible, and in this country ridiculous. He has been intriguing to persuade the Pope to leave Rome and retire to Malta; and being found out, has got a terrible rap on the knuckles from the French Minister. Also, he has made several complaints against the Pope and Francis of Bourbon, for encouraging brigandism in Naples, which the French Ambassador declares to be unfounded. M. de Sartiges reports from Turin (Dec. 10), that the new Italian Ministry was anxious to keep on good terms with France, and acknowledged the present impossibility of the withdrawal of the French troops from Rome. On the 29th of December he repeats a conversation with M. Pasolini, in which the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs, while expressing a willingness to waive the Roman question for the present, declared that Rome was the natural capital of Italy, and did not conceal his conviction that France ought ultimately to withdraw her troops, and leave the temporal power of the Pope to abide the decision of the Roman people.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Jan. 21, 1863.

At the date of our last report the cotton market was very excited, under the "Etna's" news, and Fair Dhollerahs could scarcely be bought at 18d.

On Thursday we opened with a good demand from the trade and speculators, but the prevalence of a dense fog restricted business, the advance of 1 per cent. in the bank rate had, moreover, a subduing tendency, and before the day was over, it became apparent that the current of speculation started on receipt of Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, had been checked, and that until stimulating news was again received from America or the East, no further advance could be expected. The sales reached 10,000 bales at steady prices. On Friday and Saturday the market was very quiet, with sales of 3,000 and 4,000 bales, with a drooping tendency.

On Monday the "Europa's," news were to hand with Seymour's message to the New York Legislature, wherein he states in the name of the party he represents, "We can never voluntarily consent to the breaking up of the Union or the destruction of the Constitution." At Murfreesboro after five days' terrific fighting, the Confederates had retired in perfect order, carrying away a number of prisoners and a large amount of military stores. At Vicksburg the result was still uncertain; the Federals had carried several positions, and a report was current that the town was taken, but this wants confirmation.

Though these accounts were all of a nature to give confidence to holders here, they failed to impart animation to our market, and with sales of 3000 bales prices were barely supported.

On Tuesday the demand was again languid, and Manchester, in sympathy with Liverpool, was very quiet, though steady;

The business here reached only 2000 bales, and Fair Dhollerahs were sold at 17½d.

To-day a shade more tone is perceptible, and the sales reach 4000 bales. We quote Fair Dhollerahs and Omrawuttees 17½d, and Fair Broach 18½d. American has been quite neglected, and is entirely nominal in value; Middling Orleans may be quoted 24d.

The conviction here is pretty general that, even with a certainty of the American war lasting another year, the prices now ruling—say 18d. for Fair Dhollerah—are quite high enough for the present with a stock of 400,000 bales on hand, and though a considerably higher range of prices is confidently looked for late in the spring, yet it is hardly probable that we shall have a material advance for some time. The accounts from India will likely be better by each mail for some time to come, but stocks in Bombay and Calcutta are still so large—estimated by good authorities to be equal to nearly one year's consumption—that we cannot expect the advance there to be such as to lessen the great discrepancy at present existing between their prices and those of Manchester, to such an extent as largely to increase shipments thence.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, January 20.

Notwithstanding the better telegrams from Calcutta, with dates up to the 26th, 29th, and 30th ultimo, advising a daily advance in prices both for yarn and cloth, our market here still exhibits that quietness which has been its chief characteristic during the two previous weeks, caused principally by the slow business going on at Liverpool in the raw material.

Export yarns have been very little enquired for, with the exception of doubled yarns, which have been bought out of stock at, in some cases, less prices than can be got for singles of similar numbers.

Home manufacturers have bought very sparingly, thinking that the dull state of Liverpool would induce spinners to take lower prices, but in most cases the latter remain firm at previous quotations.

Cloth has been much neglected, especially India shirtings, and Jaconets, which cannot be moved at the quotations for which they have been held so long, and speculators in whose hands they are chiefly, seem little disposed to give way feeling confident that a demand for them must set in before long, as the exports to India the last two months, are of such a very small amount as will speedily bring about that result.

To day that we have had another very flat market, which has disappointed everyone who had anything to sell, Liverpool manifesting such an amount of tameness which is astonishing, when we take into consideration that the news per the "Europa" was more conducive to a belief, that the struggle in America would continue for some long time to come, than has been any intelligence received since the commencement of the war.

There has been some small demand for doubled yarns for shipment to Germany, in Nos. from 40s. to 100s., and an advance of ½d. per lb. for the finer qualities has been obtained; other kinds of yarn, whether for shipment or home trade, being entirely neglected. Neither have there been any transactions in cloth.

SALT BUSINESS PRODUCED BY THE WAR.

(From the Charleston Courier, Dec. 16th.)

The amount of capital and industry invested by our citizens in the manufacture of salt, one of the great necessities of the times, justifies a more detailed account of the business than has heretofore been given. From small and almost insignificant beginnings it has now assumed important proportions, and is daily on the increase, both in numbers engaged and the quality produced. From statistics which we are enabled to give below it will be seen that the number of salt works in operation and in course of erection within the city limits alone number 120, giving an average of 11 bushels each, or 1350 bushels per day, and nearly 8000 per week. The number of pans and boilers in use amount to nearly 700 of different sizes, varying in yield from one bushel and a half to ten and twelve. About 4000 cords per week will give a fair average of the wood consumed, and nearly all pine. A few of the salt boilers are using resin. The cost of these works, in the aggregate, has been estimated at the lowest at $250,000. The cost of the wood consumed daily is averaged at $8000, or nearly $50,000 per week. The total aggregate, allowing for hands engaged and other items, would swell the amount to near half a million dollars per week.

The foregoing is entirely exclusive of works outside the city, located on Mount Pleasant, James' Island, and various other places. At the latter place Colonel C. H. Stevens has erected salt works, which supply his own regiment with salt, besides furnishing the Commissary Department with a large quantity. At Fort Johnson Dr. Leiby has some salt works in successful operation, and also the firm of Legare, Sullivan, and Hitchcock. J. and F. Dawson are manufacturing a superior article on Goat Island.

At Mount Pleasant there are several extensive works yielding an average of fifty to seventy bushels per day.

At Rikersville Mr. David Riker has in successful operation extensive works, which are turning out an excellent article of salt, on an average of twenty-five bushels per day. The proprietor is offering his salt at $18 per bushel.

Near the Four Mile House, Mr. Charles Tavel is erecting salt works, and at the old Magazine Messrs Pressley and Dukes and Mr. E. E. Bradley have works in course of construction.

The results of this enterprise are indeed really astonishing, taking into consideration the difficulties of obtaining material, want of experienced workmen, the high price of wood, and the absence of many almost indispensable facilities. We think consumers, however, may look with certainty in a short time to a very material reduction in the price of the article.

The Courier then gives a long list of the works in the eastern and western divisions of the city, in which occur the following:—

COOPER RIVER.

Charleston Salt Works (Proprietor, H. L. P. McCormick).—These works, situated on Southern Wharf, were erected in July 1862. They are turning out about twenty-five bushels per day, first quality, of fine and coarse salt. The number of pans used is ten. About ten cords of wood daily are consumed. Mr. Isaac Brown, agent; Mr. P. Pendergrast, superintendent. Mr. McCormick is extending his operations, with a view to double the quantity now manufactured.

Mills' Wharf Salt Works (Proprietors, P. J. Coogan and Co.).—These works are in course of erection, and a large amount of capital has been subscribed towards their completion. They are intended to be the largest and most complete in their appointments of any works yet built. Average number of bushels calculated to yield per day, forty.

Williams' Wharf Salt Works.—There are three located upon this wharf. Of these the largest are those of Claussen and Kampsen, now nearly finished. They have seven very large pans, which are calculated to turn out twenty-five bushels daily. The others are those of Peter Kennedy, six pans—average per day, six bushels; and Rollin and Aspinall, six pans—average, four bushels.

Hasel-street Wharf.—Mr. F. W. Claussen, one of the earliest in this enterprise, has erected on this wharf the largest works yet in operation. He is turning out forty bushels of salt daily, and employs a large number of men. Additional works are also in progress, from which it is thought the daily quantity of salt made will be increased to eighty or ninety bushels per day, or between five and six hundred bushels per week. Messrs. Fraser and Rusch, whose excellent specimens of salt we have already had occasion to notice, are located at the head of this wharf. They are working with three very large pans, which yield a daily average of eleven bushels. Wood and Roach are erecting some large works upon this wharf, to be fitted up with six pans. Supposed average daily yield, ten bushels. Whilden and Co. have in course of erection upon the same wharf salt works to consist of six pans, with a supposed average yield of ten bushels per day. R. Smallwood, same wharf, with works of five pans. Average daily yield of six bushels.

Bennett's East Bay Mill Salt Works.—These works were commenced in February. The number of pans ten. Average daily yield, twenty bushels.

Wharf, foot of Laurens-street.—Robert Merriweather. Two extra large pans. Average daily yield, twenty bushels per day. Chamberlain, Bowman and Co. Number of pans, ten. Average yield, ten bushels.

Wharf, East End of Calhoun-street.—Messrs. Cook, Wood, and Prothro. Number of pans, six. Average daily yield, five bushels. Forester and Marks: Number of pans used, eight. Average daily yield, seven bushels. Kenny and Fogarty. Number of pans, five, and one large boiler. Average daily yield, twenty bushels. James H. Johnston and Ross Spriggs. Number of pans, eight, and one large boiler. Average daily yield, twenty-five bushels. C. F. Middleton and Co., Middleton's Salt Works. Number of pans, eighteen. Average daily yield, forty bushels. Gannon, Von Dohlen and Heriot. One boiler and five pans. Average daily yield, twelve bushels.

Horlbeck's Wharf (Proprietor, John Horlbeck, T. F. Leiby, Agent).—Number of pans twenty-two. Average yield per day, twenty bushels. The proprietor is extending his operations and erecting new works.

North-Eastern Railroad Wharf.—C. D. Carr and Co., J. S. Schirmer, T. D. Dotter, and others, forming a corporation, have erected on this wharf extensive works, known as the Atlantic Salt Works. The model arrangements of the boilers and pans are worth the close inspection of all who design entering the business. Their largest pan is about equal to ten ordinary ones. The daily average yield at present is about twenty-five bushels, but their operations are being largely extended, which it is thought will enable them to turn out double the present quantity, or about fifty bushels daily. They are producing a superior article of salt, which for whiteness and purity cannot be surpassed. The Bay Salt Works, about 300 yards distant, on the line of the railroad, and belonging to the same company, have also been erected with the same admirable arrangements, and are turning out about twenty-five bushels daily of the same quality of salt. These works afford the most complete evidence of what can be accomplished by skill and energy, combined with a liberal outlay of capital.

Upon the same wharf are the works of Messrs. Jno. Chalk and F. P. Seignious. Number of pans, four. Average daily yield, ten bushels.

Mr. F. A. Due is erecting his salt works upon this wharf. Number of pans six. Supposed average daily yield, ten bushels.

Steinmeyer's Salt Works.—(T. H. Dillingham, superintendent).—These works were erected in September, and are entitled to the credit of the first systematic arrangement for separating the bitter from the pure salt, and the plan of drying the salt in bins built over a ground flue for the chimney. They are well worth the examination of those about to begin the enterprise. Number of bushels daily, twenty.

Cannonboro Mill Salt Works.—P. V. Brandt, foot of Mill-street. Number of pans, twelve. Number of bushels per day, twenty-five. Mr. Brandt is producing a very superior article of fine salt, and also an excellent quantity of coarse salt for curing meat. Pressley and Dukes. Number of pans, three (large) and three boilers. Number of bushels, twenty. These works are making a specialty of the business in the manufacture of crystallized salt. They are entitled to the credit of being the first in the enterprise of salt making, having commenced in June 1862. Marchant and Carmalt. Number of pans, ten, very large, with a water capacity for 10,000 gallons. Number of bushels per day, twenty-five. The proprietors are extending their operations to increase the production to fifty bushels. Martin and Co. In course of erection.

Foreign Correspondence.

PARIS, January 20.

The diplomatic blue book, laid before the French Chambers since I last addressed you, contains a great deal of curious information, and when we reflect that only a selection of the documents received or forwarded by the French Foreign Office are published, the collection must be a very extraordinary one indeed, if, to use a homely French saying, we judge le sac sur l'étiquette.

The despatches are well worth perusal to all who are fond of political speculation, but their substance is all that the general reader probably cares for, and may be given in a condensed shape. Regarding Italy, we learn that the French Government soon after the accession of the new ministry at Turin, endeavoured through their Envoy, M. de Sartiges, did try and reopen the negotiations on the Roman question, i.e. on the basis laid down by M. Drouyn de Lhuys, that the possession of the Eternal City, by the King of Italy, should not be contemplated. This attempt only drew from the Italian ministers a reply, which the French Envoy properly enough described as a non possumus—"We had rather not negotiate. We thoroughly agree with our predecessors in office, that Rome belongs de jure to Italy—we differ from them only as to the expediency of negotiating on the subject." So far the Italians have the best of it, but it is impossible not to admire the skill with which French diplomatists cover their retreat. "Let the Roman question stand still then," says M. Drouyn de Lhuys; "but, above all, the parties at Rome and Turin must not be rash. Do not let them make any premature declaration, but trust to the chapter of accidents." And so the French Government, the Italian Government, and the Papal Government, like the celebrated Mr. Micawber, are waiting for "something to turn up."

The diplomatic papers published under the head "Rome," clearly set forth that M. Drouyn de Lhuys is, and wishes to be, on excellent terms with the Pope. As soon as the French ambassador, Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne, got out there, he received a despatch instructing him to convey to his Holiness his intention to make himself agreeable to his Holiness—an assurance which must have been very agreeable at the Vatican after the courteous hectoring of M. Thouvenel, and the crisp but equally courteous irony of M. de Lavalette—at the same time M. Drouyn de Lhuys shows himself aware that the position of France at Rome is one of considerable difficulty, and through M. de la Tour d'Auvergne he appeals to the Pope to make that position less difficult—could not his Holiness, by granting some of those reforms, the necessity of which he himself has admitted, enable the Government to shut the mouths of those horrible revolutionists who make a handle of every little abuse that may creep into even the beneficent rule of Pio Nono. The overture was well received, and Cardinal Antonelli promised that he would, before long, transmit to the nuncio of Paris, M. Chigi, but observing that these reforms would be of an "administrative and judicial character"—all moonshine exclaims the Opinion Nationale, Presse, Temps and Debats—they are indeed not likely to take any body in. At this stage of the blue book, England makes her appearance, and the tone of the despatches shows the unfriendly terms on which the Courts of Paris and London stand towards each other. Lord Russell accepting as true, a statement forwarded by Mr. Odo Russell, that 500 or 600 banditti in French uniforms, had been despatched from Rome, to carry on their depredations in the Neapolitan provinces, called M. Drouyn de Lhuys' attention to the fact in a despatch, which appears in some slight degree to have ruffled the equanimity of the French Secretary of State. His Excellency seems very indignant at the hint thrown out by the English Foreign Minister, that the "French flag extended its protection to brigandage," and a formal denial, accompanied with sundry cuts at Mr. Odo Russell's gullibility, which is very broadly implied, M. Drouyn de Lhuys states, for the information of M. de la Tour d'Auvergne, in particular, and that of the public in general, that he has lectured the British Government through Lord Cowley, and instructed the Marquis de Cadore to do the same thing in London, on their readiness in grounding scolding despatches on such preposterous canards.

The most extraordinary episode revealed by the correspondence on Italian affairs, remains, however, to be told. The Pope, in an interview with Mr. Odo Russell, having jocularly retorted in answer to a warm appeal on behalf of Italian unity, "Who knows? I may, after all, have to claim the hospitality of England." This was actually made the groundwork for a proposal by Earl Russell to take the Pope under his protection, and convey him to Malta on board the Mediterranean squadron! Fancy the writer of the celebrated Durham letter indulging in a diplomatic flirtation with the Pope!

the bitter opponent of "Ecclesiastical Titles" in England, contemplating the removal of the Holy See to English soil! Earl Russell evidently is determined to win distinction in one way, and pre-eminent in nothing else, seems bent to attain supremacy in ridicule.

The despatches relating to Servia, Montenegro, the Holy places and Mexico, contain nothing that is new, and the details they do contain are far from justifying by their interest or importance the space they occupy. Moreover, they are essentially retrospective, therefore, I will pass them over sub silentio, and come at once to the American correspondence.

It labours under the fault that a great deal of its interest is done away with by the rapid march of events in America. But every despatch shows that the French Government, though desirous to preserve the strictest neutrality, have long since come to the conclusion that has forced itself upon every impartial spectator of that gigantic conflict, that the Confederates are, at least, perfectly able to hold their own. So long ago as last July, M. Mercier communicated to the Government here his impression that the North were getting heartily sick of the war, and that the time was approaching when European mediation would be gratefully received. The success of the democratic party at the elections, appears to bear out the views of M. Mercier, but he naturally did not take into account the folly, the stubbornness, and the ravenous appetite for plunder of the adventurers, in whose hands chance and knavery have placed the Government of the North.

He could not well put down in a public despatch that there was no hope of a cessation of hostilities until the Staunton's, Cameron's, Butler's, and other leeches were fully gorged.

"Non missura cutem nisi plena cruoris hirudo."

The French Government appears to have energetically protested against the goings on of the miscreant Butler at New Orleans, and you will see from the despatches I subjoin, that M. Drouyn de Lhuys appears to have had some share in his removal from the scene of his iniquities. The despatches in question also give, you will perceive, some clue to the ultimate destination of Banks' expedition. It seems intended as a marauding trip to carry out Butler's system of plunder on a larger scale.

The French Minister at Washington writes to the Minister of Foreign Affairs under date of

"Washington, November 21, 1862.

"Monsieur le Ministre:—Your Excellency is aware that the Secretary of State has always shown himself very desirous of the European market being able to procure cotton, and that, unfortunately all his good intentions have failed before the exigencies of war, and the determination of the Confederates to burn their cotton rather than let it fall into the hands of the Federals.

"The Cabinet of Washington is now preparing a new attempt. It would consist in seizing the cotton, rice, tobacco, and sugar, wherever the Federal forces may penetrate, sending them to the principal Northern markets where they would be sold and the proceeds handed over to the proprietors who consent to take an oath of fidelity to the Union.

This project being in opposition to former engagements, according to which, neutrals were not to be impeded in the export of cotton which they might procure by ports occupied by the Federals; Mr. Seward wished previously to give notice to the French and English Legations, and to hear their remarks on it. After Lord Lyons and myself had consulted together, we told the Secretary of State that we could not say anything which would in the slightest way bind the responsibility of our Governments relative to such a measure; but we asked what would become of such produce which might belong to neutrals. He replied, that those estates would be respected, and that the owners would have the power of having their produce exported at the same time and by the same means as the American property seized by the Federal forces.

"I then asked him if he did not fear that the project in question might not have for result to cause the burning of all the produce which would be liable to seizure. He replied that he felt no uneasiness on that subject."

MERCIER.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs to the French Minister at Washington writes in reply:—

Paris, December 11, 1862.

"Sir,—The measures to which the Cabinet of Washington think of having recourse, in order to procure cotton for the European markets, have not appeared to me, any more than to you, as likely to lead to the desired result. The consequence would be fresh rigours for the South; but the planters have hitherto proved that they hesitated at no sacrifice for the defence of their cause, and there is therefore reason to doubt that the success of the combined expedition on the Mississippi and in Louisiana would be sufficient to induce them to deliver up their crops on the conditions which would be imposed on them. As to foreigners and to our fellow countrymen, experience has but too well proved how chimerical it would be to suppose that in such a case any regard would be had for their neutrality. What is taking place at New Orleans indicates clearly enough, the manner in which certain chiefs of the Federal forces, think they have a right to treat them, notwithstanding the different intentions which we doubt not actuate the Cabinet of Washington. Without wishing to any further discuss the projected means of coercion, I must tell you that as far as we are concerned we cannot find in the project or in the explanations which have been given to you on the subject, the guarantees by which we should be assured against the fresh injuries to which our fellow countrymen would probably be exposed from this project being carried into execution. I already know that such is also the impression of the English Government. The objections which at first presented themselves to your mind, are therefore conformable to our view of the matter, and it is consequently important that you should explain yourself very candidly on the subject to Mr. Seward.

I need not tell you that we shall hear with lively satisfaction that General Butler has definitively resigned the dictatorial powers with which it appears he has been invested at New Orleans. His departure will not for us constitute a solution of all the complaints which his administration has led to, but we hope that the proceedings of his successor will at least prevent an increase in their number.

DROUYN DE LHUYS.

Apropos of Butler, I am glad to see that one paper, at least, has had the honesty to come forward and describe that disgrace to humanity in his proper colours. M. Granier de Cassagnac, in the Nation, takes an opportunity to protest against the shameful apologies for this petty tyrant, which have defiled the columns of some of the Paris prints. I am not an admirer of M. Granier de Cassagnac, but on this occasion he has spoken well and manfully, and his article contrasts painfully with the Debats, which, partly through ignorance, partly through party spirit, has prostituted its talents to the defence of organized murder, robbery, and outrage. M. de Cassagnac writes:—

Whatever has been or may be, in Europe or in America, the opinions emitted on the causes, the effects, and the actors in the war in America, there is one man on whom a sad and formidable unanimity of sentiments has fallen—and that man is Butler. A lawyer by profession, and a general by chance, Butler in his list of services has only one battle, that of Big Bethell, which he lost. Being considered incapable of conquering men, he went to New Orleans to insult women. He has rummaged up to his elbows in the sack of malice and subtleties called the Anglo-Saxon code; he has derived from it exile of persons, confiscation of property, provocation of families, and outrages on Consuls, until at length the Government of Washington, uneasy at the opinion entertained in Europe, and weakened by the excesses of an agent who appeared charged to excuse the Separatists to the eyes of history, sent him his dismissal in a sealed letter, by the hands of General Banks, and as if fortune wished to prevent men from forgetting that she still has her caprices, she has raised up apologists for this man, who has acquired the hatred of his enemies without having had the esteem of his patrons or of his countrymen, and those apologists are the writers in the Debats. Butler would not have found apologists at New York, where the journals formerly published a letter from Mr. Reverdy Johnson, saying that the wrongs of the pro-Consul towards New Orleans, exceeded those of New Orleans towards the Union. He would not have found them at New Orleans, either among the inhabitants or among his own assistants. The population of New Orleans read, on the 8th of June, 1862, in the Delta, the official journal of Butler, his reply to the just and noble reclamations of the European Consuls, protesting against the famous general order No. 41, which pretended to make all the members of the foreign colony, so many spies, acting under oath, in the service of the Federal police. There is not a private individual who would tolerate for a moment the half of the sarcasms and insults, heaped more particularly on the French, in that shameful document; it required in order to suffer them the dignity of Governments placed in a sphere where nothing can reach them. Among the assistants of Butler, it is a matter of public notoriety at New Orleans, not one, neither Commodore Farragut, nor General Phelps, nor General Witzell, nor General Shepley, who did not publicly censure his conduct; and if, after having dismissed him the Washington Government, should decide in trying him, the future would show the results of the enquiry with which General Banks has been charged. Recalled by a sealed order, the contents of which he did not know, a quarter of an hour before it was signified to him, the General by chance, as he was designated by the Spanish consul, will be much surprised when he shall, in a few days, read in the Journal des Debats, that his army is the only one which had lived on its own resources. He will naturally conclude that people in Paris are ignorant of his General Order No. 91, dated November 9 1862, which declared the confiscation of the magnificent district of Lafourche, which is in Louisiana what Grand Terre is in Guadeloupe, as well as the order to Judge Bell, to Lieutenant-Colonel Kinsman and to Captain Fuller, the Provost-marshal of the district to deliver up to the officers on their receipts, all of whom they might stand in need for the United States' army.

The surprise of Butler will not be less in reading in the Journal des Debats that "his army has gained a decisive triumph" which will lead him to suppose that people in France are ignorant of the fact that on arriving before New Orleans and before Baton Rouge, the peaceable inhabitants surrendered, relying on his good faith; that all the efforts of his land and sea forces failed before Vicksburg, and that the troops of General Banks came precisely for the purpose of attempting in Louisiana what those of his predecessor could not accomplish. And if, which is impossible, General Butler thought that in leaving New Orleans when he was unexpectedly dismissed, he has achieved the dignity which the Journal des Debats awards to him, that dignity will protest against a panegyric from the nation which has been the most outraged by him.

The Constitutionnel to-day makes an extraordinary suggestion—that commissioners from the Northern and Southern States should meet at some neutral town and calmly discuss proposals for peace, whilst the fighting goes on without interruption on the other side of the Atlantic. The article appears in large type, but the plan does not appear to have any of the elements of success about it. The South would assuredly enter into no negotiations without securing as a basis the recognition of their independence, and that once obtained there would be no plausible reason for the continuation of the war.

The year has begun badly for the press. Warnings have been given to the Temps, the Courier des Demanche, the Revue Nationale the Opinion du Midi and the Journal de la Cote d'Or. There are evidently breakers ahead—and the moderate Liberal party seemed determined to try the issue whether calm, moderate, sensible discussion is finally to be put down by arbitrary caprice. I believe I am not far wrong in announcing that the next few months will witness a revival of political opinion, which mere avertissements will not be sufficient to put down.

A PAPER

CONTAINING A STATEMENT AND VINDICATION OF CERTAIN POLITICAL OPINIONS.

By the HON. W. B. REED, late U. S. Minister to China. Philadelphia: Published by John Campbell.

[This paper is meant for my neighbours and personal friends. It may, in the excitement of these times, have a wider interest than I now anticipate, and possibly be read by many of my fellow-citizens of Pennsylvania. Should it provoke hostile criticism, let it at least be understood as telling the truth, as I most sincerely believe it to be.]

With a strong sense of the duty of reserve in times of great public excitement, and the consciousness that a private citizen's conduct and opinions are of no interest beyond a very limited circle, I venture to make a personal appeal within that circle.

I am glad of the chance of speaking to my personal friends, and think it a duty, to my character and to my family, to put in a distinct and permanent form a brief and perfectly candid statement of my conduct and opinions in relation to the troubles of the country. If the irrationalism of the hour should soon or ever pass by, and law and good order, as guaranteed by the Constitution and a healthy public opinion be restored, this paper may serve as a private memorial of feelings and opinions of which my friends will have no reason to be ashamed. If not, and our doom of ruin be realized, it will be of little moment what I or any one else now think or say.

As this justification (if I may so describe it) is strictly personal, no apology is needed—certainly none to those who are interested from familiar and social relations—for referring briefly to the past.

Born and educated in Pennsylvania, my whole active life, excepting brief periods of absence in the public service, has been passed here. I have no private interests or family connections within the limits of the Confederate States. Time and distance and latterly the quick corrosion of civil war, have so completely worn away the few links which once bound me to Southern friends, that I dare call them so no longer. I have never, though a wide traveller elsewhere, crossed the border except once, thirteen years ago, on a professional errand to Norfolk and Richmond. I have no correspondent in the South, and have, since the beginning of the war, neither written nor received a letter to or from any individual there, except one to which special reference shall hereafter be made. The sentiment of local affection and State pride, which is now made matter of reproach to those who think as I do, is not a new one with me; and no man can point to any act or opinion of my life, public or private, inconsistent with this sense of duty.

Returning from abroad in the spring of 1859, I took relatively little part in the Presidential canvass of the next year, though feeling a deep interest, for I saw in the future, as clearly as I see in the ghastly present, that the triumph of the "Republican" party, with its aggressive doctrines and the radical and fanatical spirit which animated it, threatened the disruption and downfall of the Republic itself. The Chicago platform embodied a principle of revolution that has borne bloody fruits. There are those near and dear to me who know, what few out of my family suspected, that a secret fear—a fixed presentiment—of the misery to come, overshadowed my mind as early as October, 1860, when the State elections so surely foretold the Presidential catastrophe of a month later. I thought then that Mr. Lincoln's election would endanger Southern rights and interests, and that the South was in earnest. I hoped sincerely I might be mistaken; it turns out I was not.

In the anxious interval from the election to the inauguration, I was in no position to tempt me to action, or which authorized me to intrude my opinions on any one. According to my judgment, the President tried to do his duty faithfully. No advocate of a coercive policy can fairly blame him. He asked of Congress the means of defending the public property, and it refused to confer the powers which then everybody thought Congress only could authorize or delegate. The idea that any necessity could create or confer Executive power was held by no one. His reward has been denunciation on all sides—generally denunciation without knowledge or inquiry. His consolation must be that he shed no drop of blood, and violated neither the written word nor the animating spirit of the Constitution. By Mr. Buchanan, I never was consulted; and to him, in that interval, I never offered counsel. I wrote more than once to the Secretary of State, Mr. Black, and to the Attorney-General, Mr. Stanton, receiving replies in most instances to my letters; and this correspondence, should it ever see the light, will abundantly prove my fidelity to the Union, and the thorough sympathy then existing between us.

On the 17th of January, 1861, I took part in a town meeting at the National Hall in this city, at which a number of my most distinguished fellow-citizens spoke. Our object was to dissuade and oppose military coercion, and the inauguration of civil war by the act of the Federal Government; and never was there greater enthusiasm or unanimity manifested than on that occasion. There was perfect accord throughout. I did not prepare the Resolutions, though they were altered, and, as I then thought, amended by me. One, however, which has attracted much adverse criticism, was exclusively, in its origin, mine. It embodied my opinions when danger of disruption was at a distance. It expresses my opinions now, when it is a hideous reality. It was adopted with enthusiastic unanimity, and is in these words:

"Resolved, That in the deliberate judgment of the Democracy of Philadelphia, and, so far as we know it, of Pennsylvania, the dissolution of the Union, by the separation of the whole South—a result we shall most sincerely deplore—may release this Commonwealth from the bonds which now connect it with the Confederacy, and would authorize and require its citizens, through a Convention to be assembled for that purpose, to determine with whom their lot shall be cast; whether with the North and East, whose fanaticism has precipitated this misery upon us, or with our brethren of the South, whose wrongs we feel as our own, or whether Pennsylvania shall stand by herself, ready, when occasion offers, to bind together the broken Union, and resume her place of loyalty and devotion."

If the doctrine of this resolution,—if the assertion in clear terms of a local sentiment, and confidence that it alone can avail to protect us in the event of permanent dissolution,—if this be treason, then was I, and the thousands who cheered and voted for that resolution, guilty. It stated a proposition, which I hardly think can be disputed, that the separation, once accomplished, of the whole South, or the whole North, or the whole West, or the whole East, would radically affect the relations of the remaining States. It would dislocate them all. It would affect them as to debt, as to taxation, as to representation, as to foreign nations. Federal relations, thus impaired, are practically Federal relations no longer; and each State, without any act of its own, but literally by the force of circumstances, would be "released," and, being released, falls back on its own sovereignty. The resolution asserted this, and no more; and the time will come when it will be accepted as truth. I take the responsibility, if it involves censure, of having enunciated it.

From that day to this, I have never attended a political meeting or opened my lips in public.

From Mr. Lincoln's inauguration to the breaking out of hostilities, I was among those who silently hoped against hope. It was hard work to struggle against the discouragements of those days. The Peace Congress, which Pennsylvania, had she not been swayed by passion, might have influenced for good had passed away. The Crittenden compromise was rejected. The Cotton States, one by one, with a solemnity which should have been impressive, had declared themselves out of the Union; and the Republican party prepared to take possession of what was left of Federal authority. The snatches of speeches made by Mr. Lincoln, as he travelled from his home to the seat of government, enlightened nobody. The misty dreaminess of the inaugural depressed every one; and thoughtful men, at home and abroad, stood around like the puzzled questioners of the Oracle wondering what it really meant. The Cabinet was framed of a purely sectional basis, with a controlling influence of extreme men. No selection was made from the Border States, then as truly "loyal" as were New York and Ohio and Pennsylvania and Indiana. Whether there was any foundation for the rumour that Mr. Lincoln intimated a willingness to call a citizen of Virginia (Mr. Scott) to his Cabinet I know not; but I do know that that citizen, a steady, resolute Union man, now lies in his bloody grave at the foot of the Blue Ridge, murdered by one of Mr. Lincoln's German soldiers. So with the diplomatic appointments. All were given to one section,—or, if an exception to this occurred, it was that of some abolition Pariah from a slave State. Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, and Tennessee, in the distribution of this high patronage, were treated as if they had seceded, or could furnish no citizen fit to be trusted. With what seems to have been characteristic fatuity, political proscription was scornfully brandished in the face of the doubtful States. Mr. Seward long ago boasted that, with his consent, none but anti-slavery men should represent this country abroad,—and, for once, he kept his word. Mr. Giddings was sent as Consul-General to Quebec!

Then, in the months of March and April, 1861 came the interlude, if the word can be so applied, of the negotiations as to Fort Sumter, between the Confederate Commissioners and Mr. Seward. And on this point I feel authorized so far to interrupt my personal narrative as to adduce some unpublished testimony, if for no other reason, in order to do justice to a distant friend. I have said that since the troubles began I have had, with a single exception, no correspondent within the limits of the Confederate States. This exception is the Honourable John A. Campbell, of Alabama, formerly a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, whom I hope there is no offence in describing as an eminent jurist, a sound Union man till the policy of the Administration rendered Unionism in the South impossible, and a Christian gentleman. To him, having been honoured by his friendship previously, I wrote urging him to retain his place in the Federal judiciary. On the 5th of June, 1861, he answered my letter, and thus referred to his own patriotic agency in a last and ineffectual effort to keep the peace:—

"I suppose you must have seen my letters to Governor Seward in some of the Northern papers. There are some facts connected with them that I am glad to have an opportunity to communicate to you. When I visited Governor Seward, I had not had any communication with General Davis, or any member of the Executive Department of the Montgomery Government. The first knowledge I had of the demand of the Commissioners for recognition, or of Mr. Seward's embarrassment, was derived from Judge Nelson and Mr. Seward. I offered to write to General Davis and ask him to restrain his commissioners. I supposed that Mr. Seward desired to prevent the irritation and complaint that would naturally follow from the rejection of the Commissioners in the South, and the reaction that their expression (sic) would have at the North. He informed me that Sumter was to be evacuated, and that Mr. Weed said, 'This was a sharp and bitter pang, which he' (Weed) 'was anxious might be spared to them.' Mr. Seward authorized me to communicate the fact to the evacuation to Mr. Davis, and the precise object was to induce him to render his commissioners inactive. I did not anticipate having any other interview with Mr. Seward. I supposed that Sumter would be evacuated in the course of a very few days, and without any other action on my part. When upon the second and third interviews with him I found there was to be delay, I conversed with Judge Nelson as to the delicacy of my position, and it was at his suggestion and by his counsel that I agreed to be the 'intermediary' until Sumter was evacuated. Neither of us doubted that the fort was to be surrendered or abandoned. The first notice of any other disposition was communicated on the 10th of April. Colonel Lamont, the present Marshal of the District of Columbia, came to Washington with the family of Mr. Lincoln, I believe. He was with him at Washington in some familiar capacity. He visited Charleston in March, obtained access to Sumter, and left the impression on the mind of Governor Pickens that he was the agent of the Government, engaged in making arrangements for its evacuation. In the latter part of March, Governor Pickens sent a telegram to ascertain what had become of Lamont. I bore this to Mr. Seward, and he promised to inquire concerning him. His answer was that the President was concerned at any misconception of Lamont's words or visit, and desired me to converse with him; that Lamont did not visit Charleston for him, and was not commissioned to make any pledge or assurance to bind him. Mr. Seward said Lamont would be at the State Department for me to interrogate him. I declined to converse with Lamont, and recommended that he (Lamont) should himself write to Governor Pickens to explain the matter. I asked Governor Seward about the evacuation of the fort. Without any verbal reply, he wrote:—'The President may desire to supply Sumter, but will not do so without giving notice to Governor Pickens.' Upon reading this, I asked if the President had any design to attempt a supply of Sumter. His reply contained an observation of the President. That I pass. But he said he did not believe any attempt would be made to supply Sumter, and there was no design to reinforce it. I told him if that were the case, I should not employ this language,—that it would be interpreted as a design to attempt a supply, and that, if such a thing were believed in Charleston, they would bombard the fort—that they did not regard the surrender of Sumter as open to question, and when they did, they would proceed to extremities. He left the State Department, I remaining there till his return; and, on his return, he wrote these words:—(I am satisfied that) the Government will not undertake to supply Sumter without giving notice to Governor Pickens.' This excluded the matter of desire, and, with what had taken place, left the impression that if any attempt were made it would be an open, declared, and peaceful offer to supply the fort, which being resisted by the Carolinians, the fort would be abandoned as a military necessity and to spare the effusion of blood—the odium of resistance and of the evacuation being thrown upon the late Administration and the Confederate States. Had these counsels prevailed,—had the policy been marked with candour and moderation—I am not sure that even before this the fruit might have been seen ripening among the States in renewed relations of kindness and good will, to be followed ere long by a suitable political and civil union, adequate to the security of both sections at home and abroad. The ideas of union and a common country, as applied to all the States, are now simply obsolete."

This simple and precise narrative, introduced here as having been addressed to me, is, in the light of what has occurred since, a sad revelation, which needs no comment. Neither at home nor abroad does the Administration seem to have known that the best policy is fair play. I answered Judge Campbell's letter soon after its receipt, and, as evidence of my feelings and opinions then, I make an extract from my letter. "You speak of the united and resolute feeling at the South. Here it is very nearly as unanimous, and I can discern no signs of reaction. There are (I speak of this city) a few gentlemen who hold, as I do, to the doctrine of recognition and peace, but it would do neither us nor you any good to say so. There is a local sentiment which it is not graceful or proper to defy, and minorities must sometimes be silent. What is most painful is to be made conscious of the insensibility of those around me to the fearful infractions of the Constitution and conceded law which are daily occurring. Professors of elementary law teach their students that the President may suspend the Habeas Corpus Act. Learned and hitherto patriotic men, admitting the acts of the President to be wrong, justify the outrages on the ground of State necessity. This is worse than the other; and this it is which alarms me as a Northern man and one whose lot must be in the North. While, according to Mr. Russell, the South Carolina gentlemen want an old-fashioned monarchy, we, without talking about it, are sliding down into something quite as bad."

So I wrote a year ago; and there has been a fearful decade since. I received from Judge Campbell another long and interesting letter, dated at Warrenton, Virginia, July 27th, five days after the Federal defeat at Manassas, from which I extract a few lines, on which I need make no remark. "The battle-ground of Manassas," he wrote, "is near me, and, both before and since the battle, I have been upon it. I came on the field early on Monday morning, before sunrise. I carried with me water, ice, food, and medicines, to alleviate whatever suffering I could find. I found there wounded soldiers from New Hampshire, Vermont, Maine, and New York, in numbers, who had received no attention. I was told of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Connecticut men elsewhere." To this letter I replied in a few lines, there being no interdiction of friendly correspondence; but my letter never reached Judge Campbell, having come into the possession of the Federal Postmaster at Philadelphia, who carried it to Washington, where the seal was broken and the letter read. This piece of gratuitous infamy was at the time made matter of boasting by the individual who perpetrated it. Had one word to or from me offensive to the authorities at Washington been found in this or any other manipulated letter, I presume the supervision would have been still more boldly avowed and justified. As it is, it constitutes an element in the long list of petty and unnecessary outrages of which the police-agents of the Federal Government have been guilty.

With the exception of my correspondence with Judge Campbell, every word of which is at the service of the Government, I have neither written nor received a letter to or from any human being in the Confederate States.

On the 15th of April, 1861, the news of the fall of Fort Sumter reached Philadelphia. The excitement, though great, was not such as the political adherents of the Administration desired, and, in order to promote it, what was called a "loyal" mob was organized, and for two days paraded our streets, visiting the houses of those whom it pleased to suspect, and exacting some absurd profession of sympathy from the inmates. This mob was not dangerous, only because it was contemptible. My house was visited during my absence in court, and I knew nothing of the danger to my family—if there were any—till it was over. A negro servant who had accompanied me to Chiua happened to recollect that a flag was stowed away in the house, and, on his displaying it, the ruffians who had tried to frighten my wife and little children dispersed. I should hardly have referred to this miserable attempt at popular disturbance, had not leading members of the Republican party, stipendiaries of the Government, very recently in public expressed their approval of what was then done, and advised its repetition. I have always regarded this outrage on my home with deep and yet contemptuous resentment, and was willing to attribute it to the agency of misguided and irresponsible men. Now that it has been thus endorsed, I desire to be understood as concentrating and intensifying upon those who approve it the feeling which I have, I hope, intelligibly described. No one with the instincts of gentlemen would have approved of it.

Since that time fifteen months have elapsed, during which there has been a persistent attempt, never for a moment intermitted, to direct popular prejudice against me. I have neither time or inclination (for it is a most painful retrospect) to refer to it, except in this general way. Were the crisis less momentous, or the perils involved less alarming, one might smile at the grotesque variations which my personal and political enemies have played on the one strain of calumny of my conduct, my motives, my opinions. Not a week, certainly not a fortnight, has passed, without my name being printed in prominent type in connection with every species of disparaging imputation, and I have been compelled to see foolish and credulous readers believing, willingly or reluctantly, these allegations. I have been accused of having correspondence with the Confederate Government, or individuals in the Confederate States; of writing to my friends abroad in favour of intervention; of planning treason when alone, or in conjunction with other gentlemen, whose names are occasionally introduced to relieve the monotony of spite; of directing the action of the Democratic party, to which I am proud to belong, but which, in its rising power and increasing energy, needs no guidance of mine; in short, of exercising all the faculties of a mind fertile of mischief to the injury of my country and my State. Little do the men who scatter these venomous slanders care how deeply they wound the helpless and the innocent,—how they disturb family and social relations, and embitter the poor residuum of kind feeling which civil strife permits to exist. They cater to the prevalent prejudice of the hour. They fling their share of detraction, and are content. The graves of the dead, of those very dear to me, are not sacred; and I have had the feelings of members of my family outraged by insults to the memory of those we love in common. The writer of a pamphlet (for I have had elaborate pamphlets printed about me), a person whom to my knowledge I have never seen, and whom certainly I have never intentionally injured, dragged before the public the character of my dead brother, only to give a sting to his vituperation on me, and tried to make the widow and children of that brother think disparagingly of one whom they are willing to love and trust. There has been no remission of paltry and elaborate malignity; and I regret being obliged to say that the diseased public, even around my own home, have seemed to enjoy it. No word of reply has ever been made by me. No word of defence has been uttered for me. Persons conducting newspapers in Philadelphia who, when we meet, profess to be friendly, have either been afraid to utter one word in my justification, though they knew the accusations were false, or else have been, by jobs and contracts and offices, bought up to connive at wrong. At one time last summer (1861) it was positively announced in the telegraphic columns, then, I believe, as now, under the censorship of the Executive, that I and other well-known gentlemen of Philadelphia had been arrested and put into a military prison—a rumour calculated to do harm in more respects than one, and to alarm distant relatives and friends and business correspondents; and yet to this hour, except in one instance, it has not been contradicted by a single Philadelphia editor. So it has been with everything, till at last, as a natural consequence, a state of feeling has been generated, a currency of calumny created by these coiners of petty and malignant falsehood, which makes this reluctant vindication necessary.

To this torrent of defamation, of suspicion, and dark imputation, I can oppose but this,—an emphatic and most conscientious denial of the truth of any one assertion about me, or the justice of any accusation against me. If I could make it a more comprehensive I should do so. If I could be sure of being able to track out each individual slander, I should be glad to stamp it with indignant or contemptuous denial. It is impossible to do this within ordinary limits. I pronounce them false, one and all, in the aggregate and in detail. I go further, and, with equal emphasis, pronounce them wilfully false. No act, or written or spoken word, can be traced to me during the dreary year which has just expired, or at any time, inconsistent with reverence for the Constitution, and implicit obedience to the law. If there could have been, I do not doubt that long ere this I should have shared the captivity of those who for more than a year have been immured, without a hearing or a responsible accuser, in the military prisons of New York and New England.

It would be affliction to pretend that acquiescence in this great injustice has not required much self-control. I have felt, however, that it was useless to contend with popular passion. It was better to endure all in silence, waiting for the sure reaction, sooner or later, when truth shall triumph, and, unless the great machinery of constitutional government be torn to pieces and we are all crushed in its ruins, the triumphant standers of to-day shall find a fearful and unforgiving retribution.

Desiring this exposition of my acts and feelings to be candid and complete, I desire to refer to the only exception to the self-imposed rule of abstinence from anything like interference in current politics, and to my actual opinions on public affairs. I am not ashamed of what I have done, or of the political faith I most religiously hold and which I now, for the first time, formally express. I rather reproach myself for having done so little. But that I have been raised by the active malignity of my enemies to the distinction which their slanders confer, my opinions would be of interest to no one. As it is, I choose, with a full sense of my responsibility, to make them known.

When Mr. Lincoln's first annual Message was communicated to Congress, it was accompanied, or rather immediately preceded, by a huge volume of diplomatic correspondence, chiefly from the pen of the Secretary of State, Mr. Seward. I read it with curious expectation and with grievous disappointment. The literary execution was, in my opinion, so deplorably bad—its political heresies so redundant—its effect abroad, it seemed to me, so discreditably to our character for scholarship and statesmanship—the ostentatious manner in which, in advance, it was given to the public, was so irregular, the sarcasm implied in its being printed by the English Ministry and laid before Parliament so palpable, and the self-complacency in which, bound and adorned with gilding, it was presented to the Pope, as a rare specimen of American political literature, to be treasured with palimpsests and missals on the shelves of the Vatican, so exquisitely absurd, that I could not resist the temptation to adverse criticism, and wrote and published a "Review of Mr. Seward's Diplomacy," prefacing it with a sentence of almost inspired eloquence from Burke—the awful truth of which haunts me every hour and moment that I watch and mourn over my country's downfall and dishonour. My review was not meant to transgress the limits of fair literary criticism, and I do not think it did. It was begun in a tone of pleasantry, excited by the grotesque rhetoric in which the Secretary indulged: though it became graver and graver as I advanced through what seemed to me the worse than errors of his foreign policy. It was printed privately, and this for the obvious reasons that such criticisms are most graceful if anonymous; and for another, which the course of the Administration in "abridging the freedom of speech" made operative,—a fear of personal inconvenience. There was throughout what I described as "a reserve prompted by considerations of personal safety." The success of this pamphlet was very great. The reluctance of timid or mercenary publishers to circulate it rather stimulated the desire to read it. It was extensively read at home and abroad, and quickly passed through two large editions—a proof not so much of its own merit, as of the readiness of the popular mind to avail itself of free and decorous discussion of public men and public affairs, and its restlessness under the shackles which the Government was trying to impose on it. The popular heart, sick of the wretched trash which, day after day, dribbles through the columns of degraded and mercenary newspapers, turned readily and gratefully to free thought expressed in plain English. Mine, too, was the first of a series of Philadelphia essays which soon after appeared, showing that the love of liberty and law, and the talent to make it known and felt, was as active as ever, at least among my professional brethren. My little pamphlet, imperfect as it was, (and no one saw its blemishes and shortcomings more plainly than its author), led the way in what I sometimes fear was the forlorn hope of a subjugated community. It proved the truth might be safely uttered; but it did not abate the bitter animosity which had been directed against me.

In that pamphlet I used these words, which then, as now, embody my flickering hope in the dreadful crisis at which we have arrived:—"If by any method of war the Government can be restored to what it was before this fearful strife began, let us pray for the early consummation with the least possible bloodshed, and with every merciful appliance of pardon and amnesty and reconciliation that can be devised; and if it cannot—if peace and separation be inevitable—let us hope for the coming man amongst ourselves who shall have the mental and moral elevation to see the reality soonest, and not shrink from its recognition; who will bend all the energies of a great mind (for such must be his) to let the separation be made without further convulsion or more ghastly fears."

More than six months have rolled by since these words were written. The methods of war, developed with all the energy which money, and men, and evil passions, and individual courage supply, have been exhausted. At least a quarter of a million of Northern men (without any computation of Southern victims) have perished on the field or in the hospital, or returned mutilated to their homes. Millions of hopeless debt, national or local, have been piled up. Private fortunes are tottering on the edge of ruin; industry is palsied, and public bankruptcy at hand. Voluntary enlistments are not stimulated by bounties; and the tax-gatherer, and what for want of better word I must call the press-gang, stand ready to start on their relentless errand. More than this: every day dissipates some theory of conquest or submission, widens the awful chasm that separates us from our brethren of the South, and renders more probable the stupendous shame of European intervention,—not merely recognition, but active military interposition, which at once settles the contest to our ignominy, and adds bitterness to the cup of degradation, for the surrenders we have made to avert it.

Why, then, in this agony of our republican and American faith, may not words of counsel for peace be tolerated? Why must they be crushed out as treasonable? Why should a Northern man be mobbed, and insulted, and proscribed, and imprisoned, because, with the experience of the bloody past and the prospect of the bloodier future, he speaks out in favour of peace? There are thousands who think exactly as I do, who are timid and silent; men of families dependent or dispersed, capital endangered, industry threatened; fathers and mothers who are praying, too often, alas! in vain, for the return of their children from the battle-field and camp; there are hundreds of thousands of these, silent and anxious now, who will rejoice in ecstasy beyond control when the word of pacification is spoken and the flag of permanent truce be displayed at Washington and Richmond. I am old enough to remember the peace of 1815 and the joy it gave; but that joy was as nothing to what it will be when this sad fraternal strife is over and peace be made. It will brighten the crest of the statesman who accomplishes it.

These I frankly avow to be my wishes and opinions as to the immediate future. They aim at once at Peace; and when, without offence or disrespect, the questions are put to me whether I would give up without a struggle the Union and Government which two years ago existed, and how, if the power were mine, I would arrange the terms of recognition and separation, I now have no difficulty in answering.

In the first place, I think there has been a struggle with at most a questionable success; and if the choice be between the continuance of the war, with its attendant suffering and demoralization, certain miseries and uncertain results, and a recognition of the Southern Confederacy, I am in favour of recognition,—of course, making the Abolition party responsible for this dread necessity. The blood of the Union is on them.

If it be a choice between the slow, but ultimately successful conduct of the war, the subjugation of the Southern States, their tenure as mere military provinces, involving of course a radical change in the political organization of the triumphant North, so as virtually to abrogate State rights, and create a centralized domination with all the heresies of the day engrafted and peaceable recognition, I still prefer recognition.

To continue a war to the bitter end of mutual ruin for a mere point of honour, or from temper, is mischievously absurd. The moment a practical result becomes impossible, as I think it now is, the war ought to cease; and it is the part of true statesmanship to discern in advance when the moment is coming.

If the inquiry be further pressed as to how I would arrange the terms of pacification and recognition, and adjust the difficulty of boundaries and river rights, my answer is, I would begin by a cessation of hostilities and armistice for a fixed period, not too short. It is the idlest of delusions to imagine that in the heat and smoke of actual conflict we can make our plans for the future, or even see what that future is likely to be. If arms were laid down for a time, there would be a repugnance to take them up again, which of itself would be favourable to satisfactory adjustment. This, I am quite aware, is but postponing the inevitable decision which sooner or later must be made; and I do not hesitate to say that, dodge and defer it as we may, in my opinion the decision—I mean as to limits, and possibly as to debt—must be made by the States and their citizens, acting as they did when seventy years ago they entered into the Federal compact. There is no other conceivable mode. Maryland and Kentucky, after all, each for herself will have to determine where her lot shall be cast, and what her pecuniary liability must be, whether for a share of the Federal or of the Confederate debt, or whether to be exempt from both. What Maryland and Kentucky do, Pennsylvania and Ohio have a right to do. This settles the question of boundaries, and nothing else will; and if the decision involves the abandonment of Washington, and leaving it a monument of what was once the capital of a great Republic, be it so. I would rather see it a ruin than what it is now—the garrison town of an uncertain frontier, a mere barrier-fortress,—a huge encampment of half-tenanted houses, deserted by respectable inhabitants, and given up to the occupation of jobbers and contractors, and disreputable men and women of all descriptions. These are sad realities, but they must be looked at. Our mistake all along has been a reluctance to look realities in the face.

If this were to be the action of the several States as to limits, and the two Confederacies are, by the voluntary action of the States, ultimately established and defined, surely to them may be left the really international question as to the navigation of the Mississippi. The citizen of the North-West would, it seems to me, be better content, and have greater security for unimpeded commerce than he has now, or can have for a long time to come, with New Orleans under stern martial law, held by one belligerent, and Vicksburg by another, and when no craft but a ram or an iron-clad gunboat dare venture from Cairo to Baton Rouge. One of the first legislative acts, yet in full force, of the Confederate Government, was to declare the peaceful navigation of the Mississippi free to the citizens of any of the States on its border or the borders of any of its tributaries.

There was once another hope of peaceful solution, which I record here merely to show how anxiously my mind has dwelt on this one subject of pacification. It rested, like all else, on the postulates of armistice and recognition. That a National Convention, or, more properly, Congress, should convene at Annapolis, or some other central point, under State authority, into which the States should come as independent Powers—South Carolina and Pennsylvania, Virginia and New York—and deliberate on matters of common concern, deciding them by the processes which regulate the action of such bodies, subject to ratification. I once hoped that, could such a body be convoked, the pressure from without, to say nothing of the sentiment within, which, when the war is over, and not till then, will have free scope, would compel some sort of reconstruction, or new Federal relations. The necessity of a provision for the public debt, South as well as North, creates an influence that might be operative. This, I repeat, was once a hope; but it has been washed away in a torrent of blood. Still, a National Convention, or State Conventions, with that view, ought to be the watchwords of the Conservative North from this time forth.

Should, however, all appeals to reason and gentleness fail and the iron determination be adhered to at any cost to carry on and perpetuate this desolating war, does it occur to any mind, as it has like a phantom to mine, what may be the consequence? The tides of war—the ebb and flow of victory and defeat—are very uncertain. There is a pause in the current just now; but who can tell at what moment it may burst upon us in aggressive hostilities, made unsparing by the example we have set? The horror and inevitable suffering of such a reverse I do not care to allude to. I never read the truer rhetoric with which our Northern newspapers describe the devastation of Virginia without a thought of possible misery here at home. And has not the idea occurred to other minds, that, in the course of events—the character and tendency of which no one can venture to foretell (for the sealed book of our revelations we are not worthy to open)—discontent—the sense of weariness and perplexity—the sinking of the heart at sounds, and sights, and news even, of distant woes, the restlessness of an agitated and saddened people, may find utterance, and portions of the Middle and all the Western States, if not now, by-and-by, wearied with sorrow, and shame, and bloodshed, and debt, weary of the recruiting sergeant and the tax-collector, of the ambulance of the wounded, and the hearse of the dead, may become reconciled to changes more momentous still? The very Union sentiment which has been so sedulously cultivated—the idea of indissolubility—of one nation and one government that cannot be loosened or broken asunder—may suddenly take this form of expression; and the fanatics of the North, who, when the day of terror comes, will be glad enough to let the South go may find a Government and a Union they little dream of. As I write these words of sombre forecast, I am deeply impressed by what was recently said in Dublin by the Roman Catholic Archbishop of New York, who is not only, in the current phrase of the day, a loyal man, but has been recently in the service of the Federal Government. "In this difficulty," said Archbishop Hughes, "the country that was one, not more than three years ago, is now divided into two—that is, on the battle-field—but not two in civil order. It is one country still, and must and shall be one. No matter what may occur—no matter what the foreign interference, whether military or naval, that may destroy the cities round the borders of that country—no matter what may occur, the question must end as I have described, that people shall remain one; and if the party that is nominally called rebel—the term I don't use in respect to them at all—if that party shall triumph, then I will transfer my allegiance to that party; not as a party, but as the legitimate Government of the United States." These are not my words, nor words of the class of thinkers to which I am supposed to belong. They are the bold expression of the inner thought of an eminent man of high intelligence and extended forecast; and who shall say that there is not a wide sympathy throughout the North which some day may find fearful utterance? Then may come anarchy and internecine strife; then comes to us our share of those awful miseries which now afflict Kentucky and Tennessee and Missouri, where brother is literally armed against brother, and child against parent.

These are solemn, perhaps perilous, truths, and I write them with hesitation; but they have struck me deeply and painfully, and my task is to write the truth. They imply, I am quite aware, a distrust of the permanence and genuineness of the present excitement in the North, and a want of confidence in what is now known as Northern patriotism,—comprising in that word not merely transient enthusiasm, but the elements of official integrity and public virtue. I regret to say I have no such confidence; and the conviction which most depresses me, and makes me turn sadly away from any hope of remedy, is, that there will be no anchorage when the storm is over. Let any one look back on the legislative history of most of the Northern States for the last twenty years—each year worse than the one that went before—and, if he care for truth, he will admit what I have said. And if it be contended that this rich iniquity, running through every branch of administration, is but the canker of a long peace, let him look to the record of war, its catalogue of rascality and peculation, its novel nomenclature of crime, its "shoddy," its gun and blanket and ship contracts, and say if it is any better in war than in peace. The Indiana bond forgery occurred in the very agony of the war, and was concealed, if not compounded, in order to protect Federal credit, and not to discourage subscriptions to the loans of the Government; and will any man, the veriest optimist who lives, tell me that in his conscience he looks with faith to the payment—even to the extent of its appalling interest—of the war debt, which we are rolling up so fast—its thousands, or hundreds of millions, funded and unfunded,—without counting the millions by-and-by for claims and damages and pensions, or the contingent cost of negro deportation and colonization? It is a grave subject, this of public credit, on which no one should talk lightly. Its abuse and its disparagement are alike, though not equally mischievous. But the fear and the belief of every thoughtful man must at this moment be that, unless some limit to new debt be soon imposed, when payday comes there will be a race among the States of the North as to further disintegration, and an effort in this way to escape from the overpowering burthen of desperate indebtedness. If things go on as they are now doing, there will be no law by that time to guard contracts and pecuniary rights. Foreign capitalists see this; and, from violations of the Constitution in one direction, draw the natural inference that it will not avail as a security in another. The home victims of passionate credulity will awaken to this reality by-and-by, and those who have stabbed the Constitution, and their apologists, will have no right to complain if the lawlessness they have initiated returns to plague its inventors in the form of gigantic repudiation or bankruptcy.

This sounds like despair. It is kindred to it; and it is what every thinking man feels. Even thus despondent, I am quite willing, within my limited sphere, to act, to bear my share of the burthen, however heavy, and scrupulously to obey the law. Hence it is that, even in this hour of gloom, I yet cling to the faith embodied in the Philadelphia resolutions of January 1861—that possibly the independent or concurrent action of the great Middle States, swayed by a sentiment of local fidelity—especially the action of Pennsylvania—may be invoked to save us, not from present disunion, for that cannot be averted, but from the anarchy which is at hand—closer than we imagine—or from some new form of consolidated government alien to our habits and education, which is sure to be conjured out of the seething cauldron of civil war.

In common with all considerate men, I look forward with deep solicitude to the elections which are to occur this autumn. Should the thirteen voting States exhibit a unanimous revolt from the policy of the Lincoln Government, it may in some mode, inscrutable, I admit, to my perplexed vision, lead to a revival or restoration of the Union. It assuredly will, to a termination of this bloody war. No Administration can resist such a warning or stand against such an alienated constituency. But it is well to look to the alternative result: of a divided North—divided, I mean, in opinion—with New York and New England, or even isolated New England, voting one way, and the great Middle States another. Proud, then, may be the position, solemn the responsibility, of those who live in the belt of territory extending from the Northern line of Pennsylvania and the Lakes to the Potomac and Ohio—from the Atlantic to the Mississippi—citizens of the great central sovereignties, New Jersey, (bravest and truest of them all) and Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, if, resisting the blandishments and the threats of Executive authority they shall assert by their votes loyalty to the Constitution in its strictest sense and closest obligation, and their determination to arrest the raging course of fanaticism, and a resolution that the tide of aggressive war shall sweep over them no longer. The Middle States may save themselves, if they will.

W. B. REED.

Chestnut Hill, near Philadelphia, August 14th, 1862.

The text of the preceding pages was written at the time it is dated. Three months have since rolled by, and we are no nearer a military result than we were then. One hundred thousand Northern men—or, on an average, since the 14th of August, more than a thousand a day, gathered in fearful heaps—have died, or been sent sick or wounded home. The funded national debt—to say nothing of local indebtedness—growing at the rate of sixty thousand dollars every waking and sleeping hour, reaches now to some uncertain line between six hundred and sixteen hundred millions. Pennsylvania's share of the Federal interest alone, counting the Confederate States back again in the Union, is more than half of the principal of her own debt at the beginning of the war. The precious metals still fly openly or stealthily away—the paper currency having sunk twenty per cent. in the last two months; and yet, as it seems, we are no nearer to restoration by the process of war, no nearer to conquest, to subjugation—certainly not to reconciliation and peace. A bloody victory tomorrow will bring us no nearer. A winter campaign wastes energy, but chills no animosities.

One or two supplementary remarks the lapse of time enables, and the course of public events requires, me to make. They are in part gloomy and in part consolatory. The reader acquainted with my habits of thought may wonder why, in these pages of adverse criticism, I have not dwelt more on the infractions of personal rights and liberty which have occurred. It is not, I can truly say, from insensibility to their enormity, but rather because they have been so freely and boldly exposed and discussed by others. There are two, however, affecting citizens of this Commonwealth, which I must, in passing, notice, though without elaborate comment or illustration. One is that of Mr. Winder, who for fourteen months has been imprisoned in a distant fortress on a simulated warrant of arrest—which had it been genuine would have been illegal—and who is still kept there, in flagrant defiance of adjudicated law. The other is one which cries loudly for redress, and to which, as it seems to me, sufficient attention has not been paid. It is the more momentous because it involves the State authorities in grave responsibility. On the 6th August, 1862, James Wadsworth, of New York—a Federal military officer and titular Governor of the District of Columbia—came with a guard to the capital of Pennsylvania, and, without warrant or authority of law, seized at night, and carried away to prison out of the State, four well-known and respectable and, as the result showed, innocent citizens, and this, too, under the very eye of the Governor and his Cabinet. They were taken, imprisoned, and discharged, and, so far as the public is apprised, no one word of remonstrance or protest, or even intercession, has been uttered in their behalf. Their wrong remains unredressed to this hour.

Proudly, even in this hour of gloom, may we turn from this picture of individual wrong to that of great Commonwealths rising, as did Pennsylvania and Ohio and Indiana a month ago, and by unbought and unterrified suffrage speaking out in behalf of the ancient Constitution. It makes one hope against hope. As I write, the results of the elections North and East are not definitively known, but, be they what they may, I reiterate the hope I have already endeavoured to make intelligible, that while a united North may yet save us from the gulf, on the perilous edge of which we stand, yet should, in the providence of God, the spirit of topical fanaticism which has brought all this misery upon us still maintain its sway, it may be the destiny of these great Middle States to speak, and, if need be, to act in self-defence, and in maintenance of all that is left of constitutional liberty in the fragmentary and shattered Union which survives. They may act together, or they may act separately. Within each of them is the perfect machinery of Government; and all that is wanted is an animating and practical spirit of local loyalty. It may be that one man can supply that spirit; and it is in the hope that these fugitive words of earnest suggestion, rather than of counsel, may find an answer in the heart of the people, that they are given to the public. "How often," wrote a great man, amidst the awful social convulsions of the last century, "how often has public calamity been arrested on the very brink of ruin by the seasonable energy of a single man. Have we no such man among us? I am as sure as I am of my being that one vigorous mind, without office, without situation, without public functions of any kind (at the time when the want of such a thing is felt), I say, one such man, confiding in the aid of God, and full of just reliance in his own fortitude, vigour, enterprise, and perseverance, would first draw to him some few like himself,—and then that multitudes, hardly thought to be in existence, would appear and troop about him."

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Boulevard-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

Agency for the Continent: G. FOWLER, 279, Rue St. Honore, Paris.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 22, 1863.

What Prevents the Recognition of the Confederate States?

Does any one doubt that if Government were to meet Parliament with a proposal to end the American war by the recognition of the Confederate States, the proposal would be received with acclamation? Does any one doubt that if the leaders of the Opposition were to give the signal, either Government would offer no resistance, or the triumphant majority would be swelled even from the Ministerial benches? These are admitted facts, which have become elementary maxims in all considerations of the American question, from whatever point of view. The members in either House who desire the success of the North, or would oppose the recognition of the South, if proposed by competent authority, can be counted on one's fingers. On this question men are not divided into hostile camps by party lines. There is no public sentiment arrayed against it; on the contrary, nine-tenths of every great party and of every really influential class are sincere well-wishers of the South, and anxious for the termination of a useless contest. Other measures, of less imperative urgency and less momentous in their consequences, have, within our time, convulsed the country with agitation and roused the bitterest and most relentless enmity. This measure, the most important of the day, and the most necessary, would scarcely raise a ripple on the surface of public opinion, would surprise no one, and would encounter serious opposition nowhere. What, then, prevents the recognition of the Confederate States?

Arguments in favour of this most simple and only effective mode of ending a disastrous war suggest themselves to every mind, are in everybody's mouth, and are naturally and logically deduced from obvious principles of policy, humanity, and justice. It exhausts the skill of ingenious casuists to show any reasons, approaching to the dignity of arguments, why the Confederate States should not be recognized as a nation. Is it because these States lack the population, the territorial extent, or even the historic character, which entitle them to be considered as a nation? They have a population one-third as large as that of Great Britain, they occupy a territory many times greater than that of the most powerful Continental monarchy, they have for nearly two years maintained vast armies in the field and made the world ring with brilliant deeds by land and by sea. Is it that the stability of their Government, its hold upon the loyalty of its citizens, or its ability to defend itself against all attacks, have not yet been exposed to a sufficient test? Few Governments have ever had to call upon a people for similar sacrifices of blood and treasure; few have ever met with so unanimous and devoted a response; loyalty has been unshaken even in conquered cities, and resisted alike the influence of bribes and threats; a million of armed men have been hurled against this Government, hundreds of millions of money have been expended to overthrow it, and to-day it is stronger, morally and physically, than when the attempt was first made. Is it because the Confederate States have municipal institutions repugnant to us that we should not recognize them as a nation? We treat as diplomatic equals Spain and Brazil, who both maintain the same institution in a far more repugnant form; Russia, which but yesterday had forty millions of white serfs; we are close allies of Turkey, whose manners and religion are crimes in our eyes; we even hold official intercourse with the savages of Dahomey and Ashantee. The admission of a political fact is a very different thing from the admission of a moral principle, or the approval of a governmental theory. As well might we refuse to recognize the political existence of France because trial by jury is not administered according to our ideas of justice, or that of Russia because the use of the knout and the pléte prevails with undiminished cruelty, as to make the civil status of a portion of its population the cause of our refusal to recognize the political existence of the Transatlantic Confederation. By an exact parity of reasoning we should refuse to recognize or hold converse with the United States even at the present day. Is it because the war in America has not lasted long enough, has not brought evil and misery sufficient in its train, that we should not exercise the power we have of ending it? The most fanatical champion of the North cannot deny that the patience of England heretofore has been at a cost less only than that incurred by the combatants themselves.

It is seldom that now, in the second year of the war, any such objections as these we have recited are seriously advanced against the recognition of the Confederate States, at least by men who value a reputation for common sense. More usually the admissions are freely made that the new Confederation has exhibited all the conditions of a vigorous and self-sustaining nationality; that its overthrow by any efforts its adversaries can bring against it is no longer within the range of probability, or indeed of possibility: even Mr. John Bright admits that the question of slavery does not enter into the political relations of Governments; it is further admitted on all hands, that in remaining a passive spectator of the war, this country resists the promptings of the most powerful motives of self-interest;—yet, when all these admissions are made, we stop short of the irresistible logical conclusion. To escape this conclusion the opponents of recognition take refuge in certain vague and contradictory assertions. Thus it is said that recognition is dangerous, that it is useless, and sometimes even, that it is unnecessary. It does not appear to occur to these special-pleaders that the first duty of a great nation is to be just, that an act of justice can never be unnecessary or useless, and that it is weakness or cowardice to delay it because it is dangerous. To this plea of danger, a strange one to set up for the acceptance of the English people, we have, however, already replied more at length elsewhere. Suffice it here to say that it would surpass all precedents of human folly, were a man, whose left arm is palsied, to cut off voluntarily his right arm as well,—were the North, having failed in its enterprises by land, to shut itself out from the high seas. The plea of uselessness is, with characteristic inconsistency, always made by those who are most forward in threatening the British empire with the wrath and vengeance of the Yankees. If those threats be well founded, recognition must, in the opinion of those who make them, result in an instantaneous abandonment of all attempts upon the South, for the most bigoted of worshippers of the "Model Republic" will not believe it capable of making war at the same time in the South and in Canada, against the armies of Jefferson Davis and the fleets of Great Britain. Recognition cannot be at once dangerous and useless; but it may and will be neither. If it were useless the South would not so earnestly desire, nor the North so zealously deprecate it. We need not here recapitulate the arguments with which our readers are familiar, which show that recognition by foreign Powers must be the inevitable preliminary to any proposals of peace from either of the belligerents. An able writer has aptly paraphrased and compressed them by saying, "Recognition is the cut which severs the mortified limb from the suffering body. The patient will resist the operation so long as he can, and must not be expected to perform it himself; but when it is over he thanks God for it."

The last plea, that recognition is unnecessary, deserves special examination, since it is intended to impose upon many whose sympathies are active in behalf of the South. It is argued that recognition is unnecessary, because the independence is already secured beyond all hazard, and the object of British policy is therefore attained without the necessity or risk of further action. But why should the independence of the South be a British object? Primarily, because the consummation of that independence opens to British industry and commerce the most lucrative and necessary market of the inhabited globe. So long as the Southern ports are sealed, the plantations wasted and abandoned, what matters it to British interests whether the authority of Jefferson Davis is spontaneously obeyed, or that of Abraham Lincoln enforced, in Nashville or New Orleans? Secondly, it should be a British object, in the adjustment of the balance of power in the New World, to secure a sincere friend and a powerful ally. Can we expect to find the friend in the people of the South if we alienate their affections by pertinaciously withholding, and causing others to withhold, in this great crisis, a simple act of justice? And further, if this war smoulders on, as unquestionably it will if not extinguished by Europe, until it shall have consumed the vitals of the South as well as the prosperity of the North, shall we find in a pauperized country either a powerful ally or a profitable customer? The cotton fields of America have yielded to England a richer harvest than they have to their owners. If England can forego the wealth these fields have brought to her, can at the same time be deaf to the appeals of justice, humanity, and kindred blood, and abdicate her proud position among the Powers of the earth, then indeed is it unnecessary to recognize the Confederate States of America.

History will ask what prevented the natural termination of so cruel a war, and the statesmen of England will find it difficult to answer the question. They cannot plead that they lacked the power. They cannot plead that party necessities frustrated its exercise, or that a great outside pressure of public opinion overawed their superior wisdom and foresight. They cannot even plead that grave reasons of foreign policy fettered their free agency. With Europe at peace, with all the other Powers, ready to follow their lead, public opinion ripe for this step, free to act, and all the world waiting for their action, the statesmen of England can only say to posterity that in 1863 they deemed it dangerous, useless, and unnecessary to stop the American war.

The Fear of War.

What delays the recognition of the Confederate States? Why—when her interest points so decidedly in that direction—when her ally, with whom her American policy has been concerted, waits impatiently for her consent—when her own sympathies are strongly with those who claim at her hands admission into the family of nations—does England still hesitate? All the difficulties which seemed at first to environ the question have been gradually cleared up by the discussions that have taken place during the past year. The right of this country to recognize the Confederacy, if it were ever seriously doubted, must now be held to have been conclusively established. Decisive precedents, and the most distinct declarations on the part of American jurists, establish, as against the Americans, our right to recognize any fragment of the Union that may contrive to break off its connection with the rest, and maintain for a while a de facto Government. No one denies Mr. Gladstone's statement that the South has become a nation. No one desires that she should, or believes that she can, cease to be an independent Power: no one, that is, whose opinion has the slightest influence on English politics. No one questions that the acknowledgment of the Government at Richmond by England, or by England and France, would be the heaviest discouragement that could befall the war party at the North. Every one professes the utmost anxiety to discourage that party, and to induce the aggressor to abandon his impracticable designs, and submit to a peaceful separation. And yet the English Ministry refuses not only to mediate in conjunction with France, but even to recognize the achieved independence of the Confederacy; refuses with an obstinacy that not merely injures the interests of the country, but exposes the Cabinet to considerable peril, if at the eleventh hour the Opposition should take heart of grace, and give utterance to the wishes and the requirements of the nation. Their riddle is hard to read. They are alienating a kindred and friendly people; they are thwarting the policy of a Power with which they cultivate the closest relations; they are allowing Lancashire to sink deeper and deeper towards absolute starvation and irretrievable ruin; and they are imperilling their own tenure of office—and all for what end? What is the explanation of conduct apparently so unaccountable? We can name none other than that which is given by many fair and impartial critics, by some of their friends, and by a majority of their adversaries—that they are afraid lest the recognition of the South should involve England in war with the North.

Not afraid, of course, with the mean and vulgar fear which the North attributes to them; not afraid lest the fortune of war should go against England; or lest she should suffer serious injury at the hands of such an antagonist. To entertain a fear of this kind they must be at once fools and cowards. If the strength of England and the weakness of the Northern States be hidden from President Lincoln and Mr. Seward, they are well known to the English Ministry. American journals may talk of over-running Canada, and sending an army to revolutionize Ireland; of meeting the English fleets in battle, and driving English commerce from the seas; but the most nervous woman in Ireland would not sleep less soundly if war were declared to-morrow, nor would the rate of insurance range as high in Liverpool as it now does in New York. Lord Palmerston and his colleagues know that on the seas they can have nothing worse to fear than the depredations of a few privateers, who would be chased and caught much more speedily than the Alabama; and that on land the worst danger to be apprehended would be a border war, and a series of marauding expeditions. Canada can take care of herself. We know, from the highest and most unexceptionable authority, that her present militia law suffices to give her a force which, with the assistance of 20,000 regulars, would repel any invading army that could possibly be sent against her; and the commerce of Great Britain would suffer far less by war than it is now suffering for the sake of peace. Peace starves Lancashire; robs her of some $100,000,000 per annum; war would give her cotton and prosperity, materials, and a market. Therefore it is not the consequences of war that the Ministers fear; it is war itself. Many of them are, by natural temper and conscientious scruples, passionately averse to it; some fear it as inevitably deranging their schemes of financial economy; some regard with peculiar horror a war with the United States, as partaking of the nature of a civil war. All of them, as men on whom lies a great and terrible responsibility, as men who will be answerable for every life that is lost, every misery that is inflicted or endured, in case of war, and who must justify the necessity of war not only to their country but to their conscience, are anxious, if possible, to avoid war; over-anxious, perhaps; but such is the habit of English statesmen, whose anxiety to keep the peace on any terms is thought by many to have landed them in wars which would have been avoided by Ministers of a less pacific temper.

Holding such views, and feeling, as we have said, a strong apprehension that the recognition of the Confederate States by England, or even by England and France conjointly, would be made a casus belli by the Government at Washington, the British Cabinet continues to postpone, from time to time, a step which, though admittedly just and expedient, might yet have such serious consequences. We feel assured that this apprehension is altogether groundless, and we propose briefly to show that Mr. Lincoln cannot and will not, under any circumstances, make the recognition of the Confederacy the ground of a declaration of war against England. We waive altogether the fact that the American Government has supplied precedents in abundance, and that American jurists have one and all uttered the most distinct and peremptory dicta, to justify such a measure. Jurists and precedents are likely enough to be repudiated. But there are present authorities against war with any Power acknowledging the Southern Confederacy too strong to allow of repudiation; there are facts so stubborn that Mr. Lincoln and his advisers can neither ignore them nor set them at defiance, which forbid the Government of the Northern States to take on its hands a quarrel with a great maritime Power, so long as such a quarrel can possibly be avoided.

For what would be the consequences of such a war, even as they must present themselves to the eyes of a President blinded by ignorance and dazzled by the magnitude of the military preparations he has called forth, and to the senses of a Cabinet composed of the most ignorant men that ever disposed of the destinies of a great nation? We grant that the Americans have never appreciated the difficulty of getting hold of Canada, and the impracticability of keeping it; we admit that the Government at Washington may very probably be altogether unaware of the aptitude of the Canadians for self-defence, and of the means of Great Britain to support them. But it must be aware of its own inability to invade Canada; it must know that in order to encounter even 20,000 British soldiers and 40,000 Canadian militia, it ought to send 80,000 or 100,000 men across the frontier; not raw recruits, but drilled and disciplined soldiers. It has no such army to spare, and never will have. It cannot spare a man from the South-West. It cannot send away the shattered and demoralized army of General Burnside, leaving the Federal capital open to Lee and "Stonewall" Jackson; and if it did, it must have some idea of the amount of desertion that would reduce that army to a skeleton before it reached the Lakes, and of its utter unfitness to cope with a force of Canadian volunteers, sustained and encouraged by the presence of a British army. Mr. Lincoln may allow his hangers-on to bluster in the press and on the platform about the annexation of Canada; but he and his Ministers must know perfectly well that they have not and cannot procure the means of making such an attempt. They cannot be ignorant, moreover, that within six weeks of the declaration of war their squadrons would have struck to the British, or sought refuge in Northern harbours; that their blockading vessels would fall an immediate prey, inasmuch as most of them are utterly unfit to cope with regular men-of-war, however efficient they may be against defenceless merchantmen; and that, deprived of supplies and support from the sea, every Federal garrison along the Southern coast, from Galveston to Fortress Monroe, would be speedily compelled to surrender at discretion. What would then be the position of the two present belligerents? The North, which now with difficulty maintains the offensive, would then be deprived of its only advantage; the South, now almost able to contend on equal terms with the invaders, would have the invaluable co-operation of the British marine. All hopes, not merely of conquering the Confederates, but of forcing them to peace on other than their own terms, would be at an end. Always inferior on land, the Federals, by quarrelling with Great Britain, would find themselves excluded from the sea. To punish the recognition of Southern independence, they would make that independence at once secure and absolute; to avenge themselves on England for recognizing the hopelessness of their present struggle, they would throw away their last means of maintaining it. In fact, they would show themselves simply and entirely mad; and, foolish and wicked as they are, they have not yet entitled us to think them mad enough for this.

But, granting that the Administration would not willingly plunge into a European war, may not the passion and ignorance of the people force it to do so? Hardly, as we think. The only portion of the Northern people which could so act in masses, and with striking effect, as to compel the Federal Government into such a peace of suicidal folly, would be the populace of New York city and of the New England States. Now the New England States showed, in 1813, their extreme distaste to a war with Great Britain; even to the extent of refusing to render any assistance to the Federal Power in the prosecution of that war, and menacing secession if peace were not made. Now, as then, war with the Mistress of the Seas would be ruin to Connecticut, Maine, and Massachusetts; and much as those States love their own way, they love their own interests better; much as they hate the South, they hate still worse such a commercial crash as would follow a quarrel with England. Rhode Island is in the same position; New Jersey shares all their reasons for objecting to war, and is, into the bargain, hostile to the party now in power at Washington. The whole Northern Atlantic seaboard requires peace with England. As for New York City, half-ruined by the war with the South, nothing is wanting to consign all her merchants to bankruptcy, all her minor men to beggary, all her working people to starvation, but a war with this country, her chief customer, and her most formidable enemy. Nothing in the world would be so perilous to the Empire City, or so unpopular therein, as a war against England on such a pretext as the recognition of the South. Great Britain would take her ships, blockade her harbour, cut her off from her trade, and destroy the little remnant of her once enormous and lucrative brokerage business. So far from forcing the President into war, New York would burn him in effigy if he allowed himself to be dragged into it.

Another, and by no means an insignificant, consideration would serve to deter both Government and people from resenting the recognition which England has a right to accord to their enemy. A maritime Power can inflict fearful injuries upon them. Every Northern seaport and accessible town, from Washington to Portland, would be at the mercy of the British fleet. Every one would be blockaded, any one might share the fate of the Southern towns along the Mississippi, and be laid in ashes by the guns of the Warrior or the Resistance. Again, California is wholly defenceless. Troops cannot be sent there by land, in time to be of any use; and Great Britain would have no difficulty in occupying the Isthmus of Panama, and thus cutting off the communication entirely, even if troop-ships could escape the vigilance of her blockading cruisers. The impossibility of injuring England seriously; the certainty that war with her would involve complete defeat by the Confederates; the terrible loss which it would cause to the commercial States on the Eastern coast; the power of the British navy to inflict additional injury, to an indefinite extent, on those States and on California: these are considerations which must make the wildest demagogue in New England tremble, in the midst of his menaces, lest he should be taken at his word; and might assure English statesmen that never, while they are allowed a chance to escape it, will the Northern Government incur the fearful calamity of a war with England.

"Historicus" on the Recognition of Texas.

The ingenious writer who undertakes the defence of Sir G. C. Lewis's historical paradoxes in the columns of the Times, has, through the same channel, favoured the public with a reply to an article in our last week's impression on "The Recognition of the Republic of Texas." He triumphantly proclaims that "the advocates of the immediate recognition of the Confederate States seemed to have felt the pressure of the (his) argument, and to have virtually abandoned the precedents on which they formerly relied." This is a repetition of the same boastful error into which the writer was once before led by the notorious exclusion of all replies to his former letters from the columns of the journal in which they appeared.

It is a peculiarity of the reasoning of "Historicus" that he rejects, as "evil examples," all precedents which do not square with his theory, and that he persists in treating an abstract principle of his own invention as an elementary maxim of international law, which is but an aggregation of precedents. In this instance he does not impugn our facts, though the animus of the writer is sufficiently shown by the gratuitous suspicion he throws out that the rebellion or secession of Texas from Mexico, an event abundantly explained by the circumstances, was instigated by the intrigues of Southern politicians; while he makes the important admission that, even according to his own reading of the jus inter gentes, the Government of the United States, administered by a Southern President, violated no obligation in recognizing the Republic of Texas. Seizing upon the single fact that Mexico was at the time too much distracted with internal commotions to prosecute the struggle vigorously, he claims the recognition of Texas as a complete illustration of his former arguments. He takes no notice of our quotation from the Annual Register—good authority, since he himself chiefly relies upon it for his facts—which shows that in the opinion of the time the recognition by England was regarded as the best means of settling the disputes still existing between the contending parties. We cited the case of Texas to show how, in that case, recognition was readily granted to a feeble, scarcely settled country, not one of whose adult inhabitants had been born on its soil; a country which at any time might be reconquered by its former Sovereign, which had no national or historical identity, and against the recognition of which many powerful reasons of State policy might have weighed; while in the present case the same act is withheld from a country having no less claims, and the conditions of which present in every respect the most striking antithesis to those of Texas. "Historicus" ignores this view of the subject altogether.

According to him, the recognition of a new country is not a question of justice and humanity, or even of expediency and policy; it is decided wholly by a dry formula, which he states thus:—

The recognition of a community which has severed itself from its ancient sovereign, is not permissible until its de facto independence is established; and, further, both in practice and in principle, it has been clearly defined that the only legitimate test of the establishment of a de facto independence is the cessation of a substantial struggle on the part of the former Sovereign to assert his authority.

To the first part of this formula we offer no objection, and even if it could be said—what even "Historicus" would hesitate to say—that in withdrawing from its union with the North the South had severed itself from its "ancient Sovereign," it may be fairly held that the Confederate States have established their de facto independence. But what "Historicus" lays down as the only legitimate test of de facto independence is a strange perversion of words indeed. Let the pretensions of the "ancient Sovereign" be ever so unjust, let the struggle on his part be ever so hopeless, let the interests which the world has at stake in it be ever so great, still, so long as a "substantial struggle" exists, justice, humanity, the world's interests, must wait in silence; but when the "ancient Sovereign" pants a moment for breath, the "substantial struggle" lulls for a while, then, no matter what the right or wrong, what the motives of policy, or what the interests of the world at large, recognition is permissible and proper. For so startling an innovation on the established usages of nations we have a right to expect an array of precedents. "Historicus" has none, except the recognition of the Spanish-American colonies, in which the cessation of the "substantial struggle" was an incident and not the motive, since England was prepared to recognize these colonies before the substantial struggle had ceased if it should so suit her policy, and actually threatened Spain with such recognition. The precedents of Greece and Belgium, where England recognized just as the "substantial struggle" was about to end in the complete destruction of the recognized Government, are conveniently set aside by "Historicus" as not in point. The precedents of other countries, and those of our own, except the isolated one which accidentally suits his purpose, are held up only as vicious examples to be shunned. Since the advent of this great expounder, international law consists no longer of precedents, but of formulas of his invention, and statesmanship is simplified into rules of arithmetic.

"Historicus" himself seems to feel that though his plausible sophistry may confound the reason of some of his readers, it cannot warp the judgment, or convince the heart of a British audience, for in concluding he finds it necessary to fortify himself with what is the stock-in-trade of less able men—the dim and shadowy phantom of war. Has it come to this, that England must tremble before a disrupted and agonized Republic, and that even the champion of her War Minister must needs cast the warning into her teeth?

The English View of Federal Abolitionism.

Mrs. H. B. Stowe is a true and thorough New England Puritan—that is, she is unscrupulous, smart, and spiteful. Some years ago she gulled the English public with her Legree and Uncle Tom, just as the equally moral and professedly religious Mr. Barnum gulled the American public with the Feejee mermaid, and Washington's negro nurse. She presented such a picture of slavery in the South as made the horrors of the Middle-Passage appear comparatively trifling. Her book came out at a period when the English people were suffering from the ennui that results from a long peace, and the absence of political excitement; so "Uncle Tom's Cabin" became the rage. No one took the trouble of inquiring into the truth of the story, and what is more, no one was at the pains of considering whether the Southerners would be such arrant fools as to injure their property in the way set forth by the authoress. So deep an impression did the sensation tale produce, that certain noble ladies presented an address to Mrs. H. B. Stowe, in which they insisted on the duty of American wives giving their husbands certain lectures about the wickedness of the Legree system of slavery. The response made to this appeal in the Northern press was a not very courteous request to the noble English ladies to mind their own business, and to discontinue their wicked practices of starving their milliners, torturing their female servants, and making the lives of factory children a hell upon earth—for the mob in America is under the impression that the English working-classes are ground into the dust by a brutal aristocracy, just as the English mob thinks the Southern people ill-use their slaves. The war in America has proved conclusively that the Legree horrors of Southern slavery have no existence, except in New England prayers, sermons, books, and lectures; and yet Mrs. H. B. Stowe turns upon her former patrons, and not content with having once taken them in, reproaches them with their former emancipation sympathies and their present coldness. The story that roused the English ladies to address their American sisters is proved to be "a concrete lie," and, besides, the most devoted Abolitionists in this country—perhaps we ought to except that man of peace, Mr. Bright—have never counselled emancipation by fire and sword and the desolation of the South. However, Mrs. Stowe's exhibition of fanatical spitefulness may do good, for it has brought forth a letter from the Archbishop of Dublin that is a fair exposition of English sentiment, and which very briefly but forcibly portrays the hypocrisy of the North; and plainly intimates that we are not to be caught by specious pretences to sympathize with rapine, murder, and lust.

His Grace does not enter into any arguments, but states some facts that cannot be denied, and which demolish the plea for sympathy on the ground of abolition. He observes that the war is waged ostensibly for the restoration of the Union, an assertion which, we presume, no one on either side of the Atlantic will gainsay. So far from its being an emancipation war, if the Confederate States had chosen, on or before the 31st of December last, to have returned to the Union, Mr. Lincoln would not have issued his 1st of January license to the slaves to "work out their actual freedom"; and now he only emancipates the slaves over whom he has no control, and retains in slavery those over whom he has control. So far from condemning slavery, his proclamation strongly sanctions it. The right to hold slaves is a privilege to be enjoyed by loyal citizens, and a right of which "rebels" are to be deprived, as a punishment for their rebellion. We really cannot sympathize with Northern abolition, seeing it is a mere and an avowed excuse for the attempt to subjugate and despoil the South.

Archbishop Whately refers to the ill-will of the Northerner to the negro. The black man is a brother who must not ride in the same carriage, walk on the same side of the street, worship God in the same house of prayer, or even live in the same country with Northern Abolitionists. The negro must not labour as a slave, nor must he enter into competition with free labour. Mr. Lincoln, with jocular frankness, admitted the Northern hatred of the negro, and does his best to propitiate the Abolitionists by seeking for the means of transporting their black brethren to some insalubrious spot of earth. The irrepressible conflict in the North between the races may, or may not be, justifiable and natural, but it certainly exists, and it is too much to expect that we should sympathize with that zeal for the negro which aims at depriving him of home and country. We do not understand the benevolence of hate, nor are we fascinated with a brotherhood of expatriation.

The clauses in Archbishop Whately's letter which will most excite the indignation of New England are those which refer to the ultimate recognition of the Confederate States. His Grace tells his correspondent, that sober-minded people think that we have shown great forbearance in not saving our Lancashire operatives from dreadful distress by recognizing the Southern Confederacy and breaking the blockade, and that many think this state of affairs cannot continue much longer. And further, he says the recognition of the Confederate States would be according to the precedent observed by Europe in respect to the Anglo-American and Spanish-American colonies, and Hayti and Belgium. This expression of opinion by the closest reasoner in Europe will have more influence than all the clever sophistry of "Historicus," who contends that a precedent means a perfectly analogous case, when, in fact, no two cases ever were identical in all their features; and it has vastly more weight than the suggestion of Sir G. C. Lewis, who asserted that we should not, or ought not, recognize the Confederate States until, contrary to all precedent, the United States had done so.

Archbishop Whately truthfully remarks that he is not responsible for the prevailing view in this country with regard to the struggle in America. Public opinion in England is not based upon theories, but upon incontrovertible facts. In this matter we believe what we see. We cannot help perceiving that Secession is un fait accompli. We see the disruption of the late United States, and no discussion or explanation of the cause or causes of a palpable effect will induce us to ignore it. Some of us may think the disruption was avoidable, and others, that it was the inevitable result of the national differences between the North and South; but, disagreeing on this point, no one pretends that the late Union is not broken. Some of us think that the day is not far distant when the West will secede from New England, but we are all agreed that the South has seceded from the West and from New England. We know that for two years the South has maintained its independence against great odds, and under peculiarly trying circumstances; and this is a fact that cannot be denied even by the few who believe that if the war lasts long enough, the North may possess itself of the South by exterminating the Southerners. We are no more responsible for seeing that the South is separated from the North, and that the South has maintained its independence, than we are for seeing that the sea separates Great Britain from France, and that the Sultan of Turkey is not the liege lord of Prussia. And supposing we had chosen to shut our eyes to facts, and based our views upon the reports and assurances of the Lincoln Government, what good would it have done? Would it have captured Richmond? Would it have made Confederate balls and bayonets harmless? Would it have stayed the ravages of sickness? Would it have made the outrages of Federal commanders less execrable? Calling a sword a ploughshare will not make it a ploughshare. Our blindness would not have helped the Federals any more than our knowledge of the facts has helped the Confederates. For all the good we have done the South we might as well have been the meek disciples of Cassius M. Clay and Horace Greely.

Then why are the Northerners so angry that we have not been duped into sympathizing with the hopeless and wicked aggression on the South? The Northern leaders are conscious that our sympathy with the South must, sooner or later, lead to the recognition of the Confederate States, the termination of the war, and their ruin and disgrace. They fear they cannot conceal from us the utter hopelessness of the war they are waging, and to divert our attention from the true issue, they urge the plea of a sham emancipation; even though a de facto emancipation of the negro would not justify the attempt to subjugate the white race. We are not to be caught by such clap-trap. We know that if the South were to emancipate the slaves to-morrow, the thirst of the clergy of New England for Southern blood would not be assuaged, the Lincolnites would not consent to a separation without further warfare, and the North would not, without a further effort, give up the monopoly of Southern wealth; and we also know if the South offered to come back, it would be received with delight, and the most stringent laws would be passed to protect the institution of slavery. Can the boldest partisan of the North deny this statement? We are, then, not to be blamed for treating with silence and contempt the hypocritical pretences of the North. We are not responsible for our knowledge of facts, but we are responsible of the use we make of our knowledge. Undoubtedly, at one time or other, we must officially recognize the Confederate States; on this we are all agreed. The sooner we do it the sooner will the war end. Upon the action of this country, under Heaven, depends the continuance of the war, or the advent of peace. We cannot get rid of the grave responsibility to both North and South and to Europe by pleading that it is not of our seeking.

The Pamphlet of Hon. W. B. Reed.

We reproduce in extenso a pamphlet by Mr. W. B. Reed, a leading member of the Democratic party in Pennsylvania, and late Minister of the United States in China. The moderation of its language, the calm, deep sadness of its tone, the absence of all violent expressions or extreme opinions, cannot fail to strike the reader, and impress him with the sense of the folly of the Government which, at the gravest crisis of the national fortunes, drives all men of this stamp into resolute and irreconcilable opposition. From Mr. Reed the English public may learn what those citizens of the North whose convictions constitute what would be the public opinion of any country not cursed with democratic institutions and democratic ideas—the sober, thoughtful, educated men, who have studied political affairs and lived among statesmen—think of the war which the Federal Government is waging for the subjugation of the South, of the frantic folly which hurried the North into that war, and of the stratagems by which that frenzy was stimulated by those who intended to turn it to their own advantage. He is a fair type of the best class of the Constitutionalists; not so wedded to legal forms as to ignore political necessities, not so bitter a partisan as to do injustice to the adversaries of his party, but a citizen who loves his country before all things, who cares more for her interests than for her passions, and more for her honour than for her aggrandizement, who abides by and defends the law, and who clung to the hope that law and the Union might yet be maintained as long as such a hope could be cherished by any reasoning man. Mr. Reed belonged to that section of the Democratic party which supported the candidature of Mr. Douglas for the Presidency; a candidature advocated by a majority of Democrats at the North, in the hope of averting secession altogether, and by a minority at the South, in the endeavour to postpone it as long as possible. He writes as if the breaking-up of his party at the Charleston Convention, which made the triumph of the Republicans certain, and left the preservation of the Union to depend on the sense, resolution, discretion, and patriotism of their nominee, had well-nigh broken his heart. From that hour he saw what must come, though to the last he conceived it possible that the breach might be healed, and that, if a collision were avoided, the Union might ultimately be restored. He defends, and we believe justly, the conduct of Mr. Buchanan. That statesman was in a very unfortunate situation. He remained President for four months after he had obviously ceased to possess the confidence of the country; he did not wield its moral power, and Congress refused to place its physical force at his disposal; he could do very little, and it was his deliberate conviction that he had no right to do what he is now reviled for not doing. Writers who are reckless of truth, and confident in the passions or in the ignorance of their audience, speak of the secession of the Southern States as a rebellion, and revile the late Administration for not at once taking measures to crush it. But an educated statesman, a responsible magistrate like Mr. Buchanan, knew better. He knew that every eminent jurist in America, every leading statesman of the party to which he belonged, and which had still an immense majority throughout the Union—nay, the framers of the Constitution and the Conventions which adopted it—if they had not all justified the right of secession, had unanimously denied to the Federal Government the right to coerce a recalcitrant State. He was not capable of that marvellous hypocrisy, that sublime impudence, which breathes in the proclamation of war by his successor, who could see in State Government, State Legislatures, State troops, and a Confederacy established with every form of law, only riotous assemblages of seditious persons, and who coolly “read the Riot Act to seven sovereign States.” He saw only one thing permitted to him—firmly to hold the forts and property of the Federation within the seceding States, until the question between them and the rest of the Union should be settled by the incoming Government, and this he had not, and could not obtain, the means to do. But, under the circumstances, he did all he could. He made no terms; he surrendered nothing; he betrayed nobody; and he has been rewarded by furious and unfounded denunciations from all quarters.

This denunciation is the more unjust, because, at the time, almost every statesman or lawyer, almost any Legislature, Convention, or public meeting in the Northern States would have endorsed the President's assertion, that neither he nor Congress had any right to coerce the Southern States. Every one who uttered an opinion advised that, as a matter of right and as a matter of policy, the seceders should be allowed to depart in peace. Lawyers believed in the sovereign rights of the States; politicians recognized the popular right of revolution. Both recalled a speech made in the House of Representatives in January 1848, broadly asserting this right:—

Any people, anywhere, being inclined, and having the power, have a right to rise up and shake off the existing Government, and form a new one that suits them better. This is a most valuable, a most sacred right—a right which we hope and believe is to liberate the world. Nor is this right confined to cases in which the whole people of an existing Government may choose to exercise it. Any portion of such people that can, may revolutionize, and make their own, so much of the territory as they inhabit. More than this, a majority of any portion of such people may revolutionize, putting down a majority intermingled with, or near about them, who may oppose their movement. It is a quality of revolution not to go by old lines or old laws, but to break up both, and to make new ones.

These words might well be remembered at that juncture; for they were the words of Abraham Lincoln.

The speeches of the President-elect, if they were not calculated to dispel all hopes of moderation, prudence, and peace—indeed, they were hardly distinct enough to convey any decided idea to those who heard or read them—did not tend to promote confidence in the man to whom the destinies of the nation were to be entrusted. And after the formation of his Cabinet, those who still strove to believe in the possibility of peace did indeed “hope against hope.” Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, Maryland, and Delaware—seven Southern States out of fifteen—still adhered to the Union, and were striving to reconcile their seceded sisters with the North. But not one Southerner received a seat in the Cabinet. Its chief was the man who had preached the “irrepressible conflict”; its other members were, with scarcely an exception, Abolitionists of a still more rabid type. And they acted on the principle that “to the victors belong the spoils.” Every public appointment was reserved for some one noted for his hostility to slavery and to the South. Sectional animosity and anti-Southern fanaticism had raised Mr. Lincoln to power; Sectionalism and Abolitionism were visible in his every act, speech, and appointment. Still there seemed to linger one faint gleam of hope—hope, not for reunion, but for peace. Mr. Seward pledged himself privately to Judge Campbell, of the Supreme Court, through whom he negotiated with the Southern Commissioners, that Fort Sumter should be evacuated. The understanding seems to have been, that the Federal Government should attempt to provision the fort, should be repulsed in this endeavour, and should then evacuate it. We know how the promise was kept. An expedition was secretly prepared to attack Charleston; it sailed; and only after it had sailed was notice given of its approach. South Carolina did the only thing she could do; after two days' bombardment, Major Anderson hauled down his flag; and from that moment peace became hopeless and reunion for ever impracticable.

With the hope of peace perished the liberties of the North. Mr. Reed was not among those whom the lawless tyranny of the Federal Administration sent to wear out weary months of captivity in the casemates of its fortresses; but we can hardly concur with him in attributing his escape merely to his perfect innocence. Scores of men were hurried off to prison who never spoke a word against the Constitution or the Union. But he did not escape annoyance. His correspondence was detained by the Post-office authorities; his house was entered by a Republican mob, fortunately during his absence to the great terror of his wife and children; and the dominant faction frequently commended this outrage, and menaced its repetition. He was reviled over and over again by the press; accused of every species of treason, and assailed even in his private character; and not a word was spoken in his defence by those who knew the utter falsehood of the charges against him. On one occasion his arrest was actually announced in the papers—and though, of course, soon known to be false, the announcement was never contradicted. Only the gradual reaction provoked by the excesses of Republican tyranny, and the revival of the spirit and courage of the Democratic party, which for eighteen months lay crushed and despairing beneath the heel of the Federal Cabinet, gave liberty to Mr. Reed and to men like him to write and publish their views on the position and the prospects of their country.

Those views are gloomy in the extreme. Mr. Reed is as emphatic as the severest European or Southern critics in his expressions of contempt for the capacity and conduct of the Government, and sees nothing in store for the North but financial collapse, commercial ruin, and military disaster. There is no hope but in peace—no peace but through separation. Such is the conviction of those who most idolized the Union; the leading conservative politicians of the North. The best that they can dare to desire is the dissolution of the Federal bond, already shattered by secession, and an ultimate reconstruction under which the Western and Middle States may once more join their fortunes with those of the South. Such is not our wish; such is not the will of the Southern people; such will not be the event; but such is the best hope which remains to the best and soberest Unionists in the Northern States.

New England is beginning to be aware of this; beginning to feel her moral, and to apprehend a political, isolation. Hence the cry so often raised—if secession be once triumphant, where will it end? The South, which recognizes the right of secession, has no such fear. United by affection, by interest, by institutions, by nationality, by common traditions, and the memory of common sacrifices, the Confederate States have no doubt of the perpetuity of that bond whose purely voluntary character they safely proclaim; and they neither choose to admit, nor would desire to retain, associates whose antagonistic interests and distinct character might probably lead them one day to repent and retract their adhesion. The Northern States feel the absence of any coherence in their political system; they know that their conflicting interests must tend to sever them, and that they have no ties of race or sentiment strong enough to hold them together. They—especially those among them which have made the Union a means of preying on the rest, the commercial States of the Atlantic seaboard—see clearly enough that the disruption of the Union must involve its dissolution; that when the Confederate States are completely and confessedly lost the West can hardly be retained, and the allegiance of the Middle States will become exceedingly doubtful. This is one of the reasons which explain the obstinacy with which those States support a war so ruinous to their material prosperity. They are fighting, not only for the hopeless purpose of regaining their monopoly of Southern trade, and of the Southern markets, but also for the more rational and practical object of retaining their right to plunder the West. They would give up Abolitionism to-morrow, if they might retain protection; they would let the South go, if they could bind it by the Morrill tariff; nay, they would look on its loss with far less dread, if they did not know that the same day which frees the Southern ports from the blockade must inevitably liberate the agricultural States of the North from protective tariffs imposed for the benefit of New England. When the Western States see all these things as clearly as their Eastern sisters, the war and the Union will terminate together.

Amid the smoke and din of battle they will not see this. War, even when unsuccessful, has a cohesive power in so much as it tends to strengthen the Executive and centralize the functions of Government. From Europe alone can come the signal at which the strife must cease, and even the eloquent voice of Mr. Reed will not be heard, unless on this side of the Atlantic it serve to convince those who have the power to end the war, that the hour for its exercise has come.

The French in Mexico.

An exaggerated importance has been attached in certain quarters, where no opportunity is ever lost for rousing the national jealousy against our neighbours, to the letter of the Emperor Napoleon to General Forey. Scrutinized by the most malevolent criticism, it would be difficult to find in this document, now six months old, any avowal which had not been fully and frankly made before, both by words and acts. What should the French do in Mexico, and why should they spend men and money in this distant enterprise, unless the objects were precisely those which the Emperor explains in his instructions to the commander of his armies—to rescue that distracted country from the anarchy which has so long preyed on its vitals, establish a strong Government there, which shall have some chance of stability, and as a recompense for such onerous services, to add to the glory and extend and confirm the moral and material influence of France? These were the professed objects of the expedition on its inception, and the instructions of General Forey are no more than what a wise and judicious ruler would have prescribed as the line of conduct best calculated to ensure success. This success has of late attended the enterprise more largely than was expected, or perhaps desired, in some quarters; but the document just published reveals nothing new, and gives cause for no umbrage which, if existing at all, did not exist before. The Emperor speaks of the destinies of the Latin race as we in this country are in the habit of talking more loudly of those of the Anglo-Saxon race; and with this, again, we cannot justly find fault. A generous emulation between these two master races has been the motive spring of our civilization, and the New World could not but derive similar benefits from a more nearly even balance and more equal contest between them.

Be the interference in the internal affairs of Mexico just or not, England has given it her tacit sanction. If it succeed in regenerating that beautiful country, the world will be the richer by the development of its unbounded wealth, and the cause of humanity and civilization be subserved. If French influence in America be strengthened thereby, we have only ourselves to blame, for we have purposely abstained from participation in the work, and if we cared for any influence in America, we might long since have found more than a counterpoise to that of France in the warlike Confederation which we have so studiously neglected. Indeed, the northern neighbours of Mexico may well regret that the head of the Anglo-Saxon race is not animated by an equally zealous or equally far-sighted care for its future as that which animates the leading nation of the rival race.

In America, the Emperor's Mexican policy is of course received very differently by the two belligerents. To the North it is another blow at the delusion of "Manifest Destiny" so rudely shaken by the secession of the South, and therefore received with mingled rage and mortification, the expression of which is only restrained by the more intense hatred of England. The South has every interest in seeing lawful order established on its southern frontier, whence for the last ten years predatory bands have made inroads upon its territory. The South has no dreams of conquest on the other side of the Rio Grande, and cares little whether the Government of Mexico be monarchical or republican, so long as it is friendly and a good neighbour.

Earl Russell's Foreign Policy.

The French Government has just disclosed to the gaze of an irreverent public a marvellous scheme, devised by Earl Russell, for the solution of the Roman question. The Foreign Secretary invited—enforcing his invitation with a menace—the Pope to retire to Malta, there to await, in the enjoyment of the protection and hospitality of the British Government, the determination of the Italians, or more correctly King Victor Emmanuel and his advisers, as to his future position. Of course the story has been received with shouts of laughter. When it first got wind, through some Continental papers, it was set down for a clever caricature of Earl Russell's diplomacy. The notion of proposing to the Pope—who had just received the most distinct assurances from the Emperor of the French that he should never be abandoned, and that France would allow no settlement of the Roman question which had not for its basis the maintenance of the temporal power—to leave Rome and submit himself to the merciful consideration of the Italians, is so absurd that no one was willing to credit even Earl Russell with its adoption. It seemed impossible, too, that any English statesman could be so blind to the immense difficulties which the acceptance of such a proposition by the Pope would have occasioned to England herself. Once at Malta, and by our invitation, we must have maintained, in a style corresponding to his position, the Pope and his whole train. The most violent religious controversies would have instantly arisen in England, Scotland, and Ireland upon this score, and we should, besides, have found ourselves involved in very great embarrassments with the Catholic Powers. What to do with his Holiness would have soon become the most urgent and awkward consideration of the Government. Absurd and preposterous as the story seemed, it was perfectly true. The French Ambassador at Rome evidently writes with a full knowledge of the facts, and the organs of the English Government are unable to do more than suggest some slight "inexactness" in his narrative.

Absurd, however, as this project was, and incredible as it generally seemed, the story cannot have proved any very startling surprise to those who have studied the character and watched the career of Earl Russell. This readiness—as, for want of a better word it may be termed—to believe in any tale of folly committed by the noble lord, does not, moreover, preclude a very full recognition of his political ability and honesty. The explanation of the absurdities which this statesman of great intelligence and long experience commits, is to be found in the mastery which one characteristic has gained over him. Many years ago the overweening confidence of Earl Russell in his own abilities was the subject of much satirical comment. It often, doubtless, stood him in good stead, as it does at this day tens of thousands in every walk of life. Everybody has read the sharp, graphic language in which Sidney Smith described this assurance. The noble lord, said the witty canon, would not have the slightest hesitation in undertaking the command of the Channel Fleet, or performing an operation for the stone. That confidence has grown with his years, until it has at last developed into an all-engrossing, morbid vanity. Earl Russell believes that he is the one statesman of Europe, and he tries to prove that he is so by trying his hand in every question. His activity is all the greater because of late years he has been sadly discredited, nay, almost shelved. His former subordinate has become the leader of the Liberal party. Reform, which was his special property, is nowhere, and his only way to signalize himself is by his brilliant management of foreign affairs. Hence his restless activity in rebuking all the courts of Europe, his eagerness to undertake the solution of questions of which he is quite ignorant. Hence the absurd mistakes which make him the laughing-stock of the world, and hence, too, that painful mismanagement of our foreign relations which has cost the country so many losses, and so much humiliation, and threatens to cost the Ministry, of which he is a member, its existence.

The object which Earl Russell has in view in his Italian policy is, no doubt, that of the great majority of Englishmen. There are but few persons who will give any serious consideration to the grave difficulties which this question really presents. The multitude clamour for the evacuation of Rome and the unity of Italy, and as Earl Russell agrees with the multitude, it is fair to judge him by his success or failure in promoting these ends. No doubt it was in his power to do much for them. No doubt he has seriously impeded them. His vanity has been the bane of the Italians. He could not content himself with lending the Italian Government an unostentatious support, with announcing his sympathy with its aims, and his readiness to do all that England consistently could do to promote them. He has been fired by the ambition of settling the Roman question, and he has made several different suggestions to France, without effect,—some almost as ridiculous as the Malta project,—the cold refusal of which has greatly irritated him. The cacoethes scribendi, which devours him like so many other bad writers, has produced a number of despatches, addressed to the French Government in language so utterly regardless of the difficulties of the French position, and so arrogant in their assertion of what he believes to be the doctrines of international law, that the French Government has been grievously offended, and at last, by the tone of these despatches and the tone of his speeches, he has rendered it quite impossible for the French to evacuate Rome. To do so now would be, to all appearance, to yield to the dictation of England; and that is the very last thing France would do. She would infinitely rather seriously injure her own interests than seem to follow the behests of England. He has encouraged the different Italian Governments to waste their energies upon the attempt to possess Rome, and to neglect the reorganization and reform which ought to have been undertaken long ago. He has thus contrived, by his blundering interference, to encourage a passion the gratification of which he has himself rendered impossible.

To the same consuming passion to make himself notorious, the same ridiculous confidence in his own judgment and knowledge, must be ascribed his lordship's sudden abandonment of Denmark and energetic support of the German projects for the dismemberment of that monarchy. Whilst supporting Denmark, and lending her his good offices, his lordship played but an unimportant and undistinguished role. Whether it was artfully suggested to him at Coburg by the Schleswig-Holstein coterie which surrounded him there, and well knew his weakness, we cannot say; but immediately upon his return he undertook to immortalize himself by settling a question which had puzzled and perplexed Europe for fourteen years. So, utterly regardless of his past pledge, of the many obligations of his country, in defiance of common decency, which suggested that the moment of the announcement of the marriage of the Prince of Wales to a Danish princess should not be chosen for the attempt to force Denmark to commit political suicide, he made that famous proposition which has had the singular fortune of finding no apologist in the country from which it emanated. Too vain to admit the possibility of an error, the quiet rebuke of the Danish Government only stimulated him into backing up his scheme by a despatch which showed a most disgraceful ignorance of all the facts of the question upon which he had pretended to pronounce as arbiter. And thus, for the gratification of this diseased craving of our foreign Minister, England has been completely disabled from giving her aid to Denmark, in a struggle where the success of Denmark is of the utmost importance to England herself. The intervention in Mexico is Earl Russell's work; he thought he could prevent France and Spain from interfering with the form of government in Mexico, or from establishing any special influence there. The only result of his interference was to precipitate, and, at the same time, give a much larger scope, to that intervention. The Greeks have been sacrificed to his love of displaying his diplomatic skill. There never was the slightest chance that the Duke de Leuchtenberg would be elected to the throne; but his lordship chose to suppose that there was, and encouraged the Greeks to elect Prince Alfred, that he might thereby obtain from Russia the abandonment of pretensions which never had the slightest chance. To appease the indignation of the Greeks, he has proposed to give them the Ionian Islands, and thus not merely to endanger English power in the Mediterranean, but to lend the most effective encouragement to those projects of the Greeks for a Greek empire, and the destruction of the Turkish Power, which he but a short time ago denounced as dangerous and criminal in the highest degree. And in order to carry that cession through, he is now making the greatest exertions to impose a King of his own choosing upon the Greeks.

Earl Russell may be traced through the world by his blunders. He has touched nothing which he has not spoiled, for the simple reason that his leading idea has always been, not the success of English policy, or the triumph of the cause he adopts, but his own glorification. Engrossed by that one thought, he has been blind to the absurdities and impossibilities involved in the plans which he has adopted; he has been so intent upon glory that he has failed to see that he was ensuring himself contempt.

The same reasons which explain his perpetual intermeddling in Europe, when the interests of England did not in the least prompt it, explain also the unwillingness of Earl Russell to intervene in America, where those interests imperatively demanded intervention. Mr. Seward is his match in conceit and arrogance, and nothing was to be gained by writing epigrammatic despatches to Washington when the replies, if not epigrammatic, were sure to be offensive. There were good reasons why England should not take the lead in intervention, which his colleagues would take care to enforce against him, and he is not disposed himself to have anything to do with a project in which he must play second fiddle. The French proposal of intervention was, therefore, unacceptable, and we are inclined to believe all action in this question will be equally unacceptable. The question is only one which involves the lives of hundreds of thousands, and the welfare and happiness of millions; it affords no scope for a diplomatic tour de force, no foundation upon which to erect a monumental column to the genius and the virtues of John Earl Russell. Energetic intervention, although it would be acceptable to the great majority of the nation, would bring down upon the Minister who proposed or acceded to it the wrath of a party which, though small in number, is strong in abuse; the party, too, from which Lord Russell yet expects his elevation to the Premiership. Vain, too, as he is, he has yet the sagacity to see that whilst upon all other foreign questions the public is grossly ignorant, it has made itself well acquainted with the American one. In the former class of questions, therefore, he feels that he can disport himself at his ease; in dealing with America he must exercise a caution which is so foreign to his nature that his natural resource is to do nothing. Restless—resultless—activity where interference is invited by no interests in England; craven and criminal apathy where those interests ask for prompt and energetic action—these are the characteristics of the foreign policy of Earl Russell.

The Great Swinfen Case.

It is a common assumption that all clergymen are religious and that all lawyers are eminently shrewd and cunning. No doubt the teachers of religion ought to be religious; but, unfortunately, profession does not altogether control practice, and many excellent preachers do not act up to the precepts they inculcate. Lawyers ought to be shrewd and cunning—we do not mean in the pettifogging sense—but if we may believe the accounts of defeated clients, they are frequently devoid of the shrewdness necessary to defeat the stratagems of their opponents. If there were any doubt about the matter the Cause Célibes of Kennedy v. Broun would remove it. Here we have a man of great learning, eloquence, and perseverance, completely foiled and beaten by a woman.

The case, though it has occupied so much time and attention, may be stated in a few words. Mr. Swinfen, a gentleman of fortune, married Patience, his servant, and dying, bequeathed to her his valuable property. The will was disputed by the heir-at-law, and Lord Chelmsford, then Sir Frederick Thesiger, who was Mrs. Swinfen's counsel, entered into a compromise by which his client was to have a handsome annuity, and the bulk of the property was to go to the heir-at-law. Mrs. Swinfen repudiated the agreement, declared it was made without her consent, and adopted legal measures to set it aside. The case was remarkably complicated at this point; for, besides having to prove her right to the property, Mrs. Swinfen had to prove that she was not bound by the act of her advocate. To make it more interesting, the advocate became Lord Chancellor. The chances seemed very much against Mrs. Swinfen, and now all the facts are before us, we may safely assert that she never would have gained her cause except for the lucky accident of meeting with an advocate of fine talents, indomitable perseverance, and who was contented to give up his then practice to devote all his time and interest to his fair client's interests, and to stake his hope of emolument and his legal reputation upon the uncertain issue.

Mr. Kennedy deserted his Birmingham clients, and fought the Swinfen battle with a zeal that bordered on indiscretion. Recklessly did he browbeat our judges, and boldly attacked no less formidable a personage than the Lord Chancellor. Month after month, and year after year, he carried on the unaided contest, and those who found most fault with his indiscretion, bore willing testimony to his zeal, ingenuity, and legal acumen. He fought hard, and though often repulsed, ultimately won a decided and complete victory, and his client became the lawful mistress of Swinfen Hall. So ended, the public thought, the great Swinfen case; but, as it turned out, Mr. Kennedy's success only concluded one act of the drama.

Some months since there were rumours of a dispute between Mr. Kennedy and his late client, who had lately contracted a second marriage with a Mr. Broun, and the neighbours of that lady were somewhat startled by the receipt of a handbill, in which Mr. Kennedy referred to her in anything but complimentary terms. And the cause of this exhibition of ungentlemanly anger was made public by the trial of Kennedy v. Broun.

It appears that Mr. Kennedy conducted the Swinfen case without the intervention of an attorney, and that instead of receiving his fees with his briefs, he gave his client credit, and made of it what is called a lawyer's action; that is, if he did not gain the day his labour was to go unrequited. The price of his services was fixed at £20,000, an amount that considering the work he did, and the risk he ran, was, we think, not excessive. The payment of this money was to be secured to him by a mortgage on the Swinfen property. During the long litigation Mr. Kennedy and Mrs. Swinfen were on intimate terms, and indeed the intimacy, as it appeared on the trial, was of a very affectionate character. Mr. Kennedy was a married man, but that did not prevent him paying frequent visits to the widow in her loneliness. Upon this part of the affair we shall not dwell, and we only refer to it because it explains why the clever lawyer did not obtain indisputable security for his remuneration. Of course no provocation can justify the conduct of Mr. Kennedy in introducing this feature into the trial; and it deservedly lost him the public sympathy. Mr. Kennedy, who perhaps counted, certainly erroneously, upon a passion even stronger than gratitude, as a guarantee that Patience Swinfen would more than fulfil her compact and more than redeem her promises, must have been considerably annoyed when he heard that the widow had again entered into the bonds of wedlock. He pressed for his bond, and his demand was refused. It is not very surprising that Mr. Kennedy should determine to take what steps he could to get possession of the £20,000, and to punish his late client for what he considered her serpent-like conduct. He could not seek to damage her reputation without damaging his own, but revenge in prospect was too alluring to be put off with the pleadings of self-interest.

Mr. Kennedy gained his action. The jury gave him a verdict for £20,000, and, indeed, they could not come to any other conclusion, but the verdict was entered subject to an appeal to the judges in Banquo upon certain points of law, the chief of which was decided last week, and that decision, subject to an appeal to a Court of Error, finally bars Mr. Kennedy's claim. By a beautiful fiction it is assumed that English barristers labour for love and not for money, that they have no claim on their clients, and that their fees are merely free-will tokens of gratitude. Everybody knows that in practice this is not so, and that the eloquence and services of barristers, like cheese and butter, can only be had for money. Mr. Kennedy, in a speech of great ingenuity and learning, argued that a barrister can legally claim his fees; but after mature deliberation, judgment has been given against him.

We do not, in the least, excuse Mr. Kennedy's imprudence, but on the other hand, we cannot repress a feeling very near akin to disgust at Mrs. Broun's ingratitude. Mr. Weller, senior, pathetically warned his hopeful son about the danger of widows. The practical moral of the great Swinfen case seems to us to warn all whom it may concern, of the imminent danger they run by having anything to do in the way of business with strong-minded widows. Mr. Kennedy has paid pretty dearly for his folly, and if we have heard the last of the Swinfen case, many charitably disposed, forgiving people, will not be sorry to hear that he is finding solace for his disappointment in a prosperous professional career.

Reviews.

THE INVASION OF THE CRIMEA.*

We propose, from the two massive volumes before us, to give an account of the origin and progress of an event, so far as they bring the narrative, which, but for the second war of independence in America, would have been probably classed as the most important incident in the history of the present generation, and which, though dwarfed by the terrible convulsion in the New World, will occupy a prominent position in the annals of this century, for it has exercised a deep and lasting influence upon the destiny of Europe and the advance of civilization. We do not profess to present an exhaustive and complete summary of the book, for that would need more space than we have at our disposal. All we can offer is a brief and connected recital of the leading points of our author's highly finished and carefully elaborated work. Mr. Kinglake's literary reputation is an all-sufficient warranty for the literary excellence of any book to which his name is appended; and in the present instance he has enjoyed the inestimable advantage of having the most abundant materials. The whole of Lord Raglan's papers were placed at Mr. Kinglake's disposal, and these were not only voluminous but carefully arranged and of easy reference. They embrace the whole of his official correspondence, and include many confidential communications from high personages. In addition to this treasure-trove, Mr. Kinglake has been aided by French officers, by Russian generals, and by other well informed persons both at home and abroad. Under such circumstances—a grand and interesting subject, minute and profuse intelligence, and a talented author—one has a right to expect a book that is worthy to be classed with the English classics. Nor are we altogether disappointed. There are passages in this work of unsurpassed beauty and power, and which even enhance the literary reputation of the author of "Eothen." His portraits are wonderfully minute and elaborate, and yet so skilfully drawn that the art of the artist is concealed. The Emperor Nicholas is described by a multitude of vigorous strokes, until the reader almost unconsciously acquires a wonderfully vivid perception of the character of that potentate. Mr. Kinglake has, in an eminent degree, that mental quality which enables a writer to grasp a vast subject, and to make all the parts of it subservient to his purpose. He is never embarrassed by details, but finds for each one its appropriate place. Our author's diction is copious without being inflated and pretentious, and idiomatic without any commonplaces, or Carlyle affectation. His story is told with vigour, and his digressions are introduced with too much skill to tire the patience of the reader, or induce him to skip them. But Mr. Kinglake, though a philosopher, is no more free from prejudice than men of less pretensions, or rather he is, despite his intellect, probably the most prejudiced person in this country. As everybody knows, Mr. Kinglake hates the French Emperor and all his friends with a most bitter and malignant hatred; and to gratify this passion he has done that which will increase the sale of his work now, but which will discredit it with posterity. We never remember such an instance of the blindness of hatred; for here we have an accurate reasoner, and a person of refined and gentlemanly taste, prostituting his fine talents and, let us add, being unfaithful to a public trust—for when he received Lord Raglan's papers, and sought information as the historian of the Crimean War, he undertook a public trust—for the purpose of giving vent to his Napoleon venom, and shows it, too, in such a way that no one can be deceived by his virulence. It was not our intention to criticise this work, but we must protest against our author's version of the coup d'état, which led to the people of France electing Napoleon III. to be their Emperor.

The reference to the Emperor of the French is not incidental, for the chapter devoted to it consists of 111 pages; the volume itself being 520 pages. The tone throughout is grossly insulting to Napoleon III. and his friends. One by one the Ministers and Diplomats of the Empire are represented by our author as ruined gamblers and spendthrifts, who conspired together to plunder the French nation. A dozen times over Napoleon is sneered at as a literary man devoid of that courage which is commonly supposed to be peculiar to prize-fighters and private soldiers. The Prince who has led the most daring enterprises, the most astute statesman in Europe, the commander who won Magenta and Solferino, is represented as a moral coward, and unequal to any great crisis; afraid to hear the truth; a trembling puppet in the hands of ruined and desperate men. With unpardonable vulgarity, Mr. Kinglake cannot mention the late St. Arnaud, or the Count Persigny, without repeating their family names ad nauseam, just as the orators of pothouse discussion clubs always speak of Lord Overstone as the late Jones Lloyd. Mr. Kinglake, if we credit his narrative, must be ubiquitous. He knows everything that has happened everywhere, and at all times. The hon. Member for Bridgewater tells us, with all the flourish of a penny-a-liner, how Prince Louis Napoleon looked and trembled at Strasbourg and Boulogne. He does more wonderful than this. He relates, with the utmost exactness, how the Emperor Napoleon and his colleagues passed the memorable night of the Coup d'état. It appears that Napoleon, who had turned green with fear, was shut up in the Elysée, and kept from communion with the outer world by his friends; but the hon. Member for Bridgewater can see through any number of stone-walls, and tells us what Napoleon did and thought. In short, Mr. Kinglake, blinded as we have said, by his hatred, has believed the tales of the reputable habitues of the parlours of Leicester-square, and has written a most palpable romance, a kind of sensational tale, as reliable as the revelations of Court secrets that grace the pages of Reynolds's Miscellany. The passage about the Presidential oath must, we think, have been inspired by the late learned M.P. for Marylebone, who has left his country for his country's good.

However, Mr. Kinglake is honest in his fanaticism. He does not resort to any device to make his fiction seem like truth. For example, he is particular in telling us that the "conspirators" of the Coup d'état were men who would not be satisfied with a less stake than the Government and riches of France; and that until 3 o'clock in the morning of the 2nd December, or a few hours before the arrests were to be made, not even a subordinate officer was let into the secret. Grant this. Then how does it happen that Mr. Kinglake knows all the secret transactions of that night? We presume it is not likely that any of the "conspirators" have confessed to Mr. Kinglake, or that, if they had, he would record the unsupported testimony of faithless accomplices and such vile characters. Our author is in this fix—if his story is true, he could not have heard it. In fact, Mr. Kinglake knows as much about the secret doings of Napoleon III. and his Ministers on the night of the Coup d'état, as Sir Walter Scott did about the visit of King Richard to Friar Tuck. Again, Mr. Kinglake says his cold hash of Victor Hugo and Leicester-square is not a digression, but nevertheless, the omission of the 14th chapter would not spoil the rest of the narrative. Upon the same pretext Mr. Kinglake might have given us a fancy sketch of the first French revolution, and have declared it was not a digression, because the first revolution led to the rise of the Napoleon family, and the Napoleon family was connected with the last Russian war. If our author had been entrusted with public papers to make a history of the Indian Mutiny, he could, with equal appropriateness, have introduced his veracious attack on a Prince who is respected by his friends and feared by his enemies. We need hardly remark that we do not come forward as the advocates of the Emperor of the French. That is not the business of an English journalist. If the Emperor wanted an advocate, he might well take Mr. Kinglake, and republish his attacks. The quick-witted French people would laugh aux éclats at the absurdity of the details, they would appreciate the unbiassed fairness of a writer who dilates on the "massacre" of the 4th of December, and forgets to allude to a previous massacre, when Prince Napoleon did not preside over the government of France; and they would marvel at the perverted judgment of the man who can hope to persuade the world that a Prince who has made France powerful and prosperous, is the cowardly puppet of a band of sharpers. It is enough to reflect upon the present condition of France—to see how rapidly her influence in Europe has advanced, to see how considerable has been her national progress, to see how statesmanship has succeeded in eluding the machinations of the demons of discord—to appreciate the absurdity of Mr. Kinglake's slander. We shall now proceed to give a brief account of the origin of the Crimean War. We shall not turn aside again to expose the sensational slanders of Mr. Kinglake. But we should have been wanting in duty, in that honourable fairness which is at once the strength and the glory of English journalism, if we had not censured the breach of good faith—the breach of a public trust—of which Mr. Kinglake has been guilty. He used his public position to get the necessary information for writing a history of a European war; and under cover of that history he has published an unscrupulous attack upon his political antipathies, Napoleon III. and his Ministers. We defy any one to read the work before us, and fail to perceive that the author's object was to indulge his mania against the Emperor of the French. We have not replied, we shall not reply to charges which are altogether unsupported by facts. We believe that, except, amongst the assassins who hate Napoleon III. for putting an end to their hopes of revolutionizing France—except we say, amongst the Leicester-square refugees—there is not a man in England who will not condemn this covert and unscrupulous attack on the Government of France.

In 1851 it was the common boast in England that whatever European complications might arise there would be no great wars, and especially, that this country might rest upon its laurels, and, except in India and in other distant parts, sheathe the sword for ever. Yet, at that time a cloud, no bigger than a man's hand, was upon the horizon, which the ambition of Russia was to make the excuse of an attempted spoliation, only to be prevented by a bloody war.

The discussion about the Holy Shrines was a contest between Russia, as the representative of the Greek Church, and France as the representative of the Latin Church. The custody of a key, or the right of entrance through a particular door, were unimportant incidents, and could have been, as indeed they were, satisfactorily arranged. But the Emperor Nicholas was bent on obtaining a protectorate over the Greek Christians in the Sultan's dominions, and this was an influence which the Western Powers were, very properly, determined he should not enjoy. Nicholas also had ulterior views that would give him possession of Constantinople; these he rather incautiously revealed to the English Ambassador at St. Petersburg, in a conversation that has become famous. He proposed a disruption of the Turkish Empire, and a division of the spoils between England and Russia; but the English Government firmly repudiated his offer of a "gentlemanly understanding." Upon this, he resolved to get possession of the much coveted territory without the co-operation of England.

The time seemed to him ripe for the undertaking. He dreaded no combined opposition from the great Powers. Austria was under particular obligations to him, and was not in a position, without the aid of this country, to oppose any force to his scheme of conquest. Prussia was in the hands of a feeble King and a Government of philosophical do-nothings. With regard to the German Powers, Nicholas was right, for Austria did not put forth her strength to preserve the peace of Europe, and Prussia adhered to her old policy of not fighting unless she could secure some territorial advantage at a moderate cost, or until, as under the First Napoleon, she was bullied and beaten into resistance. With regard to France, Nicholas felt himself doubly secure. He did not understand that the establishment of the Empire, so far from being a revolution, was a strong conservative movement, and that France had not been so powerful for aggression and defence since the palmy days of the first Empire, as she was in 1853. He was pleased to look upon Napoleon III. as a usurper who would need all his force at home to guard his throne. Not less patent was the blunder into which he fell with respect to this country. He thought Messrs. Cobden and Bright and the Peace Party represented England, and that, under no provocation short of the actual invasion of our territory, should we go to war. And our moral influence to prevent war was, as Mr. Kinglake forcibly points out, greatly weakened by the way in which Lord Aberdeen ostentatiously gave his adherence to what are erroneously called peace principles. As long as it is known that a powerful nation is ready to resist a breach of the law of nations by force, there is some power in moral suasion. So soon as it is known that there is no penalty attached to a breach of the law, the law is certain to be disregarded. There is no question that the Peace Society and Messrs. Cobden and Bright did very much to encourage Nicholas to persevere in his aggressive policy.

The Emperor of Russia was also deceived on another matter of great importance. He thought there was a hereditary and ceaseless enmity between this country and France, and deemed it incredible that Queen Victoria and the successor of Napoleon I. could enter into an alliance against the pretensions of Russia. He thought that men of Mr. Kinglake's stamp were representatives of English sentiment, and therefore nothing more surprised or dismayed him than the cordial alliance between the Western Powers. If England and France had been foolish enough to have remembered their old enmity instead of their joint interests, Russia might have been able to carry her ambitious project to a successful issue.

Thus deceived, Nicholas proceeded in his work by despatching Prince Menschikoff to Constantinople on a mission to bully Turkey into a concession that would have made the Russian Emperor the virtual Sovereign of the Greek Christian subjects of the Sultan. The Russian Envoy was baffled by the tact of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, whose influence with the Turkish Government was almost supreme. Our Ambassador did what he could to preserve peace. To the just, or rather to the plausible, demands of Russia, he induced the Sultan to give a favourable answer—to the inadmissible requests he advised the most respectful refusals; and so well was this managed that all Europe was convinced of the moderation of the Sultan and the utter injustice of the demands of Russia. Mr. Kinglake tells us that the Emperor of Russia was further infuriated, because he looked upon Lord Stratford as his personal enemy and rival. Prince Menschikoff, who was nothing loath, did his best to fasten a quarrel upon Turkey, in obedience to instructions from St. Petersburg, and at length took the extreme step of breaking off diplomatic relations with the Porte, and removing the legation from Constantinople. After this the great Powers made every effort, conjointly and severally, to prevent a rupture, short of an unanimous declaration of war, in the event of an aggressive step on the part of the Czar, which could alone have prevented war. Nicholas, nothing moved by these representations and still relying on the faithfulness of Austria, the selfish policy of Prussia, the imaginary difficulties of the Emperor of the French, the improbability of England, the land of Peace Societies, going to war, and doubting the possibility of an alliance between England and France, took the next step in his enterprise, and on the 2nd of July, 1863, crossed the Pruth and occupied the Principalities. Still Europe did not believe in hostilities, and by the manifest anxiety to preserve peace, encouraged Nicholas in his warlike policy. He paid no heed to the just remonstrances of the four Powers, and meantime England and France entered into an understanding to act in concert in the affair, whatever turn it might take; and, whether or not Austria and Prussia should draw out of their engagements, to check at all hazards the attempt of Russia on the dominions of the Sultan. This agreement was announced in the Queen's Speech at the close of the session, in August 1853.

Although the prospect had become somewhat more gloomy, and the combined fleets of England and France had been despatched to the Dardanelles, the conference of the four Powers at Vienna was unceasing in its efforts to bring about a pacific solution; and to this attempt the Emperor Napoleon gave all the aid in his power. Meantime Turkey could not submit to the continued occupation of the Principalities, and, therefore, duly gave notice that if Russia did not retire from her territory in fifteen days, the occupation would be considered a casus belli. Russia did not comply; and on the 23rd of October, 1853, there was formally a state of warfare between Russia and Turkey.

And now we come to an incident that reflects disgrace on Russia, and that made the nations of Europe eager for a contest which until then they had deprecated. On the 31st of October, after the declaration of war, Count Nesselrode issued a circular to the representatives of Russia at foreign Courts, in which he declared that Russia would still abstain from assuming the offensive, and content herself with holding the Principalities. On the 30th of November a Russian fleet bore down upon the Turkish fleet lying at anchor in the port of Sinope, destroyed the ships, and massacred the crews—for such an attack is no better than a massacre. The Turks, under these trying circumstances acted with a heroism that won for them the respect of Europe. Mr. Kinglake, who can see nothing wrong in what Russia does, excuses this barbarous act, by saying that some fighting had been going on, on the Lower Danube. He further says, "The honour of France was wounded; England was touched to the quick." Those nations would have been for ever disgraced if they had not revenged such a violation of the laws of civilized warfare. The further efforts to avert war were not likely to succeed, though people still believed in them. It was determined by England and France to protect Turkey from the repetition of such a butchery as that of Sinope; and that if Nicholas were still willing to negotiate, he must, while the negotiations were proceeding, consent to keep his fleets from Turkish waters. Nicholas, not yet crediting the possibility of a sincere alliance between the two Western Powers, or that Lord Aberdeen, despite his peace proclivities, would faithfully defend the honour of his country, refused to listen to these equitable and reasonable terms, and withdrew his Ambassadors from London and Paris. England and France retaliated, and on the 21st of February, 1854, diplomatic relations between the Western Powers and Russia ceased. Still, more than a month elapsed before there was a formal declaration of war, and if the Czar had been faithfully informed of the state of public feeling in England and France, he might, perhaps, even at the eleventh hour, have embraced the opportunity that was offered him of retiring from his hazardous adventure.

(From The Morning Post, January 15.)

The Federal Government have been as good as their word, and have, in defiance of the united protests of all Christendom, attempted to crush a foe they cannot themselves subdue, by invoking the aid of a servile insurrection. Mr. Lincoln has pronounced the States in arms against the Federal Government to be in rebellion, and has declared all slaves within their confines to be now and for ever free. Neither motives of humanity nor of prudence, neither respect for the Constitution he was pledged to support, nor regard for the censure of the civilized world, which he was certain to provoke, has prevented the Executive of the United States from committing a crime which, in the annals of the world, is probably without a parallel. That the emancipation proclamation may, and in all probability will, prove inoperative, constitutes no excuse for the Federal Government. The incendiary, who sets fire to a house in the hopes that the inmates may perish in the flames, is not the less guilty because his intended victims manage to effect their escape. If a servile war does not arise in the South—if women and children, the old and the young, the weak and the helpless, are not sacrificed to the fury of a race to which, when its passions are aroused, pity and mercy are utterly unknown—it most assuredly will not be the fault of a Government calling itself Christian, and claiming to be considered civilized. In pronouncing judgment on Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, we can only regard the object which it has in view, and not the contingencies on which the realization of that object depends. It is a universal principle of law that every one is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his own acts; and, applying this principle, it is clear that Mr. Lincoln and his advisers must have contemplated the ordinary results likely to spring from the sudden emancipation of the slave population of the South. It is conceded by the Federal Government that the emancipation scheme is a war measure—that it is a "thunderbolt" specially devised to crush the rebellion. It is not for the sake of liberating four millions of slaves that this proclamation has been issued, but with the object of annihilating six millions of those who, till within the last two years, were recognized by the North as fellow-citizens. This should be especially understood, as from the terms in which the proclamation is couched it will, no doubt, be urged by many that sympathy for the "poor slave" mainly dictated its comprehensive provisions. However, to prevent misconception, we will once for all scatter to the winds the flimsy arguments of those who would desecrate the name of philanthropy by alleging that its principles had ought to do with the composition of this atrocious manifesto.

It is observable, in the first place, that, by virtue of the powers which he has assumed, the President of the United States has emancipated the slaves which inhabit those terri-ties alone in which the Federal authority is disputed, or cannot be enforced. Wherever the banner of the Union floats, there the slave still remains in absolute subjection. In Maryland, the state in which is situated the capital from which this proclamation issued, slavery continues to be upheld. In the other Border States it remains equally unaffected. In Western Virginia, where the Federal authority is still recognized, and at the mouth of the Mississippi, where until lately General Butler ruled with such benignant sway, and where his successor now vindicates the Federal supremacy, the slave still pines in those fetters with which platform abolitionists delight to invest him. In a word, in every region of the United States where the President could have given practical effect to his emancipation policy, he has studiously abstained from doing so. But elsewhere, how limitless is the sphere of his benevolence! Wherever the Confederate flag is unfurled, wherever Mr. Lincoln's authority is denied, wherever after two years of continuous fighting he has failed to make his power felt, there he has solemnly declared slavery to be abolished, and has conferred upon the subject race the inestimable boon of liberty. Is it possible that any one can be deceived by this parody on philanthropy? However galling servitude may be, it must be borne by the unhappy negro whose master acknowledges the authority of the Federal Government. Freedom is, no doubt, the greatest blessing in the power of man to confer, but it can only be granted to those whose masters are the enemies of the dispenser. Mr. Lincoln generously manumits the slaves of others, but his own must still remain in hopeless subjection. Never, assuredly, since the time when man first alleged his right to hold property in his fellow-man has the world witnessed an example of such self-denying philanthropy—such comprehensive benevolence.

The object of this proclamation being to hamper the South, if not utterly to exterminate its free population by the instrumentality of the emancipated negroes, we confess that we should have had a better opinion of Mr. Lincoln if he had abstained from the hypocritical rhodomontade in which he has thought proper to indulge. If he had told the slaves whom he liberated to rise against their masters, and anticipate all attempts to coerce them by murdering all who came within their reach, we should at least have complimented him on his candour. But when we read Mr. Lincoln's injunctions to the emancipated slaves to abstain from violence, and to offer their services to their late masters for reasonable wages, the only feeling excited in our minds is one of unmitigated disgust. Does Mr. Lincoln really believe that a single slave in Virginia or Georgia, or the Carolinas, could secure his freedom without employing violence or that his previous owner would engage him as a labourer for hire without having in the first instance exercised every means in his power, violent or otherwise, to retain him in a state of servitude? Of course, no one knows better than the President of the United States that the proclamation which he has issued can only operate by exciting a war of extermination between the dominant and the servile races. He cannot expect that a Confederacy which treat with scorn the countless hosts he has arrayed against them will yield implicit obedience to the simple manifestation of his will. He knows that if a slave were, in conformity with the tenor of his proclamation, to assert his freedom, he would, as a matter of course, be delivered over to the civil authorities of the State in which he was resident, to be dealt with according to its laws; and he also knows that a large number of slaves could alone benefit by the advantages which he confers by subverting those laws, and exterminating or reducing to subjection those who administer them. It seems a gratuitous outrage on common sense when Mr. Lincoln tells the slaves of the Southern States to vindicate their freedom, but at the same time to abstain from violence.

It is some little consolation to feel that the crime in which the Federal Government have been willing participants will never be consummated. There are, we venture to say, as many slaves to-day in the Southern States of America as there were a fortnight since, when the proclamation was issued. If the love of liberty would not in itself afford sufficient inducement to a slave to endeavour to secure his freedom, neither would the edict of a lawgiver who admits his inability to give effect to his proclamation. If the Southern slaves have hitherto manifested no inclination to shake off their fetters for their own sakes, it is not probable they will attempt to do so for the sake of a Government they have been taught to hate, and of a population they have never seen. The great bulk of the servile population of the South know as little of the Government of President Lincoln as they do of that of Queen Victoria, and might readily confound the one with the other. We cannot see therefore, why a decree of the American President, emancipating the slaves, would prove more effective than an act of Parliament passed with the same object. To use the President's own language, it will prove as efficacious as a "Papal bull against a comet." In one respect, however, it will prove not altogether inoperative. It will widen the breach already existing between the North and South; it will banish, even from the minds of the sanguine citizens of New York, all hopes of future reunion, and may thus become instrumental in shortening the war.

THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON ON THE FRENCH OCCUPATION OF MEXICO.

The following is a letter from the Emperor Napoleon to General Forey, Commander-in-Chief of the French army in Mexico:—

Fontainebleau, July 3, 1862.

My dear General.—At the moment when you are about to start for Mexico, charged with political and military powers, I think it useful to make you well acquainted with my ideas.

The line of conduct you will have to follow is:—1. To publish on your arrival a proclamation, the principal points of which will be indicated to you. 2. To receive with the greatest kindness all the Mexicans who shall present themselves. 3. Not to espouse the quarrel of any party; to declare that everything is provisional, so long as the Mexican nation shall not have expressed its opinion; to show great deference for religion, but at the same time to tranquillize the holders of national property. 4. To feed, pay, and arm, according to your means, the Mexican auxiliary troops, and make them play principal parts in the combats. 5. To maintain among your own troops, as well as among the auxiliaries, the most severe discipline; to vigorously repress any act or word insulting to the Mexicans, for the pride of their character must not be forgotten, and it is important for the success of the enterprise to conciliate the good feelings of the people.

When we shall have reached the city of Mexico, it is to be desired that the principal persons of all political shades who shall have embraced our cause should come to an understanding with you to organize a Provisional Government. The Government will submit to the Mexican people the question of the political régime which is to be definitely established. An assembly will be afterwards elected according to the Mexican laws.

You will aid the new Government to introduce into the Administration, and particularly into the finances, that regularity of which France offers the best model. For that purpose capable men will be sent to second its new organization.

The object to be attained is not to impose on the Mexicans a form of Government which would be obnoxious, but to assist them in their efforts to establish, according to their own wishes, a Government which may have a chance of stability, and can secure to France the settlement of the injuries of which she has to complain.

It follows, as a matter of course, that, if the Mexican prefer a monarchy, it is for the interest of France to support them in that path.

There will not be wanting people who will ask you why we expend men and money to found a regular Government in Mexico.

In the present state of the civilization of the world,—the prosperity of America is not a matter of indifference to Europe, for it is that country which feeds our manufactories and gives an impulse to our commerce. We have an interest in the Republic of the United States being powerful and prosperous, but not that she should take possession of the whole of the Gulf of Mexico, thence command the Antilles as well as South America, and be the only dispenser of the products of the New World.

We now see by sad experience how precarious is the lot of a branch of manufacture, which is compelled to procure its raw material in a single market, all the vicissitudes of which it has to bear.

If, on the contrary, Mexico maintains her independence and the integrity of her territory, if a stable Government be there constituted with the assistance of France, we shall have restored to the Latin race on the other side the Atlantic all its strength and its prestige; we shall have guaranteed security to our West India colonies and to those of Spain; we shall have established our friendly influence, in the centre of America, and that influence by creating immense markets for our commerce, will procure us the raw materials indispensable for our manufactures.

Mexico thus regenerated will always be well-disposed towards us, not only out of gratitude, but also because her interests will be in accord with ours, and because she will find support in her friendly relations with European Powers.

At present, therefore, our military honour engaged, the necessities of our policy, the interests of our industry and commerce, all conspire to make it our duty to march on to Mexico, to boldly plant our flag there, and to establish either a monarchy, if not incompatible with the national feeling, or at least a Government which may promise some stability.

NAPOLEON.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF DUBLIN TO MRS. H. B. STOWE.

His Grace the Archbishop of Dublin has addressed the following letter to Mrs. H. B. Stowe:—

Palace, Dublin, Jan. 6.

Dear Madam.—In acknowledging your letter and pamphlet, I take the opportunity of laying before you what I collect to be the prevailing sentiments here on American affairs. Of course there is a great variety of opinion, as may be expected in a country like ours. Some few sympathize with the Northerners, and some with the Southerners, but far the greater portion sympathize with neither completely, but lament that each party should be making so much greater an expenditure of life and property than can be compensated for by any advantage they can dream of obtaining.

Those who are the least favourable to the Northerners are not so from any approbation of slavery, but from not understanding that the war is waged in the cause of abolition. It was waged, they say, ostensibly for the restoration of the Union, and, in attestation of this, they refer to the proclamation which announced the confiscation of slaves that were the property of secessionists, while those who adhered to the Federal cause should be exempt from such confiscation, which, they say, did not savour much of zeal for abolition.

Many, who have a great dislike to slavery, yet hold that the Southerners had at least as much right to secede as the Americans had originally to revolt from Great Britain. And there are many who think that, considering the dreadful distress we have suffered from the cotton famine, we have shown great forbearance in withstanding the temptation to recognize the Southern States and break the blockade. Then, again, there are some who are provoked at the incessant railing at England, and threats of an invasion of Canada, which are poured forth in some of the American papers.

There are many also who consider that the present state of things cannot continue much longer, if the Confederates continue to hold their own as they have done hitherto, and that a people who shall have maintained their independence for two or three years will be recognized by the principal European powers. Such appears to have been the procedure of the European powers in all similar cases—such as the revolt of the Anglo-American and Spanish-American colonies, of the Haytiens and the Belgians. In these, and other like cases, the rule practically adopted seems to have been to recognize the revolvers, not at once, but after a reasonable time had been allowed to see whether they could maintain their independence, and this without being understood to have pronounced any decision either way as to the justice of the cause.

Moreover, there are many who say that the negroes and people of colour are far from being kindly or justly treated in the Northern States. An emancipated slave, at any rate, has not received good training for earning his bread by the wages of labour; and if, in addition to this and his being treated as an outcast, he is excluded, as it is said, from many employments, by the refusal of the white labourers to work along with him, he will have gained little by taking refuge in the Northern States.

I have now laid before you what I conceive to be the view most prevalent amongst us, and for which I am not myself responsible. For the safe and effectual emancipation of slaves, I myself consider there is no plan so good as the gradual one, which was long ago suggested by Bishop Hinds. What he recommended was an ad valorem tax upon slaves, the value to be fixed by the owner, with an option to government to purchase at that price. Thus the slaves would be a burden to the master, and those the most so who should be the most intelligent and steady, and, therefore, the best qualified for freedom; and it would be his interest to train his slaves to be free labourers, and to emancipate them, one by one, as speedily as he could with safety. I fear, however, that the time is gone by for trying this experiment in America—with best wishes for the new year, I remain, dear Madam, yours faithfully,

RD. WHATELY.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised, classified, and liberal SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property
&c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important European and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance, and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. EARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

President Davis's Message was delivered on the 14th inst. The telegraphic summary indicates that the President was very emphatic on the subject of recognition. He said, though peace will be hailed with joy by the Confederacy, it can only be accepted with the recognition of her independence. The neutrality of Europe he construes into a decision against the South. He complains that the European Powers declared neutrality without acknowledging the sovereignty of the seceded States, thus injuring the South and prolonging the war, by admitting the doctrine that the Federal Government had a right to coerce the seceded States. If these States were independent, the refusal to entertain the same international intercourse with them as with the North was unjust—no matter what may have been the motive prompting it. He does not complain of any treaty being concluded between the United States and Europe for the abolition of privateering, although the prohibition to either belligerent to dispose of its prizes in European ports operated with intense severity against the South, by depriving her of the only means of maintaining, with some approach to equality, a struggle on the ocean. He denounces the conduct of the Union armies as atrocious and cruel. Referring to Mr. Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, he says he may well leave it to the instincts of the common humanity of men of all countries to pass judgment upon a measure by which millions of human beings of inferior race, peaceful and contented labourers in their sphere, are doomed to extermination, while they are encouraged to commit assassination by an insidious recommendation to abstain from violence—unless in self-defence. Commissioned Federal officers attempting to execute the proclamation will, if captured, be delivered to the State authorities, to be dealt with according to the State laws for the punishment of criminals exciting insurrection. He pronounces the progress of the war thus far satisfactory.

We also learn that President Davis delivered a speech on the 3rd inst. at Raleigh, North Carolina, in which he declared "that the whole people of the South-West as well as the South were determined to resist the North in its war of subjugation and emancipation, that the new year had found the Confederates victorious at all points, and that their enemies were at last beginning to feel those miseries which the people of the South had borne so patiently. He exhorted them to stand firm, and assured them that in the end they would enjoy an amount of prosperity they never could attain in connection with the Yankee nation of extortioners.

A week since we recorded that gold in New York was, at the then latest advices, 36 per cent. premium. An extraordinary advance has taken place since then. The Government Bill for the issue of $900,000,000 of United States' Bonds has caused great speculation in Wall-street, but not a panic, and on the 15th of January gold was at 50 per cent. premium. Those who have sent up the price of gold, and consequently sent down the price of Government paper, have done so with the hope of gain. They "bull" the market one week, that they may "bear" it the week after. When the panic comes, as come it must, we may be sure that there will be no speculation, but a host of sellers seeking in vain for buyers. Now the price of gold may recede; then it will be impossible to put off the evil day any longer. Sooner or later the speculators will think the Government is (financially) on its last legs, and the general public will find that greenbacks are worth little more than autumn leaves; and then, when all are sellers, the Chase bubble will burst. The rapid rise in gold may lead to a panic, but there does not seem to have been any panic up to the 15th of January. The calmness of the public is so remarkable that it can only be accounted for by the supposition that there is no intention of paying the debt, and that repudiation is looked upon as a legitimate and necessary sequence of the present prodigious expenditure. If the Northerners were versed in political economy, they would know that repudiation does not compensate for prodigal waste. The man who runs through his fortune and gets into debt may obtain a certificate of bankruptcy that will protect him from the claws of his creditors, but that certificate will not save his credit or restore to him his fortune or capital. The North must pay the penalty for its folly. It cannot cheat other nations, because other nations will not trust it, and so the novel and curious idea is entertained of cheating itself. If the Federals understood that repudiation will not retrieve the past, will not replace the waste of war, the advent of peace would be near at hand. Gold being at 50 per cent. premium will not stop the war so long as Congress will give the Government as much paper as it demands, for the increase in the premium on gold only necessitates a larger production of paper money. But if gold being at 50 per cent premium should bring about a panic, and the panic repudiation, and it should be found that bankruptcy and repudiation do not repay the terrible cost of war, then, indeed, the Federal contractors and their co-partners—the clergy and fanatics of New England—may feel assured that their day of plunder and bloodshed is over.

Certainly, the statement of Mr. Spalding to Congress of the financial position of the Federal Government is rather alarming. He said that the Government needed immediately $150,000,000. All the gold and silver in the banks of the loyal States was $87,000,000. Bonds could not be sold, because there was no redundancy of currency. $1,117,000,000 were required, in addition to the receipts from the customs and taxes, to carry on the Government until July 1864. It is necessary to borrow in some form $1,900,000 every day, Sundays included, between this time and the 1st of next July. The public debt in July 1864 is estimated at $2,000,000,000. Mr. Spalding explained that the only hope of success in financial schemes depended upon military success, as from the Southern declaration, the war must continue. "All is lost if victories are not achieved, because the Southern Confederacy depends upon force to sustain it. No compromise can be made." The only thing to be done to help the North is to continue a costly and hopeless war! But Mr. Spalding is so far right, that nothing can make the schemes of the Government go down, but such victories as may enable it to gull the public that the debt is to be paid by the confiscation of the South. He is right in saying, "No compromise can be made."

A joint resolution, authorizing Mr. Chase to issue $100,000,000 worth of greenbacks for the payment of the army and navy, has passed both Houses, thus giving him double the amount he asked for that purpose. In like manner, the Missouri Emancipation Aid Bill, which proposes an appropriation of $10,000,000, has been reported back by the Judiciary Committee, with a recommendation that it be increased to $20,000,000. People who live on credit are generally liberal.

When it could be no longer concealed, the Federal repulse at Vicksburg was admitted. After a week's fighting the Federals were driven back to their transports, "in no condition to renew the attack." In fact, they had retired up the Mississippi. The assailants were finally worsted by the force under the command of General Joseph Johnston. What the losses were is not yet known. The Federals confess their loss exceeds 5000; that among the officers slain are Generals Morgan and Smith; and that 1500 Federals sent to execute a special order are supposed to be captured. The casualties of the week's fighting will probably prove to be double the Federal estimate. In our experience of Federal calculations we have always found the expressions "not less" and "exceeding" to mean that the losses are not less or exceed double the number stated. For the time, at all events, Vicksburg is free from the foe.

Admiral Farragut could not pass with his flotilla beyond Port Hudson to co-operate in the attack on Vicksburg. It was therefore determined by the Federals to attack Port Hudson, which is strongly defended. It was to be a combined operation of land forces under General Banks, gunboats, and ironclads. Whether the attack has been made was not known in New York, though on the 14th of January there was a rumour on the New York Stock Exchange that General Banks and Commander Farragut had been repulsed on the Mississippi. Reports circulated by stock-jobbers must, under the circumstances of the New York Exchange, be received with great caution. Although we have some days' later news this rumour is not confirmed. Whether it is true or false, we know that Port Hudson is prepared for attack, and will be defended to the last extremity.

The Federals have punished their commander for his non-success at Vicksburg. General Sherman has been superseded by General McClelland. Before the assault upon Vicksburg General Sherman was regarded by the Federals as one of their best and most reliable generals.

On New Year's Day General Magruder recaptured Galveston, Texas. The attack was made by sea and land, and the naval operations were remarkably successful. The Confederates, not having cannon, protected their gunboats by cotton bales, and used their rifles. The Federal war steamer Harriet Lane, heavily armed, was captured, with 200 prisoners. This vessel was named after a niece of ex-President Buchanan, and used by the Prince of Wales during his tour in America. Two vessels laden with coal were also taken. The steamer Westfield was blown up. Two other Federal gunboats escaped to South-West Pass. The rifles of the Confederates were effective; Commodore Reushaw and several officers perished, and altogether the Federals admit a loss of 160 killed. General Magruder is reported to have captured 600 prisoners, and a large quantity of stores and arms. By this victory the blockade is broken, and the Federal navy again thoroughly and unexpectedly beaten. The Harriet Lane is a valuable prize, and probably may aid and assist the Alabama in her task. If so, the New York Chamber of Commerce will not have any excuse for abusing England, for the Harriet Lane was fitted out by Federal contractors, irrespective of cost.

Although General Rosecrans was not able to follow the Confederates, the Confederates will not let him rest. The Federal commander is already anxious about the safety of his supports, and represents that Generals Forrest, Wheeler, and Stearns, with three full batteries of cannon, are advancing to capture them. Perhaps so; but, generally speaking, the Confederates effect their captures without suffering their intentions to transpire. The Confederate detachment, however, means work, for it has burnt a steamboat and captured some prisoners. The extent of the Federal defeat at Murfreesboro is evident from the inactivity of General Rosecrans and the activity of his victorious adversary.

General Bragg has been superseded in the command of the Confederate force in Tennessee by General Longstreet.

It is reported in New York that "on their retreat after the battle of Vicksburg the Federal gunboats proceeded up the Arkansas River. On the 11th they assailed Arkansas post, 100 miles from the river's mouth. The post was defended by 7000 men, who, being attacked in front and rear, surrendered unconditionally, after a short and sharp struggle, and a loss of 550 killed and wounded. The Federal loss is reported at 200 killed and wounded."

It is rumoured that General Burnside has made a new movement across the Rappahannock, but no details are known.

General Sweeny, with 1000 men and a section of artillery, is reported to have defeated 1400 Confederates, with four cannon, under General Roddy, at Cane Creek, Alabama, capturing 82 prisoners and $50,000 worth of cotton, grain, horses, &c.

General Grant has fallen back to Oxford, Mississippi, and for the present has abandoned his movement upon Grenada.

The Alabama is actively engaged in the West Indies. She captured two vessels in Mona Passage. One of them, the Parker, of Boston, was destroyed; the other, the Union, from Baltimore, was released on giving a bond of $1500 for the vessel. The cargo was not touched, being owned by British subjects.

Great excitement prevails in Albany on the question of the Speakership. More than 100 ballottings have resulted in ties. The Republicans, fearing an ultimate defeat, have changed their nominee for a war Democrat. The Democrats are making every effort to elect their candidate.

Colonel J. W. Wall, who was arbitrarily sent to Fort Lafayette, by Mr. Simon Cameron, a few months ago, has been elected Senator for New Jersey. Mr. Cameron, who was himself a candidate for the same position in Pennsylvania, has been rejected.

The President's letter to General McClellan, dated in April last, produced before the McDowell Court-martial, admits that he interfered with McClellan's plans, and prevented McDowell from co-operating with him in the peninsula.

It is reported that 6000 Confederates were repulsed in an attack on Springfield, Missouri. We need not add that, according to the New York papers, the Confederates "are actively pursued."

The Confederate General Morgan is reported to have re-entered Kentucky.

According to the New York journals, Richmond papers to the 8th inst. contain a Mobile despatch of the 7th, reporting the capture of Trenton, Union City, and Humboldt, with over 2000 prisoners, two cannon, and a large amount of commissary stores. The attack on Jackson, Tennessee, was a feint to cover the Confederate operations. The railroad from Jackson to Columbus has been destroyed.

Amongst the military news of the North we must give place to the following paragraph:—

General Wool, late of Baltimore, has been appointed to the military command of the Eastern Department, including New York and the New England States. His headquarters will be in New York city.

Do the loyal New Englanders need military supervision? or are they in any danger of attack?

There are many signs that in the North people are tired of the war, and are anxious to make peace with the South, but as yet it does not seem to be distinctly understood that the South is now a foreign and separate Power, and that negotiations can only be opened by the recognition of the fact. A resolution has been introduced in the New Jersey Legislature proposing an armistice and a convention for discussing the terms of an amicable settlement between North and South. In the Federal Congress on the 14th inst., Mr. Vallandigham "expressed himself strongly in favour of foreign mediation. He said it was the speediest and easiest mode of suspending hostilities, and that the present was the auspicious moment. By mediation he did not mean arbitration, but a reference of the subjects of controversy between the two belligerents to Switzerland, Russia, or any other impartial Power or State in Europe. The final arbitration of the quarrel, he believed, lay with the people of the North-Western States." The New York Tribune says that if foreign mediation was offered to and first accepted by the South, the North should take it into earnest consideration, with a desire to find its acceptance compatible with their imperative duties. This is very kind of the Tribune. May we suggest that the South is willing to make peace at any moment; that the Confederate States is waging a purely defensive war, and only demands its imperative rights—that is, to be let alone?

The Richmond press, of all shades of opinion, repudiate all thought of such overtures. The Richmond Enquirer says, "the separation is eternal." The Richmond Examiner says:—

The time for Peace Congresses is past. So long as the States were component parts of the same Confederacy, it was both lawful and proper that the representatives of their sovereignties should confer upon and discuss questions and affairs affecting them all. Nothing in the Constitution forbade such a conference, or deprived its recommendations of respectability and authority. But such a Convention is impossible now. It is predicated upon the idea that the late Union still exists; that the Southern Confederacy does not exist; that the men of Virginia, Carolina, Georgia, &c., are fellow-citizens of the men inhabiting Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania. To admit the possibility of such a Convention ignores the legitimate function of the Confederate Government. The States of the Confederacy have delegated their authority over their foreign affairs to a common Executive and Legislature. They cannot now take a single step in any dealing with foreign nations without violating the solemn compact by which they created that Government. The States of the Union are in precisely the same attitude toward the Government of the Union. They have no authority or power to treat with the Southern States or any other foreign State.

The Richmond Despatch, of the 10th inst., is discussing the peace propositions of the New York Democratic Association, says the only wish of the South is to be separated from the North for ever; that the South is fighting for separation, and will have it if it cost the life of every man in the Confederate States; and that President Davis truly expressed the sentiment of the South when he said the people would sooner unite with a nation of hyenas than with the detestable and detested nation of Yankees. English colonization, French vassalage, or Russian serfdom—each or all were preferable to any association with such people.

The Lincoln Administration is not "thorough" enough for the Republicans. "Thirty-six Republican members of the Senate, forming a clear majority of that body, have presented a memorial to the President expressing a want of confidence in the Administration. They assert that the President is not aided by a Cabinet Council agreeing with him in political principles and general policy, and urge that he make such changes as will secure a unity of purpose and action. They also admonish him that it is unwise and unsafe to intrust any important military operation to any officer who is not a cordial supporter of the Government." Only ultra-Republicans are to be trusted with office, and a minority of New England fanatics is to trample over the majority in the North.

General Butler, who was rather coolly received at New York, met with an enthusiastic reception at Boston. New England clergymen and fanatics—the Cheevers, Beechers, and that set—naturally sympathize with a person who is execrated by the civilized world on account of his inhumanity, and his barbarous treatment of helpless women. We are not surprised that Butler should be honoured in Boston; and we doubt not the pious preachers of that city will gloat over the general's description of the sufferings of his New Orleans' victims. Butler made a speech, in which he said "that his plan for paying the war debt was the introduction of free labour into the South, by which abundant crops of cotton could be produced with profit, at 10 cents per lb. He proposed to lay on this a tax of 10 cents, thus raising the price to 20 cents per lb., which France and England would be obliged to pay. This tax alone, he said, would pay the interest on a debt three times as large as has been contracted for the prosecution of 'the war.' Such a plan would be very acceptable to New-England. An export duty on cotton, and an import duty on cotton fabrics would make the riches of the South the monopoly of the East. Butler's plan is not original. He only announces the intention of his party to make England and France, as well as the South, contribute to the war debt of the North. Such an incident may, however, serve to remind us that the free-trade South is fighting not only for independence, but incidentally, for the commercial interests of Europe.

In the Federal House of Representatives a resolution was offered of thanks to Butler for his humane administration of affairs in the Department of the Gulf.

Resolutions were introduced into the Federal Congress, censuring General Grant for expelling the Jews from his department. General Grant's order has been revoked. It seems as if the Federals had determined to insult every people on the face of the earth.

The Richmond Whig states that the Federal officers captured at Murfreesboro will be confined until Butler is given up to the Confederate Government.

The Richmond Examiner thinks that the Emancipation Proclamation in its effects upon the rebellion or the slaves is not worth the paper on which it is printed. But the Federals will do what they can to make it bear fruit. The Federal Colonel Clusseret writes that he had posted the Emancipation Proclamation on the walls of Winchester, and scattered it among the farms in Virginia. A bill has been introduced in the Federal House of Representatives for the enlistment of 150,000 negro troops. The resolution to lay the bill upon the table was defeated by 83 to 53. The Confederate Government will not hesitate to punish all practical efforts to incite a servile war; and in so doing it will be only acting humanely as well as justly.

Governor Letcher's annual Message to the Virginia Legislature was seven columns long. In relation to the division of the State by Congress, he says:—

I cannot suppose in any treaty of peace that may be agreed upon Virginia will ever recognize the division of her territory, or even consent to a treaty that will strip her of any portion of her domain. It is better that this war should continue for an indefinite period than that Virginia shall be even partially dismembered.

He accuses the North of Vandalism without parallel in the history of warfare, and reiterates a long list of indignities, outrages, and wanton destruction. He estimates the balance in the Treasury, October 1, at $434,000. The total paid for the war is $7,337,000. He advises that all the free negroes now resident in the portions of the State overrun by the enemy be removed and put at work on the fortifications, as they have it in their power to tamper with other slaves, and give valuable information to the enemy. 118 men captured by the Virginia State line at Petersburg and Pikeville, in Kentucky, are confined at Richmond, and the Governor has announced to the President the terms upon which such exchanges can alone be made. He has placed at hard labour in the penitentiary Captain Graham and Lieutenant Wade, as hostages for Captain Dusky and Lieutenant Vanner, now confined in the District of Columbia penitentiary.

It is rumoured that the McNeil massacre has been punished.

The Governor of Virginia has called out the militia in the counties bordering on North Carolina, in order to resist the invasion.

It is again in Washington asserted that General Burnside has finally resigned the command of the Army of the Potomac, and that he is succeeded by General Hooker.

The steamer Giraffe has arrived at a Southern port.

The State Capitol at Baton Rouge has been burned, with all its contents.

ENGLAND.

Lancashire still suffers; the improvement in her condition being very slight and slow. It is probable that a few more mills will open every month during the spring; and a decided Federal victory, rendering it apparently certain that the Southern supply of cotton will not come forward this year, and thereby encouraging the manufacturers to use what they have, might perhaps give employment to about one-third of the operatives. More than this cannot be hoped for, is indeed impossible, unless the ports of the South should be reopened, and the normal relations between the prices of cotton and of cloth re-established. Until that time the dependence of Lancashire must be on the charity of the empire. The following figures exhibit a decrease of 4500 in the number of paupers, but present no features requiring comment:—

Total	31,370

From this total we must deduct all the paupers who have merely been transferred from the Poor-rates to the Relief Committees—probably one-third of the whole, as they amount to 6000 in Blackburn alone. These, and several others, were formerly relieved both by the Unions and the Committees, which have now in some cases divided the business of relief between them, the Guardians undertaking the sole charge of a fixed number, and the Committee taking on them the support of all above that number who are or may become dependent on charity.

The Central Executive Committee held its usual weekly meeting at Manchester on Monday last. A letter was read, addressed by one of the local Committees at Manchester to the Lord Mayor, recommending a better concert between the two central distributing agencies; to which letter no answer had been returned. Subscriptions continue to come in liberally; the amount reported during the week being nearly £20,000, including £500 from Bermuda—a colony very far from wealthy. Mr. Farnall, the Commissioner of the Poor Law Board, read his usual report:—

Manchester, Jan. 26.

My Lords and Gentlemen,—I beg to inform you that on the 17th inst. there was a decrease in the number of persons receiving parochial relief in 27 unions of the cotton manufacturing districts, as compared with the number so relieved in the previous week, of 4907. This decrease of 4907 is explained as follows:—There is a decrease at Ashton-under-Lyne of 843, at Barton-upon-Irwell of 39, at Blackburn of 1,747, at Bolton of 143, at Burnley of 471, at Bury of 204, at Chorley of 18, at Haslingden of 133, at Leigh of 29; at Manchester of 553, at Oldham of 421, at Prestwich of 71, at Rochdale of 384, at Salford of 639, at Stockport of 370, and at Todmorden of 94, making a total decrease of 6159. But there is an increase at Chorlton of 413, at Clitheroe of 439, at the Fylde of 97, at Glossop of 77, at Lancaster of 21, at Macclesfield of 78, at Preston of 72, at Saddleworth of 20, at Warrington of 23, and at Wigan of 21, making a total increase of 1252; so that there is a net decrease of 4907, and since the 6th ult. a total decrease of 32,583 paupers has taken place. There were on the 17th inst. 239,400 persons receiving parochial relief in the 27 unions adverted to; in the corresponding week of last year 70,136 persons were so relieved; there is, therefore, an increase of 169,264 persons in the receipt of parochial relief, or 241.2 per cent. The total weekly cost of out-door relief on the 17th instant was £16,263 14s. 11d.; in the corresponding week of last year it was £3513 9s. 7d.; there is, therefore, an increase of £12,750 5s. 4d., or 362.9 per cent. The average percentage of pauperism on the population of these unions on the 17th instant was 12.1; in the corresponding week of last year it was 3.5. The average amount of out-door relief per head per week, both in kind and in money, in these unions on the 17th instant, was 1s. 5d. The amount of money in the hands of the treasurers of the above unions on the 17th instant was £53,931 5s. 1d. I have received the remaining 16 forms of queries which I issued to the medical officers of the cotton manufacturing districts, and I have now to report that in seven districts there are 18 cases of typhus fever, not of a malignant character, and that the remaining 9 districts are free from typhus fever. I have reason to believe that the following unions are now in a position to avail themselves of the provisions of the Rate-in-Aid Act—viz., Ashton-under-Lyne, Blackburn, Glossop, Haslingden, Manchester, Oldham, Preston, Salford, Stockport, Rochdale, and Todmorden. The returns from Burnley and Bury have not yet been received.

The Chambers of Commerce of Manchester and of Liverpool have held meetings in reference to the cotton supply. At Manchester, Mr. H. Ashworth and some other gentlemen, numbering all the believers in Indian cotton in the trade, had the field pretty much to themselves. A good deal was said about Australia, Egypt, and Italy, but every one seemed glad to turn from so hopeless a prospect to the more congenial topic of India. Nothing was said to show that India could furnish us with a sufficiency of cotton; no notice was taken of the overwhelming evidence given by merchants and statesmen acquainted with India, to prove that she cannot. All the old topics of complaint against the Government were raked up, and Mr. Hugh Mason proposed an invocation to Mr. Bright to set everything to rights. Mr. Cheetham, a very large manufacturer, and once M.P. for South Lancashire, had the sense to differ from his colleagues, and declare that he looked on the prospect of a cotton supply from India, with doubt and despair. At Liverpool, both the members, Mr. Horsfall and Mr. Ewart, cautiously hinted opinions favourable to the recognition of Southern independence.

Mr. Peter Taylor, M.P.—“Hell-hound Taylor,” as he was nick-named by one who had heard his extraordinary burst of abuse in the debate on Mr. Lindsay’s motion for the recognition of the Confederate States—has been delivering himself of a similar burst of fury before his Constituents at Leicester. Let us charitably suppose that he was not, on the last occasion, in a condition to be responsible for what he said. He talked about “an oligarchy of 30,000 or 40,000 slaveowners,” (we quote from the organ of the Americanising faction) governing the Southern States, and over-ruling six or seven millions of “mean whites.” The fact is, that all white men have equal rights in the Southern States; that there is no such class as that signified by the appellation of “mean whites”; that one-half the fathers of families in the South own land, and one-fourth own slaves. What has possessed these Abolitionists that they cannot even understand a plain matter of figures? He repeated that the North was fighting against slavery; that it was the South, and not the North, that had always been hostile to England (how comes it, then, that since the South has seceded the Federal press and Government have been more outrageously insolent to England than ever before?); that the South seized Texas, and wanted the North to seize Canada (which would have destroyed the balance that Texas served for awhile to maintain), and that Southern slavery was the worst that ever existed on earth (which only proves that Mr. Taylor has not a schoolboy’s knowledge of Roman history). He wound up with the same angry abuse of “Southern chivalry.”

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—The Parisian police have been guilty of a very stupid piece of tyranny. M. Levy had announced a work by the Duc d’Anmale, on the House of Condi in the 16th and 17th centuries, and had obtained the sanction of the authorities for its publication. Recently, it is said, at a picture sale, the agent of the Duc d’Anmale outbid a chamberlain of the Emperor, and obtained a valuable work for about £3750, upon which a cheer was raised by the bystanders, which is supposed to have alarmed the Prefect of Police or his superiors. However that may be, certain it is that just before the publication of the book in question, the whole edition was seized at the publishers by the police. Neither M. Levy nor his employer are disposed to submit quietly. The Prefect has been summoned to deliver up the confiscated property; and an application will, it is said, be made for leave to prosecute him. The worst feature of the present system in France is that no functionary can be prosecuted for wrongs done by him in an administrative capacity without permission of the Council of State. Acts of needless repression like this cannot but damage the Imperial Government, and give an idea of instability and insecurity which is not justified by facts.

The distribution of rewards to the French exhibitors in the London Exhibition of 1862 took place on the 25th. The Emperor presided at the distribution, and delivered a speech of great significance, pacific and liberal, in which, after congratulating the exhibitors upon their success, their energy, and their perseverance, in upholding the honour of France, His Majesty said:—

That redoubtable invasion of British soil has, then, been realized;

And continued:—

I am happy to have to reward the bravest of the brave. In fact, we have crossed the Channel and invaded English soil, not with arms which carry ruin, but these which confer prosperity and comfort.

The Emperor afterwards observed that treaties of commerce drew nations nearer to one another and improved their condition, and said:—

If foreigners have to envy us many useful things, France must have seen that she can borrow many moral conquests from England. We have, in fact, borrowed from England that spirit of liberty which, being extended to all opinions, insures the development of all interests.

His Majesty further said that liberty, as understood in England, does not destroy, but improves; and continued:—

Private industry acts for itself. The Government leaves to every one the responsibility of his acts. This system has not been followed without contributing to the industrial and maritime prosperity of our neighbours.

The Emperor further stated his conviction that France would attain the same result when she had completed the bases indispensable to the establishment of public liberties, and concluded by appealing to all to unite in order to arrive at this result.

The note addressed by M. Drouyn de Lhuys to M. Mercier, the French Minister at Washington, dated the 9th. of January, in reference to fresh proposals for peace to be submitted to the Federal Cabinet.

ITALY.—Father Passaglia, the well-known Liberal priest, whose pamphlet against the temporal power of the Popes attracted so much attention, and commenced such a protracted controversy, has been elected to the Chamber of Deputies, by a district in Parma. Alberto Mario, a Mazzinian, and the husband of Miss Jessie M. White, who served under Garibaldi, has been elected by a Sicilian constituency. The ex-Jesuit is already famous; Signor Mario, we believe, will prove himself both an abler and a wiser man than he is supposed to be. Of the sect denominated “strong-minded women,” we know none so womanly and with so much real strength of mind as the lady whose alliance with him is as yet his principal claim to the notice of an English journal.

GERMANY.—The Liberal majority in the Prussian Chambers, the Moderates holding aloof, has caused an address to the King to be drawn up, reflecting severely on the recent conduct nominally of the Ministers, but really of the Crown. The following are the most important passages:—

We begin our work under sad auspices, and feel it our duty to make respectful representations to your Majesty concerning the state of public affairs.

Since last Session the Ministers have carried on the public administration against the Constitution, and without a legal Budget. The supreme right of the representatives of the people has thereby been attacked. The country has been alarmed, and has stood by its representatives.

A small minority of the people only has, encouraged by the Ministers, carried the worst calumnies against the Chamber of Deputies to the foot of the Throne in the form of addresses.

Abuses of the power of the Government are now taking place just as in the sad years which preceded the Regency. Your Majesty recently declared that nobody should doubt your intention of maintaining the Constitution, but the Constitution has already been violated by the Ministers.

Our position imposes on us the most urgent duty of solemnly declaring that peace at home and power abroad can only be restored to the Government by its returning to a constitutional state of things.

M. Bismark von Schonhausen was present at the deliberations of the committee which drew up this address, and declared that he would not advise the King to accept it. He showed his ignorance of constitutional principles by complaining that the Deputies drew a distinction between the King and the Ministers, as if the former had been absent, and did not know what the latter had done.

The proposition to establish a representation of the peoples of Germany in conjunction with the Federal Diet has been rejected by that body. The representative of Prussia declared himself in favour of some form of popular representation, and declared his willingness to yield extensive legislative powers to a Federal Parliament in which a national representation should be included.

POLAND.—There is terrible news from Poland. Russian oppression and patriotic passion have at last driven the people of that unhappy land into another hopeless insurrection. The accounts received come, of course, from Russian sources, or sources friendly to Russia; the character of the insurgents is blackened, and the importance of the insurrection deprecated, as far as possible. But its dimensions are evidently alarming. It broke out simultaneously, on the night of the 22nd, in many different parts of the kingdom. At Warsaw, and in the neighbourhood, the soldiers billeted in private houses, or cantoned in detachments, were first attacked and many of them killed; afterwards the insurgents came into collision with a body of troops, and were worsted with heavy loss, after killing and wounding some hundred of their adversaries. At several other points the Poles have appeared in force; and in one case have compelled a Russian detachment to “retire for fear of being surrounded.” Hundreds, nay thousands, of conscripts have disappeared; some to join the insurrection, some to escape across the frontier. The insurrection can have no prospect of success; its duration depends first on the attitude of the educated and reflecting classes, and secondly on the hope of foreign intervention. We fear that many men who know that the cause is already lost will feel compelled to espouse it, and that the insurgents will trust in aid from France so long as to provoke the Russians to extreme severity. The affair is a terrible mistake, and will prove a fearful calamity to Poland. Hundreds shot, dozens hanged, scores flogged to death, thousands drafted into the army of the Caucasus, or sent to Siberia—this is all that a Polish insurrection means for Poland. Death for those who are fortunate enough to find it; a lifetime of unspeakable misery for those who fail to die; brutalities to women of which Haynau would have been ashamed, and which Butler would not have dared to perpetrate—this is what Poland must expect from her victorious master, Vae Victis! Terrible as is the guilt of those who drove this miserable people into hopeless rebellion, we cannot but think that those are scarcely less guilty who, with the opportunity of judging its chances and the means of knowing it to be hopeless, have commenced such a struggle, and exposed their countrymen to massacre, and their countrywomen to punishments worse than death by an attempt which has not the faintest prospect of success. And terribly will they atone for their error; terribly one day will Russia pay for the crimes of which that error is begotten.

The Czar addressed the officers on parade at St. Petersburg, using the following language concerning the Polish rebellion:—

Even in presence of these atrocities I will not accuse the whole Polish nation. I see in these events only the work of the revolutionary party, desirous of overturning legal order everywhere. I know that this party reckons upon finding traitors in our ranks. It will, however, not shake my belief in the faith and devotedness of the army, which will now, more than ever, fulfil its duties. Should circumstances require, you will prove that I can depend upon you.

Some reports represent the insurrection as a mere rising of the peasantry, instigated by hopes of seizing on the landed estates of the gentry, and state that many of the latter have taken refuge in Warsaw. The Polish provinces of Prussia are quiet.

The insurrection at Warsaw is said to have been provoked entirely by the severity with which the conscription has been pressed. Men are no longer taken by lot; they are now selected by the police from the most intelligent of the population of the cities. A razzia commenced in Warsaw on the night of the 14th instant, and some thousands of young men were seized—some of them married. If the object of the seizure had made his escape, his parents were made prisoners in his stead. Hence the outbreak; for, in despite of prudence, and of the remonstrances of all who retained their self-command, the people could endure no longer.

GREECE.—The question whether the Duke of Saxe-Coburg will or will not accept the throne of Greece, whether Greece will choose him, and whether the great Powers will acquiesce in the choice, are still undecided. The Duke's acceptance is said to hang on the consent of the Powers to certain terms now proposed by him, as formerly by his relative, Leopold King of the Belgians, and on the consent of his people to allow him to retain the nominal sovereignty of his Duchy, and appoint a Regent. The following letter explains the probable feeling of Greece:—

To the Editor of the Times.

Sir,—It is possible that some of your readers may imagine there is an insuperable obstacle to the elevation of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg to the Greek throne, in the resolve which the Greek people have so perseveringly manifested to accept no other than Prince Alfred for their King. Fearing lest such an impression might in some way or other prove unpropitious to that excellent dynastic prospect, I feel called upon to communicate to you the general opinion of the Greek mercantile community in England respecting it. We see in it the same advantage for our beloved country as that which an English King would have afforded her—namely, the friendship of England; for, although Duke Ernest is but the Sovereign of a small German principality, he is recommended to us by England; and he is so closely allied with her Royal family by ties of consanguinity, and so much cherished by the English people as the champion of constitutional liberty on the Continent, that we feel assured his election to the Greek throne would promote the same praiseworthy ends as those the Greek people had in view in offering the crown to Prince Alfred. The Duke of Saxe-Coburg is, moreover, the chief of that powerful dynastic connexion which stands at the head of the free Governments of Europe, and which promises to exercise in future on the fortunes of that Continent even a greater influence than it does at present; in fine, we discern in Duke Ernest the same noble character for which England honours the memory of his lamented brother, the late Prince Consort, and we discover in him the personal qualities and the auxiliary advantages which, in our opinion, the King of Greece ought to possess. The prospect of his election consoles us for the great disappointment the entire Greek nation has experienced in its hopes respecting Prince Alfred. That devoutly wished for consummation would be hailed by us as a great blessing from a beneficent Providence.

I am Sir, your obedient servant,

5, Copthall-court, Jan. 24. M. E. MAVROCORDATO.

It is said that Russia will object; considering the Duke as closely allied to the Royal family of England as the Duke of Leuchtenberg—excluded as a Romanoff—to her own. So far even as relationship is concerned this is not true; but further, Leuchtenberg has been expressly recognized by Russia as a member of the Imperial House, while the Duke of Saxe-Coburg holds no such position towards England.

The latest intelligence is that Prince of Leiningen has been proposed as a candidate for the Throne of Greece. His serene highness is a grandson of the late Duchess of Kent, who was first married to Charles Louis, Prince of Leiningen. He is consequently related by the half blood to her Majesty the Queen, but in no way forms part of the royal family of England, and does not, therefore, fall under the exclusion of the protocol of 1830. His highness, who is a Protestant, is in his thirty-third year, and was married in 1838 to the Princess Maria of Baden. He is a post-captain in the British service, and commands the Magicienue on the Mediterranean Station.

Correspondence from Athens reports that the Assembly was still (16th) occupied with the verification of the elections.

THE EAST.

By the death of Said Pasha, Ismail, his nephew, the son of Ibrahim, succeeds to the Viceroyalty of Egypt. The new Prince has already received the Consular body—for in Egypt, which is nominally a dependency of the Porte, diplomatists must bear the title of Consuls, and in reply to their congratulations on his accession, has addressed to them a very remarkable speech. Not confining himself to the complimentary nothings suitable to the occasion, his Highness promises to establish order and economy in the finances; and to secure this end, declares that he will confine himself to a fixed civil list. His master, the Sultan, promised the same thing, but has not, we fear, strictly kept his word. On this reform hangs the power of the Viceroy to do all else that he has promised, and seems really anxious to perform: above all, to abolish the corvées or impressment of labourers on Government works, which have done so much to retard the advance of Egypt in civilization and prosperity. The administration of the Viceroys has already done wonders for their country, has developed its resources and furthered its progress until it has far surpassed the realm to which it is nominally subject; and if the present Pasha keeps his word, Egypt will rank as high, in another generation, as any non-Christian and non-Caucasian nation can ever hope to do, among civilized countries.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Jan. 28, 1863.

Our last report closed upon a dull, lifeless market, with no disposition on the part of the trade to buy, except for their immediate requirements, and no anxiety on the part of holders to sell beneath the quotations. Fair Dhollerahs are worth 17½d.

On Thursday we were still without animation, though prices were well maintained, the sales reaching 4000 bales.

On Friday, advices from New York to 12th inst. were to hand, reporting the failure of the Federals before Vicksburg, and their retreat after a severe handling by their opponents. At Galveston the Confederates had, by a sudden attack, repossessed themselves of the town, and sunk, captured, and put to flight the blockading fleet, adding one more to a list of naval victories, as brilliant as they were unexpected. The news did not affect our market, which remained very quiet, with a business of only 3000 bales; and Manchester, in sympathy with Liverpool, was dull and inanimate.

On Saturday the sales were 4000 bales without change. On Monday a little better feeling was apparent, and the sales reached 5000 bales at steady prices. In absence of any American or India news, both of which were quite due, on Tuesday business was very much restricted, and in Manchester a stagnant tone prevailed with no disposition on the part of buyers to operate. To-day the Asia's news are to hand. She reports a great advance in gold, which had reached the enormous premium of 48, and exchange was quoted 163. Particulars of M. Drouyn de Lhuys' recent despatch to the French Minister at Washington have been published to-day; it is regarded here as certain to share the same fate of its predecessors. The North on the one hand is in no mood to listen to friendly advice based on a disruption of the Union, while the South, according to its President's avowed will on consideration return to the Union, and it is impossible now to see after Lincoln's proclamation any ground, on which the North can meet to treat with those whose ruin and destruction they are endeavouring to accomplish.

The bank rate was to-day raised from 4 to 5 per cent. and fears are entertained that even this movement will not be sufficient to check the withdrawal of bullion from the bank, and that a further rise will be necessary before long.

Our market has accordingly been very flat, with sales of 3000 bales at ½ decline, and it seems probable we shall still droop for a little unless the India advices are very strong. We quote Fair Dhollerahs 17½d., and Middling Orleans 23½d. nominal.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, January 27.

Our yarn and cloth market still continues in that unsatisfactory state which we have described, during the past month, and if any change at all has taken place, it is for the worse, as the amount of purchases of either staple has been very insignificant.

Yarns, for export, are in little request, yet there is not the slightest disposition shown to give way in prices on the part of holders.

Home trade yarns are also little enquired for, consequent on the determination of many of the manufacturers who had resumed work lately, to close their mills again, as the price of yarn exceeded, in many instances, the price that could be obtained for the cloth made from it.

Cloths are still neglected, and very little business, if any, has been done in them during the week.

To-day our market has been excessively quiet, owing to the anticipated advance in the Bank rate to 5 per cent. at an early date, and to the non-arrival of the Asia (due on Sunday last), and the telegram from Bombay up to the 12th inst.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

PRESENT MANUFACTURING PROSPERITY OF THE NORTHERN STATES.

The following extract from a private letter pointedly illustrates what we have repeatedly shown to be the insuperable obstacle to the spontaneous cessation of the American war:—

I will not close without alluding to, perhaps, the strangest feature of the times, as relates to New England. I refer to the apparent material prosperity of the business and manufacturing community. I believe it to be false and hollow bridging over an abyss of irredeemable paper that threatens to swallow up everything, should the war continue much longer. In this town there has not been a failure of a mercantile firm for some two years, and it is believed that there has never been a time for ten years when so much money has been made. The Bank and savings' institutions are loaded down with deposits, and interest is lower than ever before known—or rather there is no desire to make loans, or to pay interest. Ship carpenters and builders are busily employed, and high wages are paid to all kinds of mechanics. Manufacturing companies are declaring unheard-of dividends. A cotton factory at Salem has declared a half-yearly dividend of 66 per cent.; another at Saeco, 50 per cent.; another at Lewiston, 45 per cent., payable in January. A rifle factory at Connecticut has been paying monthly dividends of 12½ per cent. for a long time, and our two lines of coast steamers from this port have already divided this year 35 and 37½ per cent., and I suppose another dividend of equal value is more than half-earned. The tax-gatherer has, as yet, hardly been seen, and can you wonder that the common people fail to see that the war is ruining both sections of the country, that we are accumulating a load of debt that can never be paid?

Foreign Correspondence.

PARIS, January 27.

It is generally expected that France will, before long, recognize the Confederate States of America. Without entering into details of negotiations, which are imperfectly known and variously reported, it will be sufficient to state that I believe there are good grounds for the report that M. Drouyn de Lhuys has addressed a joint despatch to Richmond and Washington, proposing terms, on the rejection of which by the North, the independent existence of the Southern Confederacy will be immediately recognized.

The semi-official papers have, one and all, given details of the plan proposed by M. Drouyn de Lhuys, which must be received with great caution. They all, however, agree in stating that a kind of Congress, to be attended by the representatives of both belligerents, is its principal feature. As M. Drouyn de Lhuys' despatch will shortly be published in the Moniteur, it is useless to speculate on particulars which incomplete information, and a too lively imagination, have suggested to the confraternity of semi-official writers.

One fact I can assure you of, that it is the conviction of the Emperor himself, and more than one leading member of the Government, that the continuance of the war can lead to no issue. M. Drouyn de Lhuys, in the despatches I sent you last week, has, indeed, intimated that the North had better give up as a bad job their attempt to reduce into subjection a country whose armies are constantly victorious, and whose improvised gunboats are able to destroy the elaborately got-up flotillas, which ought to give the North the command of the sea.

The constant defeats of the Yankees are greatly disheartening their friends in Paris. Even the Debats, which has disgraced itself by an apology of the Butler, the Yankee Jeffreys admits the doubtful character of the so-called victory of Murfreesboro'; and the Moniteur clearly shows it to have been a drawn battle. The Federal defeats at Vicksburg and Galveston have also produced a great impression, and, as a matter of course, contributed to the feeling that the intervention of the French Government portends the beginning of the end.

I direct your attention to the following passage in a

Paris letter in the Independent Bells, the importance of which, if correct, cannot be exaggerated:—

Mr. Dayton, United States' Minister in Paris, has been officially informed that proposals for the appointment of Commissioners from the two belligerent States in America, with a view to bring about a termination of hostilities, have been addressed to the Federal Government through M. Mercier.

On Sunday the Emperor distributed the insignia of the Legion of Honour to the manufacturers who distinguished themselves at the London Exhibition. The ceremony was splendid as a pageant, and the Emperor improved the opportunity by delivering a speech, which is by far the most important political manifesto that has been issued by the French Government since the establishment of the Second Empire. It has more than once remarked that the Emperor alone, in France, enjoyed the privilege of speaking freely, and he certainly amply availed himself of it on this occasion. How many papers have been warned for timidly venturing to hint the wholesome truths which the Emperor so broadly proclaimed! After congratulating the exhibitors on having at length succeeded in carrying into effect the long foretold invasion of England, His Majesty pointed out the superiority of England over France, and praised the real liberty, the absence of Government interference, the orderly discussion, the spirit of self control and self-reliance, which are the characteristics of our happy country. His Majesty held out hopes that France would soon be in a position to acquire for herself the blessings on which he so eloquently expatiated. I need hardly say that such a declaration, from such a quarter is highly important; but I may state that it is all the more appreciated from its being unexpected, and great curiosity prevails as to the measures the Emperor will take to carry out the liberal programme with which he has so agreeably surprised the nation. It would be an insult to the Emperor's intellect to suppose that he thinks a mere declaration in favour of liberty is sufficient to train his people to it, and therefore it is only reasonable to look forward to the abolition of arbitrary laws, and the adoption of those measures which alone can educate the people to freedom—trial by jury and the Habeas Corpus.

The insurrection in Poland, though far from unexpected, has created the most painful impression in Paris. The brutality of the conscription, arbitrary arrests, Siberia and an abuse of the knout, have driven the Poles to this act of despair—the people have been literally goaded to insurrection by the tyranny to which they were subjected—a policy equally cowardly and atrocious. There is no doubt that the insurrection will soon be put down, but the bloodshed has already been very great. Those who have fallen, however, are fortunate. Death by a musket-ball is preferable to death under the knout, or a life in a Russian dungeon. It is to be hoped that after this we shall not hear, for some time to come at least, of the sanctimonious professions of good will towards the "Christians" whom the Court of St. Petersburg thinks fit to consider oppressed under the easy and tolerant rule of the Porte.

It is asserted that a complete reconciliation has taken place between the Emperor and Prince Napoleon. At the ceremony of Sunday, His Imperial Highness was received with pointed courtesy both by His Majesty and the Empress, and it was generally remarked that the Prince took the Prince Imperial's hand to lead him out of the room at the close of the day's proceedings. This has given rise to many surmises as to the decline of clerical influence, as to the extent of which, you will remember, I cautioned you many weeks ago. In short, all the world believes that a great change is about to take place.

SPEECH OF PRESIDENT DAVIS.

The following report of the speech of President Davis, delivered to the Mississippi Legislature on December the 26th, is taken by the Northern press from the Jackson Mississippian. It is evidently a very imperfect report.

After a complimentary allusion to Mississippi and her soldiers, the President spoke of his love for the old Union. He alluded to it, however, as a matter of regret that the best affections of his heart should have been bestowed upon an object so unworthy—that he should have loved so long a Government which was rotten to its very core. He had predicted from the beginning a fierce war, though it had assumed more gigantic proportions than he had calculated upon. He had predicted war, not because our right to secede was not an undoubted one, and clearly defined in the spirit of that declaration which rests the right to govern upon the consent of the governed; but the wickedness of the North would entail war upon the country. The present war, waged against the rights of a free people, was unjust, and the fruit of the evil passions of the North. In the progress of the war those evil passions have been brought out and developed; and so far from remitting with such a people—a people whose ancestors Cromwell had gathered from the bogs and fens of Ireland and Scotland—a people whose intolerance produced discord and trouble wherever they went; who persecuted Catholics, Episcopalians, and every other sect that did not subscribe to their bigoted and contracted notions, who burnt witches, and did a thousand other things calculated to make them for ever infamous. The President was emphatic in his declaration that under no circumstances would he consent to reunion. He drew a glowing picture of the horrors of war and the ravages of the enemy, and while tears flowed for those who suffered, yet all these would be endured cheerfully before our manhood and our liberties would be surrendered. He alluded briefly to his desire to transfer the war upon Northern soil, but the failure to do this proceeded not from a want of inclination, but of power. We were not an old-established nation, with armies and navies at our command. These had to be improvised from the scanty materials to be found within the limits of our own Confederacy. We were blockaded and cut off from other nations, and everybody knows that we had been an agricultural people, and that our facilities for manufacturing materials of war were extremely limited. Notwithstanding this fact, patent to the most casual observer, we had now an army larger than ever before, our arms and munitions of war were increased in number and improved in quality, and we are in a better condition to-day than we were twelve months ago. The conscription and exemption laws were then touched upon, and the necessity of the one and the intention of the other explained. He thought there might properly be a revision of the latter, and trusted there would be no conflict between Confederate and State laws on the subject of the military. The President expressed his gratification at the Message of Governor Pettus, and cordially endorsed his views in reference to making provision for indigent families and the enrolment of exempts, who could be ready upon an emergency to go forth and occupy the trenches, while the disciplined and active soldiery could take the field. The calls for such service could be for 30, 60, or 90 days; and when the emergency had passed they could return to their pursuits. Raw soldiers, the President contended, could do efficient service in the trenches, and the adoption of such a policy would strengthen our means of defence quite materially. In his allusion to the vast numbers of the North the President said that upon any fair field we were willing to fight them two to one; we had often whipped them three to one; at Antietam, General Lee whipped them four to one. But this might not be the case always. As the enemy progressed in discipline they approached nearer to our own troops in efficiency, hence the necessity of providing something like a corresponding force to that which the enemy are bringing against us. The President denounced in terms of seathing but dignified rebuke the habit of straggling from the army. He invoked public opinion to frown it down, and called upon the women to drive the stragglers back to duty. He urged the necessity of filling up the thinned ranks of our regiments. Those veterans who had gone through many hard-fought battles looked for their kindred at home to supply the places which had been made vacant by the deaths of their comrades. A brigade which mustered only 1200 men would have to bleed as much as if it had its full quota of 4000. Their ranks must be filled—humanity demands it. It was a time for patriots to throw off the shackles of private interest, fly to the rescue of those heroes whom the ravages of war had yet spared, and consecrate themselves to the most sacred cause on earth. The President remarked that when he arrived here he thought the enemy were pressing down upon us from the northern borders of our State; but when he went to Grenada he there learned that nothing could be seen of them but their backs. They were going back, perhaps, with the intention of reinforcing the heavy column that was now being thrown down the Mississippi River. The real points of attack were at Vicksburg and Port Hudson; and to all who desired to lend a helping hand to the country in her present exigency he would say, "Go to Port Hudson and Vicksburg without delay." He spoke of the salutary effects of harmonious action between the several States and the Government at Richmond, and urged upon the Legislatures, both State and Confederate, the necessity of establishing a permanent military system; for even after the present war was ended we might expect trouble from our enemies unless our military establishment was of such a character as to give them a wholesome fear of precipitating a war upon us. The true theory was to adopt a military system which would be permanent and operative in times of peace. The issue involved in this war was no ordinary one. The question is, will you be free, or will you be the slaves of the most depraved and intolerant and tyrannical and hated people on earth? This was the real question to be decided. Everything else was as dust in the balance. A people who have demonstrated their utter incapacity for self-government, who have destroyed their own liberties in the vain effort to deprive us of ours, seek to be our masters, and inflict upon us such galling chains as have no parallel in the annals of tyranny. Mississippi is the object of their peculiar hatred; upon her is to be visited their refined vengeance. But our cause is just, and vengeance belongs to the Lord. We will resist the power of the enemy. Discard all other considerations but the public defence, and victory will again be ours. The President alluded very briefly to the falsehoods which had been circulated relative to the Administration, which he could not disprove, because such disproof would give the enemy a knowledge of things which the good of the cause required to be concealed from him. That he had committed some errors he did not doubt, though they were never the result of improper motives. For a vindication of himself from the aspersions of some of his fellow-citizens he confidently awaited the time when the cause would not suffer from such vindication. He, however, explained the great necessity of public confidence in the officers of the Government, and pointed to that great and good man, General Albert Sydney Johnston, as a shining example of the ill effects of withholding that deserved confidence which the public welfare required. Though the war had somewhat exceeded his expectations, yet he never doubted our final success, and he considered it now as absolutely certain. The duration of the war was a question of time. He thought, however, it was not possible for a war waged upon such a tremendous scale to be protracted. Be it long or short, however, we could not be the first to cry, "Hold, enough." The President paid a deserving tribute to Vicksburg. That noble little city had withstood the shock of the combined fleets of the enemy after the great cities of New Orleans and Memphis had succumbed to their supposed invincibility. The heroic women of Vicksburg had cried out, "Give the enemy the soil if it cannot be defended, but let him have nothing else." The Governor left his chair and repaired to the scene of danger, and refused to listen to any advice except of defiance to the concentrated power of the enemy. We are better prepared at Vicksburg now than then. Our defences are greatly improved and strengthened; our armaments are much improved; we have better armies and the gallant soldier General Johnson is pouring in reinforcements. He comes to Mississippi to protect and defend her. (Immense applause.) To the question of recognition and intervention, the President devoted only a few words. We had a right to expect recognition long since, but it had not come, and his advice was, "Put not your faith in princes, nor rest your hopes upon foreign nations." It seemed that England still refused to take any steps towards either recognition or mediation. France had made a move that looked friendly to us, and when she extended the hand of friendship we would be ready to grasp it. The President took a brief retrospective view of the movements of our armies since the fall of New Orleans—an event as unexpected to him as it was to us—and showed that we had not retrograded, but had gathered largely in strength. Armies are not made up in numbers only. We have now an army that we can safely rely on. We have stripped gunboats of their terrors. We have improved in all those things which go to make us invincible. Our prospects are much better than they were twelve months ago. There are two grand objects of the enemy—first, to get possession of the river, and thus cut our Confederacy in two; and, secondly, to seize the Confederate capital, and hold it up to foreign nations as an evidence that the Confederacy does not exist. The President dwelt at some length upon the vast importance of thwarting the enemy's designs upon this valley. He considered its defence a necessity, not only to the people here, but to the Confederacy itself. Vicksburg and Port Hudson were points that must be defended, and every effort must be strained for this purpose. Vicksburg, he said, would stand, and Port Hudson would stand, if the people were true to themselves. This done, the North-west would grow restive, and cease to support a war ruinous to them and beneficial only to New England contractors. From the North-west he looked for the first gleams of peace. Although his duties required his presence elsewhere, yet, when he heard of the sufferings of his own State, and her danger of subjugation by a Vandal foe, his feelings dragged him to her soil. He goes back with a lighter heart. He finds none of that depression which was reported. At Grenada he found the army sorry that the enemy had gone back. At Vicksburg they were ready and eager for the fray. Depression existed only among that class of men who were constitutional grumblers and fault-finders. He goes back cheered, but still anxious, for his heart is here. His attachment to the State has risen since the war began, and he can see dangers, though he believes the greatest have passed. On the other side of the river our prospects are brighter than ever before and before long he hoped that he would be enabled to proclaim Missouri free. Kentucky, too, was an object of solicitude to him, and he spoke of her gallant people in the kindest and most commendable terms. The President laid particular stress upon the encouraging fact that we had improved in every respect since the war began. Our armies were superior in number, and improved in quality and appointments. Our manufactories had made rapid progress; Mississippi alone had clothed and subsisted the whole army upon her soil. Our people had learned to economise. They were homespun. He felt like taking off his hat to a woman dressed in homespun. He had an unflinching belief in the justice of our cause, and a profound reverence for the decrees of Heaven. He noticed with evident satisfaction the superior morality of our army to that of the invader. In God and the valour of our troops he trusted. After the cheering had subsided General Joseph E. Johnston was vociferously called for. The scar-worn hero looked a little nervous, while the house rang with loud, swelling and prolonged applause. He rose and said:—"Fellow-citizens,—My only regret is that I have done so little to merit such a greeting. I promise you, however, that hereafter I shall be watchful, energetic, and indefatigable in your defence." This speech was greeted with tremendous, uproarious, and prolonged plaudits.

SOCIAL AND POLITICAL ASPECT OF THE AMERICAN QUESTION.

On the 22nd inst., Mr. A. J. B. Beresford Hope delivered a lecture at Maidstone upon the above subject, of which the following report gives the principal passages in extenso:—

Mr. Beresford Hope commenced his address by a reference to the position of affairs in America at the time he last lectured on the subject at that place.

The disaster of Fort Donelson, and the capture of Roanoke Island, had just occurred. The Northern gunboats had command of the rivers, and the Northern arms seemed to be in the ascendant. Yet even at that moment of gloom I dared to auspicate success to the South; for in spite of all these adverse circumstances, in spite of all the disasters that were gathering round the Southern cause on every side, there was one thing that had not left the South—there was one thing they had never showed any desire to abandon, and that was

“The equal tenour
Of heroic hearts, made weak by time and fate,
But strong in will to strive, to seek, to find,
And not to yield.”

With that godlike quality I felt that success must sooner or later attend their arms. (Cheers.) Many came in as sympathizers with the South after Bull's Run; many more came in and sympathized with the South after the Trent affair; and many others only expressed their sympathy with the Southern cause after the series of victories which drove McClellan from four miles before Richmond; for it is not generally known that McClellan was once within four miles of Richmond, that the booming of his guns was heard by the firesides of that city, and that the glitter of the steeples of Richmond was seen from McClellan's camp. I was a Southerner before all this, and I glory in saying that I am a Southerner now, when the common sense, the sympathy, and the instincts of my countrymen have come round to the same side. (Cheers and expressions of disapprobation.)

After quoting a paragraph from the Times “leader,” to the effect that as the cause of Italy against Austria was the cause of free dom, so also was the cause of the South, Mr. Hope continued:—

I re-echo that sentiment, and I call upon you to back me when I change this tacit opinion into the open proclamation that the cause of the South is the cause of freedom, the cause of English feeling, the cause of constitutional government over the world. (Cheers and dissension.) I say that, hating slavery from my heart as I do, if we look at that Italian struggle in which we all sympathized, and in the success of which we all felt glad, we must confess that the end was sometimes allowed to justify the means. There was something occasionally of what is politely called “diplomacy”—(a laugh)—there was sometimes two meanings given to the same document—there was, in short, a good deal of “management.” (A laugh.) We allowed that to pass over, and we still gave our sympathies to the cause of Italy, because we felt that the grand old Italian nation, to which the world owed centuries of debt, ought to be, and should be, an united realm. (Cheers.) And if we made that allowance for Italy, shall we not make an equal allowance for those of our own flesh and blood, bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, who are trying to make a new England on the coasts of the Atlantic and the Mexican Gulf? (Cheers.) We are all of us hero-worshippers; the names of those who have carried out any great cause are wound round our hearts; and when this living age of ours—this second half of the 19th century—comes to tot up the bead-roll of its greatest men—those whose burning patriotism combined with calm statesmanship made them the fathers of a country struggling into new life—by the side of Cavour will blaze in history with equal glory the name of Jefferson Davis—(cheers and dissent)—that man of a British descent, of a British name, who speaks and writes so nobly the British language. Heroes will go with heroes—Davis with Cavour, and Stonewall Jackson with Garibaldi. (Loud cheers.) The statesmen are matched, the daring heroes in extremity are matched; but when Italy wanted a commander-in-chief of her great armies, when she wanted an organizing mind to bring her serried phalanxes into the field, she was obliged to borrow Napoleon and his French Marshals. But the Southern States have their own Lee, their own great general, reared on the own soil, and fitted to command his thousands on the tented field. (Cheers.)

Mr. Hope claimed prophetic credit for having in his last lecture, six weeks before the fall of New Orleans, picked out General Butler as a type of the pro-consuls which the North would employ to dominate over any Southern territory they might conquer. He had had his eye on the fellow, who he saw was unscrupulous and fouled-mouthed beyond his colleagues and he had an instinctive feeling that he would be the man whom President Lincoln would send to govern the first city he might take. That man had now left New Orleans, branded as a felon in one of the most tremendous proclamations that any ruler of a great nation had ever issued—the proclamation of President Davis ordering any officer who might capture him to hang him forthwith. (A voice—“And serve him right.”) If he should terminate his life at a rope's end, civilized Europe would applaud the deed. (Cheers.) With regard to Butler's officers, he thought it was a pity they were included in the proclamation, though he explained that it did not, as some supposed, mean that all officers captured should be forthwith shot or hanged; it only meant that they should not be paroled, but kept in close confinement, and their case reserved for the decision of the President himself, all whose antecedents would lead them to suppose that he would remit the extreme punishment.

I have been a good deal criticised (continued Mr. Hope) for having in my former lecture applied to President Lincoln the terms “rail-splitter, bargee, and attorney.” Nobody denied that he was all three, but it was thought not to be a civil way of describing a gentleman in his position. I appeal to you whether Lincoln's antecedents and his subsequent acts have not fully justified that plain language. People have said, “Look at his election.” I say, “Look at the fact that when every man who was not grovelling in the mire of political intrigue saw that a fearful crisis was impending over America, the Republican leaders, merely for party purposes, and to snatch a victory, pleased to make such a man as Lincoln their candidate, and to elect him as the ruler of thirty millions of people—look at it, and say if it is not as hideous a spectacle as history presents.” You may say, “It is the wire-pullers who ought to be condemned, but poor innocent Lincoln, what had he to do with it?” If he had been a mere rail-splitter, or a mere bargee, some excuse might have been found for him, but he was an attorney also; and, as an attorney, a member of the Illinois Legislature, and a former member of the United States Congress (where he acquired the unenviable reputation of a standing buffoon, and the citer of indecent stories whenever he could get a few members together to listen to him), he had just a sufficient glimmering of public matters to make his acceptance of the Presidency an offence of the blackest die—an offence which Heaven may pardon, but which is unforgivable upon earth. Look at all history—what are the names which you find most branded with infamy and scorn? They are those of unworthy sovereigns, who in great crises of their country's fate have shown themselves weak and incompetent—Sardanapalus, Belshazzar, Rehoboam, the Merovingian kings, the descendants of Charlemagne, and, in modern times, the ex-King of Naples. Yet these men were put into the position they occupied without their own personal fault—they merely found themselves there because their fathers were there before them. But what can be said of one who has not this excuse—of one who, like President Lincoln, allowed himself to be made the tool of a party for the ruin of his country? History will do him justice. (Hear, hear.) Yes, I repeat, history will do him justice by describing him as a man who, without any positive personal crime that could be brought home to him, had done as much mischief, had violated as much law, had tampered with as much justice, had trampled upon as much of everything that was sacred and dear to humankind, as any man in history has ever done in the world before. (Loud cheers, and partial dissent.) Talleyrand said that a blunder was worse than a crime, Abraham Lincoln is a man all whose blunders are crimes, and all whose crimes are blunders. (Cheers.)

In illustration of Mr. Lincoln's character, and of the unworthy means by which he had been thrust forward to the first place, Mr. Hope related (on the authority of a friend, to whom it had been told by Mr. Douglas) that when, in 1858, Lincoln and Douglas “stumped” the State of Illinois as opposition candidates for the position of senator, the former acquired great reputation throughout the country for the speeches purporting to have been delivered by him as they appeared in the New York papers. It afterwards turned out that the knot of politicians who had put up Lincoln sent with him a staff, not simply of reporters, but of editors also, who converted the jargon of Mr. Lincoln into clever and readable speeches. Declaring his thorough hatred of slavery, in common with all other Englishmen, Mr. Hope next commented upon President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation:—

It is, indeed, a noble document! It actually emancipates all the slaves where the United States has no authority. In all the Border States, and in those portions of the Confederate territory where the Federal army dominates, it keeps them in their bondage! (Hear, hear.) I want to see the blacks free as much as any man in this room. But I want to see them two or three other things besides free. I want to see them prosper, I want to see them with their bellies full, I want to see them educated and Christianised, and I want to see them earning a fair day's wages for a fair day's work. President Lincoln issues this proclamation from no abstract love of the blacks—nothing of the kind. In one of his 1858 speeches—though, after the story I have told, it can hardly be considered his—but in one of the addresses of which he was professionally the mouthpiece and which he has never disowned, he is made to say, speaking of the blacks—“Make them politically and socially our equals! My own feelings will not admit of this; and if mine would, we know that those of the great mass of the white people would not.” I question whether he could ever have composed three lines of such good English, but it must be taken as an expression of his opinion. To come back to his proclamation, supposing the slaves were to be at once set free, it would only be setting them free as against their employers, as against their means of gaining a livelihood, as against their abiding residents where they are. It provides no emigration, no future home; it turns them out to starve in the ditch or to live upon the plunder and rapine of their employers. Those people in England who have tried to bolster up this hideous outburst of weak yet demoniacal spite have attempted to drive its denouncers into a corner by this kind of argument—“Either it is ineffective, and why do you make a row about it? or it is effective and will set the blacks free, which is what you want.” I accept that dilemma. I say the proclamation will not tell up and down in the great bulk of the Southern Confederacy—it will tell in those places where from the nature of things the blacks are least attached to their masters, are the most worthless, and the most dangerous. Over the length and breadth of the Confederate States it will be ineffective enough to cover Lincoln and his advisers with ridicule; but at such places as New Orleans, where slavery assumes its worst form, it will be mischievous and fiendish enough to stamp it as the most unparalleled last card ever played by a reckless gambler. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Hope, as a proof of the growing desire in the South to ameliorate the condition of the blacks, quoted the following paragraph from a pastoral recently published by the Bishops of the Confederate Episcopal Church, a communion which, in its forms and ordinances, closely corresponded with our own Established Church, and which, though not quite so numerous as one or two other denominations, might yet be taken as a fair exponent of the educated and influential classes. After a reference to recent events, and to their seclusion from the outer world, the pastoral proceeds:—

The religious instruction of the negro has been thrust on us in such a wonderful manner, that we must be blind not to perceive that not only our spiritual, but our national life, is wrapt up in their welfare. With them we stand or fall, and God will not permit us to be separated in interest or fortune. The time has come when the Church should press more urgently than it has hitherto done on the laity the solemn fact that the slaves of the South are not merely so much property, but are a sacred trust committed to us, as a people, to be prepared for [the work which] God may have for them to do in the future. While under this tutelage, He freely gives to us their labour, but we are expected to give back to them that religious and moral instruction which is to elevate them in the scale of being. The laity must set an example of readiness to do their duty, and the clergy must strip themselves of pride, fastidiousness, and indolence. It is likewise a duty of the Church to press on masters their obligation, as Christian men, so to arrange this “institution” as not to necessitate the violation of those sacred relations which God has created, and which man cannot, consistently with his Christian duty, annul. The systems of labour prevailing in Europe, which are in many respects more severe than ours, are so arranged as to prevent all necessity for the separation of parent and child, or of husband and wife, and a very little care on our part would rid the system, on which we are about to plant our national life, of these unchristian features. We rejoice to be able to say that public sentiment is rapidly becoming sound on this subject, and that the Legislatures of several of the Confederate States have already taken steps towards their consummation.

Were the American Abolitionists, asked Mr. Hope, prepared to give the slaves every political, as well as every social, privilege—the right to vote, to be Governor of a State (as might happen where the blacks outnumbered the whites), or even to be President?—

Believing, as I most thoroughly do, in the unity of the human race, I recognize, as a matter of common sense, that by the misfortunes of unnumbered centuries, there are races which are inferior in knowledge, in acquirements, in wisdom, and in strength of mind to others. I see the Anglo-Saxon race standing, it may be, first amongst the nations of the world; I see the negro standing, it may be, last; and while I wish to knock the fetters off his arm, I dare in the face of philanthropy to deprecate before High Heaven the subjecting of millions of Anglo-Saxons to the denomination of the newly-freed negro. (Cheers.) Anything more loathsome, more unnatural than this, it is impossible to conceive. The negroes in America, whatever they may be, are at least more educated than the negroes of Africa. The slave trade is utterly unjustifiable, and the middle-passage is damnable; but the result is that the blacks are more civilized in America than in Africa. The question is, are they so civilized as to be fit for emancipation now? I say—No; and in the name of all that is sacred, in the name of all that is rational, do I implore you to leave that to another generation. (Cheers and dissent.)

Even if they were at once freed, the negroes would be deficient in many of the essentials that went to make up a nation:—

What makes a nation? It is not the acquirements of a single generation, but it is the long accumulation of acquisitions and of education that go back from century to century. What is it that makes Europe what it is? It is the learning of four thousand years: Assyria shaking hands with Egypt, Egypt shaking hands with Greece, Greece handing on the lamp to Rome, the Jewish and Christian dispensations spreading over the world, the Northern nations flowing in to be absorbed in the great focus of enlightenment spreading over the world. The first words we hear, the first books we read, the casual talk about us, the venerable monuments of antiquity, the solemn ceremonies of our law courts, the forms of our Legislature, the casual phrases of society, the hallowed pages of the Bible we read at our mother's knee—all these things, growing from generation to generation, make a national mind. The African race has not had the education of centuries—they have not been to school from time out of mind—they are yet children utterly ignorant. And when this ignorance is combined with barbarous and impure rites, such as we find in Africa, and a certain inability to attain European civilization; then I say, in the name of all that is prudent, beware that you place not the white man under the black man's heel. (Cheers.) The emancipation of our West Indian slaves was a noble and a Christian act; but I have never seen one unqualified approbation of the way in which we freed the blacks—every writer has his criticism upon it. Yet that was precaution and precaution multiplied tenfold, compared with President Lincoln's edict pronouncing immediate and indiscriminate emancipation, for political reasons, in the Southern States. I repeat my conviction that if the folly of the Northern Abolitionists, if the wickedness of Lincoln does not work against it, I look upon this uprising of the Southern States as God's appointed means of elevating the black man in the social scale, and to posterity I confide, faithfully and hopefully, their long-protracted but certain regeneration. (Cheers.)

Mr. Hope then entered into an explanation of the sovereignty of State rights as contended for by the South, and which was now advocated by the Northern Democrats, though he might say, in passing, that he had no sympathy with the Democrats of the North. They had long made the South their catspaw, and now only wished to get them back into the Union again for their own glorification. He expressed his opinion that the North American continent would be divided into five or even seven States, including British Canada, which Mr. Bright wished to see, to judge from what he said the other day, swallowed up in a huge American republic, which should stretch not only from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but whose shores should be washed by the Northern as well as by the Southern ocean. For his own part, he believed the principle of federation, if it held on for another generation at all, which he doubted, had a better chance of doing so in the South than in the North. The question was of great importance for England. They all hoped and believed that the great Anglo-Saxon race would dominate over the world. But that race must have a head somewhere. Was it desirable that that head should be the Northern Yankees, the Confederates of the South, or old constitutional England? (Hear.) He wished all good to America, but he wished more good to the Anglo-Saxon race, which he was sure would not be benefited by all its branches being domineered over and trampled upon by New York and Boston. He contended that the planters of the South were much more English than the settlers in the North, with its great admixture, particularly of late, of the extreme revolutionary refugees from the Continent of Europe. The Confederates were the English of the 18th century—the English such as described by Fielding, and Smollett, and Goldsmith.

Why, then (he asked), should we be so chary of accepting them as friends? Real political alliances are not so common in the world that we can afford to play pitch and toss with them. I have no romantic ideas about national gratitude; but still there may be such a thing as, if not making a friend, at least of blotting out an enemy. We know, though we pretend to disguise it, that the United States always hated us. They may have had many commercial reasons for pulling well with us, but by taking the Confederate States by the hand we shall, in at least half of that territory, obliterate the memory of many fancied wrongs which have rankled in the American breast since the War of Independence. Is this a thing to be neglected? I do not criticise what the Government heretofore have done. I do not say they were not right in being butter-fingered, and letting mediation slip through their hands. They may in this have been right; but he who runs may read, and no one can fail to see that the time must come when the Confederate States will be recognized. (Cheers and dissent.) And we must see that it would be a good thing for our own self-respect, and for the world in general, that that recognition should first come from their own brethren on this side of the Atlantic. (Cheers and dissent.) We do not, I hope, want to aggrandise Napoleon particularly—we do not want to make him the dispenser of blessings to all quarters of the world. His proposal for mediation the other day was declined by the English Government, and I can see great difficulty in the way of mediation, unless there is some basis arranged beforehand. If you were called in to mediate between two parties, one of whom asserts that his opponent is not an equal but a contemptuous servant, it would be very difficult to act upon that basis. So in this case of the American disruption. There are a great many things to be settled first, before (fictitious) mediation can take place. But though many points may be doubtful, many points difficult of settlement, there is one thing that is not doubtful, one thing that is not difficult—one thing that is the voice of nature, and the history of the last twenty months calls for, and that is, the duty on the part of England, on the part of Europe, to make a speedy recognition of the independence and sovereignty of the great Confederate nation. They have passed the Red Sea—(concluded Mr. Hope, with great emphasis)—let us help them to reach the Promised Land. (Great cheering.)

THE ENGLISH PRESS ON THE EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION.

The Times, January 15.

It would seem that in the interval which has elapsed between the battle of Fredericksburg and the commencement of the new year, the advocates of more conciliatory and more violent counsels have fairly fought their battle out, and that victory has declared in favour of the latter. Mr. Lincoln has finally adhered to the policy from which he showed at one moment some inclination to draw back. He has kept his promise to the very letter; he has declared the negroes in the States now at open war with the North free, except within certain districts occupied by the Federal forces, and has pledged the Government of the United States to recognize and support the freedom so granted by their naval and military force. From this Proclamation, Missouri, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Maryland, are exempt; so that it would seem to be the policy of the President to interpose an isthmus of slavery between the two masses of Free States which are to extend to the North and South of it. Pronounced under other circumstances, by another person, and at another time, such a Proclamation might well excite once more the enthusiasm which penetrated the whole mind of England in the days of Wilberforce and Clarkson. We should most unfeignedly rejoice were the words to which the President has given utterance capable of carrying with them their own fulfilment. To slavery we have ever entertained the most rooted aversion. Not all the valour, not all the success of the South, has ever blinded us to this black spot on their fair escutcheon. But even tainted as they are with this foul stain they have commanded our admiration and our sympathy from the gallantry with which they have maintained their cause, and from the obvious truth that the struggle was for separation on the one part and compulsory retention on the other, the emancipation or continued slavery of the negro being only used as means to forward the ends of the North. While it was supposed that the South could be brought back by giving every security for the continuance of slavery, the North never dreamt of emancipation. When it was found that no such conciliation was merely a means of raising up a domestic enemy against the possible, the North, as a weapon of war, and not as a concession to principle, has finally decided on emancipation. That this measure is no homage to principle or conviction, but Southerners in the midst of the Southern States, is abundantly proved from the fact that slavery, so odious in Alabama, is tolerated in Kentucky. Its abolition is a punishment to rebels; its retention is a reward to patriots; it is not the accused thing to be rooted out at all hazards. Its abolition is the punishment of rebellion; its retention is the reward of adherence to the Union.

Still, though there is little homage to principle in the President's Proclamation, any attempt on the part of the American Government, however tardily, reluctantly, and partially made, to emancipate any portion of the negro race, must have an effect on the opinion of mankind, and tend to what we have never doubted would in some way or other be the final result of this war, the abolition of slavery. But our exultation is by no means without misgivings. The President has proclaimed freedom, but he is without power to enforce his Proclamation. Except in the neighbourhood of New Orleans, where General Butler has already done all that is possible to create a servile war, the President of the United States has no power to enforce his Proclamation. If the blacks are to obtain the freedom he promises them, it must be by their own hands. They must rise upon a more numerous, more intelligent, better armed, and braver community of whites, and exterminate them, their wives, and children, by fire and sword. The President of the United States may summon them to this act, but he is powerless to assist them in its execution. Nay, this is the very reason why they are summoned. The armies of the South have gained a clear superiority over the armies of the North, and it is to redress this balance that the negro, burning, ravishing, massacring, and destroying, is summoned to the conflict. If these things are not done at all, there will be, for the present at least, no emancipation; if they are done, they will provoke retaliatory action, which is but too likely to end in the extermination of their perpetrators. In neither case has the friend of humanity any cause to rejoice. It must also be remembered that this act of the President, if it purposed to strike off the fetters of one race, is a flagrant attack on the liberties of another. The attempt to free the blacks is a flagrant attack on the liberties of the whites. Nothing can be more unconstitutional, more illegal, more entirely subversive of the compact on which the American Confederacy rests, than the claim set up by the President to interfere with the laws of individual States by his Proclamation, unless indeed it be the attempt of Congress to dismember the ancient State of Virginia, and create a new State upon its ruins. It is preposterous to say that war gives these powers; they are the purest usurpation and, though now used against the enemies of the Union, are full of evil presage for the liberties of the States that still adhere to it. It is true that the President advises the negroes to abstain from all violence except in self-defence, and to labour for reasonable wages. But the President well knows that not a slaveholder in the South will obey his Proclamation, that it can only be enforced by violence, and that if the negroes obtain freedom it will be by the utter destruction of their masters. In such a state of society to speak of wages—that is, of a contract between master and servant—is a cruel mockery. In the South the negro can only exist apart from his master by a return to the savage state—a state in which, amid blood and anarchy and desolation, he may frequently regret the fetters he has broken, and even the master whom he has destroyed. He cannot hope for a better situation than that of his race in the North—a situation of degradation, humiliation, and destitution which leaves the slave very little to envy. Mr. Lincoln bases his act on military necessity, and invokes the considerate judgment of mankind and the judgment of Almighty God. He has characterized his own act; mankind will be slow to believe that an act avowedly the result of military considerations has been dictated by a sincere desire for the benefit of those who, under the semblance of emancipation, are thus marked out for destruction, and He who made man His own image can scarcely, we may presume to think, look with approbation on a measure which, under the pretence of emancipation, intends to reduce the South to the frightful condition of St. Domingo.

In the meanwhile the President, who is thus lavish of the lives and fortunes of blacks and whites, seems to find no release from the ill-success which for the last eight months has so unremittently pursued his arms. Affairs in the South-west are assuming an aspect more and more serious every day. The operation which we anticipated a few days ago—that of a movement by the Confederates at Fredericksburg on the right flank of the Federal forces—has taken place, and the indefatigable General Stuart has seized on the telegraph, and intercepted valuable information by that means from the War Department at Washington. A desperate battle has taken place between the two armies in Tennessee, the account of which bears a very ominous resemblance to a Federal defeat. The Federals have been repulsed in several attacks on the fortress of Vicksburg, on the Mississippi. Surely these things should be enough to make the President reflect on the desperate course he is pursuing. In the midst of violent party divisions, in ostentatious contempt of the Constitution, with the most signal ill-success in war, he is persisting in the attempt to conquer a nation, to escape whose victorious arms is the only triumph which his generals seem capable of gaining. Every consideration of patriotism and policy calls upon him to put an end to the hopeless contest, but he considers the ruin is not deep enough nor the bloodshed plentiful enough, and so he calls to his aid the execrable expedient of a servile insurrection. Egypt is destroyed, but his heart is hardened, and he will not let the people go.

THE NEW YEAR'S DISASTERS OF THE FEDERALS.

(From the Sun.)

Gloomily as the old year closed for the Federals—still more gloomily for them is the new year opening. An enumeration of the principal events marking the turn of the twelvemonths will, better than any syllable of comment, indicate the fortunes of war between the fratricidal belligerents. Our intelligence, last arrived, brings the narrative of those events down to the 12th of this present month of January. And from the momentary flashes of the telegram we learn the nature of the very latest of the salient incidents—further particulars in regard to which will come to us a little later on. As to the occurrences at Murfreesboro, we now know for certain that on the last day of this last year the Federals met with a signal discomfiture at the hands of General Bragg; and if the victors withdrew afterwards (as they did) during the night of the 3rd instant, they did so distinctly as victors! Carrying away with them all the stores, and, together with the stores, 4000 prisoners, 5000 stand of arms, and 25 guns, as evidences of their success. Instead of retreating into Alabama, however, as it was first conjectured they would, the Confederate force under Bragg appear to have established themselves on the Duck River (a tributary of the Tennessee), at a point some score of miles to the south-west of Murfreesboro. Shelbyville, in fact, is understood to be the exact scene of the Confederate general's whereabouts.

Beyond this partial advantage to the Confederates—the safe withdrawal of all the stores and all the trophies of the 31st December from Murfreesboro—what are not the successes they have won, not partially or in any way questionable, elsewhere? The Federals have been beaten back unmistakably from Vicksburg. The Confederates have simultaneously achieved a victory by sea and by land at Texas. The Southern triumph in Mississippi is unmistakable. And, as we have just seen, the opponent of General Bragg has been completely outwitted and out-maneuvred in Tennessee. As to the double advantage gained in the Gulf of Texas, an advantage both ashore and afloat, that is, of all the events recently brought to light, incomparably the most important in its significance. That the Federals could have been so entirely “put down” at sea by the Confederates was hardly a thing to be looked for. Yet the facts related are beyond all dispute. They demonstrate an advantage on the Southern side of the most signal character. Five Confederate steamers, unexpectedly dropping down the river, seize upon what is familiarly known as the Gate of the Gulf State of Texas—while effecting this result, by a coup de main, conveying destruction to the Federal gunboat squadron, or scattering the remnants of it in flight. In demonstration of the unmistakable completeness of the victory achieved, there remains in the possession of the Confederates, when all is over, a war ship as famous, in her way, and hitherto, apparently, far more seaworthy, than the renowned but unfortunate Monitor—which sank, it may be remembered, very recently at a sudden puff, or what sailors call half a gale of wind, off Cape Hatteras. Harriet Lane is the vessel just captured from the Federals by the Confederates. And the Harriet Lane will probably, in giving an account of herself, in the hereafter under her changed colours, say ditto, so to speak, to the Alabama! There she remains, however, in the possession of the Confederates. There, in their possession too, south of Baton Rouge, is the reclaimed city of Galveston. The Federal flagship lies wrecked off shore in deep water—her larger fragments sunk to the bottom after an explosion as destructive, in its way (though upon a smaller scale), as that of the Porpoise. The remnants of the Northern fleet found safety only, it would seem, in flight to New Orleans. All this maritime success on the side of the Confederates being attributable to the dashing on-laught of their five audacious war steamers armed with guns worked among ramparts of cotton bales. The triumphs won by the South in effect have proved in these last instances to be as various as they are, we repeat, beyond all dispute.

THE DOCTRINE OF RECOGNITION.

(To the Editor of the Times.)

Sir,—Your correspondent “Historicus” appears to suppose that I was ignorant of the fact that two treaties were concluded between France and the United States of America on the 6th of February, 1778—the one being a treaty of commerce, and the other a treaty of eventual alliance. But the very passage I quoted from Wheaton implies this fact, when he says, “It may be doubted whether the treaty of commerce, or even the eventual alliance between France and the United States, could have furnished any just ground for a declaration of war against France by the British Government.” I am perfectly aware that the two treaties were signed on the same day, and in writing I had them both before me in Flassan.

The note addressed by the Marquis de Noailles to the Court of London on the 13th of March, 1778, was not in friendly terms, nor was it confined to a simple notification of the conclusion of a treaty of commerce. It began in these words:—

“Les Etats Unis de l’Amérique Septentrionale, qui sont en pleine possession de l’indépendance prononcée par leur acte du 4 de Juillet, 1776, ayant fait proposer au Roi de consolider par une convention formelle les liaisons qui ont commencé entre les deux nations,” &c.

And it ended by announcing that the King of France,—

“Etant déterminé à protéger efficacement la liberté légitime du commerce de ses sujets, et de soutenir l’honneur de son pavillon, Sa Majesté a pris en conséquence des mesures effectives de concert avec les Etats Unis de l’Amérique Septentrionale.”

It appears, therefore, that France considered the “fall possession of independence” a sufficient ground of recognition, although Great Britain had certainly not desisted from the contest.

It appears also that, in the note addressed to the British Government, the French Ambassador distinctly referred to the “eventual measures” (evidently of a warlike character) already taken in concert with the United States. In the message of the King to Parliament (March 17), the withdrawal of the King’s Ambassador from Versailles was expressly attributed not merely to the signature of a treaty of amity and commerce, but to this “offensive communication” from the Court of France.

The passage from Mr. Wheaton’s Elements of International Law to which I briefly referred, has not been correctly quoted by “Historicus.” It will be found at page 34 of the sixth edition of that work (edited by W. B. Lawrence, 1855), and runs as follows, differing in some important particulars from the extract printed in the letter to which I am replying:—

“It has already been stated that, while the contest for the sovereignty continues and the civil war rages, other nations may either remain passive, allowing to both contending parties all the rights which war gives to public enemies; or may acknowledge the independence of the new State, forming with it treaties of amity and commerce; or may join in alliance with one party against the other. In the first case, neither party has any right to complain so long as other nations maintain an impartial neutrality, and abide the event of the contest. The two last cases involve questions which seem to belong rather to the science of politics than of international law; but the practice of nations, if it does not furnish an invariable rule for the solution of these questions, will at least shed some light upon them. The memorable examples of the Swiss Cantons and of the Seven United Provinces of the Netherlands, which so long levied war, concluded peace, contracted alliances, and performed every other act of sovereignty, before their independence was finally acknowledged—that of the first by the German Empire, and that of the latter by Spain—go far to show the general sense of mankind on this subject.”

The acknowledgment of the independence of the United States of America by France, coupled with the assistance secretly rendered by the French Court to the revolted colonies, was considered by Great Britain as an unjustifiable aggression, and, under the circumstances, it probably was so. But had the French Court conducted itself with good faith, and maintained an impartial neutrality between the two belligerent parties, it may be doubted whether the treaty of commerce, or even the eventual alliance between France and the United States, could have furnished any just ground for a declaration of war against the former by the British Government. The more recent example of the acknowledgment of the independence of the Spanish-American Provinces by the United States, Great Britain, and other Powers, while the parent country still continued to withhold her assent, also concurs to illustrate the general understanding of nations, that where a revolted province or colony has declared and shown its ability to maintain its independence, the recognition of its sovereignty by other foreign States is a question of policy and prudence only.

I have thought it proper to produce this evidence, as the accuracy of my statements had been impugned. As to the opinion founded upon them, I shall only say that the argument of your ingenious correspondent does not appear to me to affect it. My view of the case is, that by the usage of nations recognition commonly resolves itself into three questions of fact:—Are the provinces which are contending for independence in full possession of sovereign rights within their own territories? Are they likely to maintain those rights permanently, or has the parent State the means of subduing them? Do our own national rights and interests require that we should enter into diplomatic relations with the revolted provinces, to obtain from their Government that protection which the parent Government can no longer afford us in the revolted territories? When these three questions can be answered in the affirmative, I contend that recognition may take place, without an infraction of the Law of Nations, although even then the policy of taking that step depends on various other grounds of expediency.

The view taken by “Historicus” appears to me to rest mainly on the High Tory doctrine of sovereignty, which regarded all rebellions as a violation of the rights of the Crown. On this ground King George IV. and the Duke of Wellington were strongly opposed to the recognition of the South American States by Mr. Canning, and probably Lord Liverpool shared their opinions. This, however, is not the ground on which England has acted in more recent times; and, whatever may have been the doctrines maintained by the Crown lawyers of George III., or Ferdinand VI., they are, I think, wholly inapplicable to the case of the free and sovereign States of North America.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEWER.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 29, 1863.

A Minister "On the Stump."

Men are not usually, at least in England, made Cabinet Ministers for nothing. To attain such a rank, they must show some claim, personal or vicarious, to social or political eminence. They must have done distinguished service or shown distinguished ability in Parliament or in administration, or they must be born to great wealth and a high station. They must have achieved greatness, or been born to it, or married to it. If they are men of transcendent genius, they may be excused for indiscretion and self-will; otherwise it is expected, even of Greys, Russells, and Elliots, that they shall show themselves prudent and obedient; hold their tongues when the good of their party requires it, and never commit themselves to inconvenient opinions. In the present Ministry almost every member of the Cabinet is fairly entitled to a seat in that august conclave. Lord Palmerston is certainly the first man in the Liberal party; perhaps the first man in the country. Mr. Gladstone is an unrivalled orator and a great power in the House of Commons. Sir G. C. Lewis is thought to be one of the most profound of living statesmen and one of the ablest of English administrators, though his speeches never convey that impression to the public. Lord Russell has a great name and a considerable following; and he, with Sir G. Grey and Sir C. Wood, belongs to the veteran band of the old Whigs, who live on the reputation of a past whose details are happily forgotten. The Dukes of Newcastle, Somerset, and Argyll are not only grandees of the highest class, but men of rather more than average ability. Lord Granville is thought by some persons to be clever, and is at all events safe; Mr. Cardwell is certainly both safe and capable; and even Mr. C. P. Villiers is at least brother to Lord Clarendon. But who or what is the President of the Board of Trade, and how comes he to fill such a place? To be sure, it is one of insignificant power and honour, but still it confers a seat in the Cabinet, and was thought too much, in 1846, for Richard Cobden. How comes its present occupant to be seated in council with Gladstone and Palmerston, Lewis and Russell?

The thing we know is neither rich nor rare,
But wonder how the devil it got there.

Mr. Milner Gibson is a man of no kind of note or ability. His wife, indeed, is well-known for her activity in various feminine movements for social and political purposes, and her name constantly appears in connection with some charitable scheme for the relief of distress in Mesopotamia, the abolition of serfdom in Russia, the promotion of insurrection in Poland, or the furtherance of a Mazzinian conspiracy in Italy. In fact, judging by the notices and advertisements of our daily contemporaries, we should imagine that Mrs. Milner Gibson holds among the extreme section of the Radicals the same position which, in the higher ranks of Liberalism, is so admirably and efficiently filled by Viscountess Palmerston. We have heard of gentlemen becoming entitled to boroughs, as to other property, in right of their wives; and this is the only way in which, till the principles of Mrs. Stowe and Miss Martineau make more way in this country, a lady can exercise direct political power. But we hardly think that Mrs. Milner Gibson would be considered to have earned the right to sit by proxy in the Cabinet; and we are quite sure that her husband does not sit there in his own right. He never did anything worth remembering, or said anything worth hearing, during the whole course of his political life. He never displayed even the average ability of an active member of Parliament. As an actor, he is singularly inefficient, as a speaker, he is dull, without being weighty, and frivolous, without a spark of humour. He is in the last degree indiscreet, being actually a member of a Society whose avowed object is the destruction of the National Church and the confiscation of her property, and being notoriously hand and glove with revolution and republicanism all over the world. No man with a more limited intellect, or more extravagantly extensive views, no man with more conceit and less judgment, ever scrambled into the English Cabinet. The truth is, we believe, that Mr. Gibson sits on the Treasury Bench only because a more eminent man was so utterly obnoxious to the Sovereign, the party, the House, and the country, that Lord Palmerston could not invite him. The compact made by the "caucus" or meeting of the Liberal party at Willis's Rooms in 1859 did not openly include the appointment of two men of the Manchester school to Cabinet offices; but there seems to have been a secret treaty to that effect, which, as usual, was more faithfully observed than the terms publicly announced. Retrenchment and Reform were shelved; but as soon as Lord Derby was ejected, Lord Palmerston proceeded to divide the spoils according to agreement. A high office was reserved for Mr. Cobden, and declined by him; and in his place Mr. C. P. Villiers, a Radical of less note, but of a noble family, was admitted into the Cabinet as head of the Poor Law Board. Mr. Bright could not be asked to take office, unless it had been perfectly certain that he would refuse; accordingly, his shadow was admitted in his stead. Mr. Gibson owes his rise in the world entirely to the orator whose faithful and insignificant attendant he has been for so many years; he is Mr. Bright's shadow, cast before thither where, we hope, the real man will never enter; and he holds in the Cabinet the proxy of the Member for Birmingham.

There is not, therefore, the slightest importance to be attached to his very silly speech at Ashton. It expresses only the second-hand opinions of one who is only a man at second-hand, and whose voice has no more authority in the councils of the nation than that of the dullest and poorest of the constituents whom he addressed. We have listened to Mr. Bright; it is hardly worth while to watch the feeble efforts of his phantom representative to mimic his vigorous gesticulations. We must do the Member for Birmingham the justice to say that he at least does not talk such childish nonsense as his protégé and former colleague. If he did prate about the value of the Northern States to England, at least he did not insult the understandings of his hearers by telling them that war would have aggravated the distress of Lancashire by cutting off one-third of our imports of bread and butter from abroad. War would have ended the distress at once, as every child in Ashton knows. It would have reopened every mill in Lancashire; it would have brought four million bales of cotton to Liverpool: it would have lighted fires on a hundred thousand cold hearths, and have brought plenty and prosperity to myriads of desolate homes. But, says Mr. Gibson, it would have had a terrible effect on the price of eggs and bacon, for we import these things from the Northern States. Well; we think that a half-penny a dozen extra for eggs, and a farthing a pound increase in the cost of bacon, might have been more easily endured than a rise of 300 per cent. in the price of cotton. Suppose that war with the North had deprived us of eggs and bacon altogether—nobody would have starved. England is not like the little inn in Cumberland, where a traveller's choice of supper was confined to "ham and eggs or eggs and ham." At worst, we could have bought everything we import from the North at a slightly increased price elsewhere—say by the outlay of some £200,000 or £500,000 extra: the preservation of peace has cost above £20,000,000, besides the entire loss of the cotton supply. It is deplorable to hear a man actually entrusted with a share in the deliberations which may determine the fate of England, and the future of the world, utter such wretched, stupid, ignorant twaddle as this—alarming to think that possibly the issue of some grave debate, involving questions of war or peace, of plenty or of ruin, might rest on the vote of a Milner Gibson. Fortunately, as a Cabinet does not often determine great questions by counting noses, every voice has not the same weight; and the President of the Board of Trade, though he might neutralize Mr. Gladstone's vote in the House, cannot do so in Downing Street. He is in the Cabinet on sufferance, and would be made aware of the fact if he ever ventured to be troublesome.

But his speech is not the less worth notice as an indication of the latitude allowed to the most insignificant members of the Ministry. According to constitutional theory, every member of a party Cabinet is responsible for the conduct of the whole; inasmuch as it is not allowed to them to divulge by whose advice the Crown has done any of those acts which are legally acts of the Crown. It is only such a doctrine as this which would make it possible for the nation to entrust its destinies in the hands of any one party; inasmuch as of necessity many important offices must be given to second-rate men, and some—as in the present case, the Board of Trade—to men of no rate at all, on the understanding that in all grave questions they are guided by their wiser colleagues. It is understood, too, that on matters of public policy the Cabinet must, in some sense, think alike; there must be a Cabinet opinion—and if that be not in harmony with the opinion of Parliament, the Cabinet must resign. Now, on many questions, and especially on the American question, there prevails the greatest disunion of feeling among the members of the Cabinet. Some of them sympathize strongly with the Confederate States, heartily admire their conduct, approve their cause, and uphold their right to recognition. Others are devoted, from fear or from passion, to Mr. Seward, General Butler, and the North. Others—and notably the Prime Minister—care nothing for either party. They detest the blackguardism, ferocity, and meanness of the Federals; they do not care to involve themselves in any difficulty, foreign or domestic, by siding with the Confederates; and their only wish is to let the matter alone. At present this party practically determines the action, or rather inaction, of the Cabinet; which is quite aware that any attempt to have an opinion or lay down a policy in regard to American affairs must be fatal to the very pretence of concord, and to its official existence. Therefore the Ministry does nothing, because nothing is the only thing which the different sections can agree to do. Some of their countrymen wish that they could have also agreed to say nothing; and Mr. Bright expressed that wish with his usual force and bitterness. In this country, Cabinet Ministers are not supposed to speak to Buncombe; it is understood that their individual speeches express a collective opinion, and that that opinion will determine their conduct. And as, under present circumstances, everything depends on the action of the Government, as it rests with them whether the principal industry of England shall continue to decline, and finally perish, or shall be saved and restored to more than usual prosperity, their speeches have been scanned with great anxiety by hundreds of men whose fortunes are at stake, and by hundreds of thousands who are deeply interested in the fortunes of the country. The consequence has been a state of commercial confusion and national perplexity not very creditable to those who have produced it. Mr. Gladstone says, at Newcastle, that the Confederate Government "has created an army, a navy, and, what is more, a nation." Every one supposes that the Confederate Government is about to be recognized; there is great excitement in Liverpool; prices fall; and orders for Surat, on their way to India, are hastily countermanded. Sir G. C. Lewis speaks at Hereford, and declares that we cannot recognize the Confederate States so long as the North chooses to maintain the struggle. This is felt to be meant as a reply to Mr. Gladstone, and an encouragement to the war; again there is excitement in Liverpool, prices rise, and orders are despatched to India. The country listens in utter confusion, trying in vain to make out what Ministers mean, and what they will do. We cannot pretend to answer the latter question; for what a Government will do, when it cannot be said to have a collective will of its own, depends very little on itself, and very much on the force of that "pressure from without" under which we see the Government at Washington reeling to and fro. Not Lord Russell or Lord Palmerston, not Mr. Gladstone or Sir G. C. Lewis, but Napoleon III. or President Lincoln, a French Ambassador or a Federal sea-captain, may determine the course of England for peace or for war. But what the Government means is evident enough. It does not mean to intervene or to interfere. It will not mediate, if it can help it; it will not recognize the Confederate States, unless there should occur some of those "circumstances over which they have no control," which leave weak men and weak Ministers no choice. They will not, if they are not forced to it, quarrel with Mr. Seward, or with Mr. Bright. They will let Lancashire starve; they will let British merchantmen be plundered off Nassau and burnt off Cuba; they will submit to a blockade of Bermuda or of Liverpool; but they will do nothing which may tend to bring a supply of cotton from the South, or to cut off the supply of eggs and bacon from the North. Both the provision-mongers and the cotton manufacturers, therefore, may rest confident that, whatever individual Ministers may say, Government is not going to embarrass the one or help the other; and may dispense, for the future, with the trouble of reading speeches which no more indicate the probable course of events than do the leading articles in the Morning Star or the addresses of Emancipation Societies.

The Second Proposal of France.

A few days since it was stated by a London journal, supposed to speak with a sort of semi-official authority, that the French Emperor had renewed his offer of mediation in America, and that in this, as in the former instance, England would refuse her concurrence. The latter part of this statement is, we trust, premature and unauthorized; of the former, as was generally expected, we have ample confirmation in the publication of M. Dronyn de Lhuys' despatch to the French Minister at Washington. The proposal of France is couched in terms so courteous and conciliatory that even the morbid vanity of the Northern people, or the perverse malignity of their demagogues and presses, can scarcely find a pretext for taking umbrage at them. No threat is coupled with this tender of her friendly offices as mediator, and France contents herself, in the event of its rejection, with suggesting to the Federal Government the propriety of itself opening negotiations with the Confederate States. This is, in effect, the significant advice, to endeavour to procure by a last appeal to diplomacy what it is clear cannot be procured by force of arms.

It seems to us more than probable, and is perhaps expected by the French Emperor, that both his mediation and his advice will be declined by Mr. Lincoln and his advisers; but the step he has taken is nevertheless of the highest practical importance. Napoleon III. has extorted, even from his enemies, the admission that he is the most sagacious statesman of the age. He has proved himself to be possessed of military genius of no common order. He is personally acquainted with the country and the people of both North and South. With this triple qualification for forming an accurate judgment of the relative positions of the American combatants, he has arrived at the conclusion that the restoration of the Union by the triumph of the Northern arms is impossible, that there is no prospect of any speedy termination of the war except by the voluntary reconciliation of the belligerents or the intervention of foreign Powers, and that the proper moment of trying either of these means is now at hand. Such a conclusion arrived at by one who knows America from personal observation, the General of the Italian campaign, and the imperial ruler of the destinies of France, cannot fail to produce a powerful impression as well in the North and the South as in this country. The testimony of such a witness cannot be lightly regarded or easily counterbalanced. It outweighs at once the often-falsified assurances of Mr. Seward that the "rebellion" will soon be crushed, and the stereotyped excuses of the Foreign Office that the opportune moment for action has not yet arrived. To the interested promises of the former the Emperor opposes the evidence of his agents, as given on almost every page of the published diplomatic correspondence regarding the United States, the experience of the past, and his own political foresight and military judgment; to the timid pretexts of the latter he replies by the example of his own action.

Whether the Emperor desires the reconciliation with which he flatters the hopes of the Northern people, or whether this part of the despatch is simply a polite phrase of diplomatic parlance, does not, of course, appear on the surface. The document itself is the emphatic declaration of an unimpeachable authority that the independence of the South is secured against subversion, and that the South can again become a member of the disrupted Union only by its own act. The advice of France is tendered, not to the South, but to the North. What her advice to the Confederate States will be when she comes to give it, whether it will be to retain their independence unimpaired, or to use it as the basis for new and more favourable terms of reunion, we have yet to learn. On this head it must be remembered that though France has an interest only secondary to that of England in terminating the war, she has not, in the opinion of many Frenchmen, the same interest in the disruption or restoration of the monster Republic. To France, especially now that she has gained a firm foothold in Mexico, that Republic can be only very remotely dangerous, while, at the same time, it might serve as a counterpoise to the maritime ascendancy of this country. If the Emperor shares these views, entertained by many of his subjects, it gives additional weight to the conviction he has just expressed that the forcible restoration of the Union is impracticable. As for the disposal which the Confederate States themselves will make of their independence, neither the British Government nor people can entertain any reasonable doubt. These States will not, and cannot consistently with self-respect, treat with their adversaries on any other basis than the full and absolute acknowledgment of that independence. The two nations are now historically, as well as by interests and passions, distinct, and even were it possible to span the gulf of blood and hate that yawns between them, to obliterate the past, and to place them as they were two years ago, the causes which, for thirty years and more, have been silently active in sundering them would still exist in all their force. The various schemes of reconciliation which are just now rife in the North—that of Mr. Vallandigham proposed to the Federal Congress, or that which comes in a more authoritative form before the Legislature of the central State of New Jersey—may be valuable indications of the growing weariness of the war among the Northern people, but as preliminaries of peace they are mere waste of breath and paper. The North is still talking in a fevered sleep; nothing but European recognition of the South can fully rouse it from its dream.

This day week Parliament assembles. It will be impossible long to stave off this pre-eminent and obtrusive American question. In all probability the subject will come up for debate in the first week of the session. On the turn which this debate takes will depend, at least for the current year, the issue of peace or war in America. France has declared to the world that the war is henceforth useless; but holds out to the North a vague hope of still effecting its object by diplomacy. England knows that hope to be illusory, but she must either assent or dissent from the declaration. Silence or speech will be equally eloquent. Silence will imply that in her opinion the declaration of France is premature, and that the war may still result in the subjugation of the South, and thus add new fuel to the flame. On the other hand, she may join her voice to that of France, and convince the North that success by force is beyond its reach; accompanied by the comforting assurance that success by persuasion is in her eyes both desirable and possible. Or she may do better; end the delusions of the North and the war at one and the same time, and by a single word—by recognizing the accomplished fact of the independence of the Confederate States.

Can the American Cotton Supply be Replaced?

Two British Consuls at Confederate ports have estimated the stock of cotton on hand in the South at three and a-half million and four and a half million bales respectively. These estimates, it is true, differ very widely; but assuming the lowest as probably the more nearly correct, it is placed beyond all possible doubt that peace and the reopening of the Southern ports will liberate a fair average year's crop of cotton. The bearing of this fact upon all speculations relative to the possibility of replacing the American supply of cotton from India or elsewhere, cannot be overlooked.

But first let us glance at the magnitude of the task of so replacing this supply. Those who still consider this an open question are in the habit of veiling their arguments in a cloud of statistical details, in which facts and vague probabilities are inextricably intermingled, and through which the reader wanders bewildered as through a labyrinth. We propose to state the problem in its simplest form, and to confine ourselves to the plainest practical considerations. The average annual supply of American cotton is about three and a-half millions of bales, averaging each between 400 and 500 lbs. To produce this quantity, under the most favourable conditions of soil and climate, of an efficient and well-directed system of labour, and of the most successful plan of husbandry, it is a moderate estimate to say that the labour of not less than one million of men will be required, exclusively of those that must be employed in the various processes by which the staple is rendered marketable, and in the transportation of this bulky commodity to the shipping points. We can form an approximate estimate of the amount of capital required to set the labour of this million of men in motion. The value of the average annual cotton crop of the Southern States is, in round numbers, about £35,000,000 sterling. Assuming the capital engaged in replacing this crop to yield the enormous profit of 15 per cent., it follows that the requisite amount of capital must be about £235,000,000. The conditions, then, fairly stated, for replacing the American supply are, the labour of one million of men, and the investment of capital equal to more than one-fourth of the British national debt. This is simply translating into an arithmetical formula the undeniable proposition, that what it has taken in America, under peculiarly favourable conditions, fifty years to grow up, cannot be improvised at once, or in any short series of years, elsewhere, and especially not where these same favourable conditions are wanting. But suppose that this unprecedented displacement of labour and capital is effected after a lapse of years, and making no account of the wholesale ruin ensuing during the period of transition, it is clear that at best we have only robbed Peter to pay Paul. Unless we can tame a million of savages into industrious labourers, and find two hundred and odd millions of money lying loose somewhere, it is self-evident that both the labour and the capital must be diverted from employments in which they are now profitably engaged. When the necessities or ingenuity of mankind shall have succeeded in replacing the cotton, it will have been at the expense of something else: the net loss will be the same, and the world's commerce so much the poorer.

In this practical illustration of the insuperable difficulties in the way of replacing the American supply, we have left altogether out of sight the difference of quality, no inconsiderable difficulty in itself. New England thoroughly appreciates both these difficulties, and when General Butler, her fit representative, recently held out as an easy mode of paying the war debt, the levying of an export duty of 5d. per lb., or 100 per cent. on the normal price of cotton, he expressed neither a new nor an original idea. New England knows that though this export duty would be a bonus to all the other cotton-producing countries of the globe, even that bonus would not be a sufficient stimulus for many years to replace the cotton of the South, while the same bonus would in the meanwhile secure to her the monopoly of the cotton manufacture. The United States, in the height of their power, relied more on the power of cotton than on that of gunpowder for safely bullying Great Britain; in the depth of their adversity they rely on cotton to make good all their losses, and this is one of the most prominent, though the least openly avowed, inducements for the prosecution of the war.

We have seen of what gigantic proportions is the task of replacing the American cotton supply, even were there not a single bale locked up by the blockade. Even these proportions might not, and probably would not, deter British enterprise from making at least an attempt and a beginning, if any calculations could be based upon the continuance of the present prices. But who will attempt to make even a beginning when at any moment the sluice-gates may be opened which will flood the markets with three or four millions of bales?

The Independence of the South Demonstrated.

Once more, by a series of bloody battles and brilliant achievements, the South has demonstrated its power of maintaining its independence. Again the Northern armies have been decimated by fire and sword, and the fanatics of New England have been gratified by the wholesale slaughter of their fellow-citizens, and by a large addition to the mighty host of wounded and maimed. But the clergymen and fanatics of New England are not satisfied with the carnage they have instigated. They still make their puppet, the vulgar jester of the White House, continue the hopeless contest with unabated vigour. They still clamour for the prosecution of a war in which they take good care to incur no personal risk. The miseries of their country are to them a supreme satisfaction, and to their friends and allies the fraudulent contractors, a rich harvest. When the news of some fresh disaster is made public no thought is bestowed upon the Federal losses, except indeed the loss of arms, stores, and steamboats, for these things have to be replaced, and the replacing them fills the pockets of the contractors. These rapacious men do not hesitate to express their delight that the Confederates supply themselves from the Federal stores, because that, they say, makes them the purveyors of warlike ammunition to both North and South. The victories of the South do not make the termination of the war more probable. It is idle to dream of defeat insuring peace. The North cannot conquer the South, but, on the other hand, the South cannot conquer the North. If the Confederates could, besides defending their country, carry the war into the North, and devastate the fruitful plains of the West, and possess themselves of the commercial towns of the East, a peace might be, and would be, conquered. But this, as President Davis told the Legislature of Mississippi, cannot be done. The young Confederacy, taken at a disadvantage, without a navy, and opposed to an enemy enjoying a vast numerical superiority, can do no more at present than defend its homes from the lust and rapine of the North. The war must go on until the belligerents are exhausted, or until Europe, by recognizing the Confederate States, unmasks the designs of the Northern conspirators, and reveals to the Northern people that they are fighting for an object they cannot gain, and that they are engaged in a contest pregnant with ruin to themselves. They are, indeed, already half convinced of these facts, but they are going down-hill with such a momentum they cannot stop of themselves. Not a few in the North now cry for that aid from Europe which would save them from further disaster. Will the cry be in vain? Will the Governments of Europe heed only the fabrications and insolent threats of the Federal Government, and the clamour of New England for more blood—for the extermination of the Southern population, white and black? If the European Governments so act, they cannot excuse themselves on the plea that there is a prospect of the North crushing the South in any number of days. The North has put forth its strength without stint or hesitation, and been so prodigal of blood and treasure as to eclipse the horrors and cost of European wars. What is the result? What has lately happened to the Northern armies? What is now their position?

There is something peculiarly suggestive about the absence of war news from the East. It is a commentary on the battle of Fredericksburg, that tells us, with unmistakable plainness, of the extent of that disaster, of the numbers killed and wounded, of the demoralizing effect produced on the survivors by the acres of Federal dead. General Burnside may have been willing to renew the attempt to force the Confederate entrenchments, and to have sacrificed 50,000 men; but his soldiers would not be sacrificed. The great Army of the Potomac, the pet army of the North, the army so lavishly equipped and re-equipped, the army that was to put down "the rebellion" by taking Richmond, the army which Mr. Lincoln said never had been and never would be beaten, the army of the command of which General McClellan was deposed because he was advancing too slowly, the army that was to know no rest until its head-quarters were in the Confederate capital, the army upon which those who believed in the possibility of conquering the South based their hopes—lies bleeding, maimed, and demoralized on the north of the Rappahannock. From the time when, in the darkness of night and amidst a howling storm, it stole away from the face of the enemy, now a month ago, it has done nothing, and we might almost have forgotten its existence, but for the rumours of its disorganization, of its desire for a change of commander, and for the way in which its weakness is exposed by the exploits of the Confederate cavalry. That broken, beaten Army of the Potomac proclaims, more eloquently than words can do, the failure of the Federals and the national vitality and endurance of the Confederates.

Lately active operations on a large scale have been carried on in another part of the Confederate States, and there is no pause in the war, though for a moment Virginia is not the battle-field. Have the Federals been triumphant in the West and on the Mississippi? Let us see.

No one from the first was duped into the belief that Murfreesboro was a Federal victory. Even the Northerners, anxious to catch at any straw, could not delude themselves that an army which confesses to more casualties than its assailants, to losing thousands of prisoners and its warlike stores, is victorious. A little enthusiasm was got up when it was announced that the Confederates had withdrawn from Murfreesboro, but it subsided when the details transpired. The Southern army, after inflicting fearful loss, had retired on its base of operations with all its prisoners and booty. The Confederates might not have accomplished all they desired, but it could not be denied that they gained a victory, indecisive but not altogether fruitless. When the whole truth of the battle of Murfreesboro is told—if it ever is told—it will probably be found to have been one of the worst disasters of the North. It is enough in this article to record it as a Federal defeat.

Even more signal is the Federal reverse at Vicksburg. Very considerable have been the efforts to capture that gallantly-defended little town, and persons who have little faith in what the Northern armies can do calculated upon success in that quarter. A fierce and resolute assault was made, and the battle raged from day to day, but in the end the assailants were driven back with great carnage, and disabled from renewing the attack. This defeat was almost simultaneous with that of Murfreesboro.

Nor must we forget the important and brilliant affair in Texas. When Galveston was taken by the Federals, we were told by the blatant mouthpieces of the Lincoln Cabinet that Texas was conquered. Whilst this was being set forth in Washington, the Confederates recaptured Galveston, and, contrary to all expectation, gained a naval victory. Using their rifles for cannon, the gallant Texans captured the notorious and powerfully-armed steamer Harriet Lane, killed nearly all the officers, blew up the flag-ship, killed the Admiral, and sent the rest of the blockading squadron in hot haste to New Orleans. We do not yet know the extent of this victory, but it is certainly complete, and, for a time at least, there is, at Galveston, no other but a paper blockade. This victory, the loss of the Monitor, the success of the Alabama, and the failure of Farragut's fleet to do anything, must be exceedingly disheartening to the Federals. It was not unreasonable for them to have expected to be dominant with their navy, but they have not. All the naval glory and honour gained in this war belong to the South. The North has failed by sea as well as by land.

We might point to the other difficulties that beset the North. The wicked scheme of a servile war has caused a bitter political war in the North. If Missouri and Kentucky were doubtful before the 1st of January, they are no longer so. The financial prospects are exceedingly gloomy. The Federal Congress is told that if the war lasts till June 1864, the debt will be $2,000,000,000. Gold is 50 per cent. premium, and the Government is afraid to call on the people for war taxes. Repudiation is openly spoken of; and it seems to be forgotten that repudiation, though it may be resorted to, will not avert the impending ruin—it will not bring back the substance now being wasted. But our object is not to dilate on the difficulties, disasters, and weakness of the United States; we desire to point out the unanimity and strength of the Confederate States. No man can be so blind as not to perceive that the Confederates have vindicated their title to independence, or can believe in the North subduing the South. This being so, whatever ground may be suggested for refusing to recognize the Confederate States, it cannot be alleged that they have not thoroughly established and maintained its independence.

Poland.

The outbreak of another Polish insurrection supplies those who like to find apt illustrations for old sayings with a striking demonstration that "ill-gotten gain never prospers." Poland has already cost its masters a great deal more than they will ever get out of it. Their Polish possessions are still a source of weakness instead of strength to Russia, Prussia, and Austria. The fact is, that the partitions of Poland were gross political blunders, as well as flagrant violations of law and morality. When the Polish Republic was foully murdered, it was hastening fast to an inglorious and unlamented death. Left to themselves, the Poles would soon have consummated their political suicide. For more than a hundred years they had furnished Europe with signal proofs of their utter want of political capacity. Divided and degraded, always ready to sell themselves to a foreign Power, prepared for a price to elect a King, and intrigue against him, for a price too, as soon as elected,—no general interest, no national danger, could induce them to surrender their individual license, or make the slightest sacrifice for the common cause. Only the spirit of bigotry and intolerance could inflame them with a spark of zeal for the independence of their country. The end must have come soon, the rotten-ripe fruit would have fallen into the hands of those who coveted it. Its digestion and assimilation would have been an easy matter, and would have excited little notice from Europe. But the infamous agreement for spoliation, and its even more infamous justification, shocked the moral sense of Europe; the destruction of their independence brought out all the nobler qualities of the Poles. Sympathy for their sufferings effaced all recollection of their vices; the destruction of the opportunity for political intrigue and venality left only their bravery and endurance discernible. Often deceived, they have never despaired. Even now, when everything speaks to them of the impossibility of regaining their national existence, they talk of the reconstitution of Poland in its ancient limits, of the foundation of an empire which shall include countries which have long ceased to be Polish. With 40,000 soldiers in Warsaw, and twice as many in other parts of the kingdom, without arms, ammunition, discipline, without hope indeed, they have broken out into a general insurrection against Russia. Disagree with them as we may, blame them as we must for their wild rejection of the offers of Russia, their stubborn adherence to the demand for an impossibility, and, above all, for this fatal rising, the curse of which will extend to generations yet unborn, we must yet sympathize, against our judgment, with their ardent, inextinguishable heroism.

What profit can Russia have derived from the possession of Poland at all comparable with the cost of holding it? For the sake of Poland she has incurred the antipathy of all civilized peoples. For its acquisition and retention she has been guilty of crimes the memory of which can never be effaced. She has been compelled to hold Poland by a brutal tyranny which has demoralized those who employed it, whilst it has failed to curb those who were its victims. All the revenues derived from the country cannot have amounted even to the cost of its military occupation. It has been a perpetual abscess in the body of the Russian Empire, as difficult to heal by cauterization as by cautery. The Emperor Alexander is believed to be desirous of endowing his vast dominions with something which has a resemblance to liberty; but Poland constantly interposes to thwart him. If he relaxes for a moment the rule of the sword, the spy, and the prison in Poland, the Poles use the concession to conspire against him; if he adheres to the old rule of brutality, he establishes a painful and perplexing antagonism in the administration of his Empire. The share of Austria and Prussia in the spoils of Poland is smaller, and their embarrassment is less. Fortunately for Prussia, she lost the larger part of her share in the partition, and having but a small field to operate on, has managed to work it more profitably. Poland is not so much an embarrassment to her, because she has pursued a scientific system of murdering the Polish language and the Polish national sentiment. The Poles themselves have played into her hands, and her Poland can now be scarcely called Polish. The Polish nobleman, extravagant and thoughtless, sought in dissipation the compensation for his enforced abandonment of a political or military career. He fell into debt—and the German money-lender became the owner of his castle and estates. German peasants, German artisans, favoured by the Government, and invited by the opening to energy and perseverance, pushed in too. The Government made the knowledge of German the sine quâ non for an official career. Polish was everywhere, so far as possible, suppressed, and so by dint of a process, the imputation of which the Prussians themselves regard as the most formidable item in the bill of indictment they bring against Denmark for its dealings with Schleswig, the Poles are giving way before the Germans, and it is hard to say whether Prussia's share of Poland is more German or Polish. Yet all these results have only been obtained by means which have reacted most unfavourably upon Prussia herself. Even now the Prussian Chamber of Deputies supplies in its Polish members an ever-repeated protest against the injustice perpetrated in the pursuance of this system of murdering Poland. At this moment the Prussian Government has to exercise the utmost vigilance to maintain order in Posen, albeit every Pole has a German by his side. Austria has treated the peasants comparatively well, and as a Catholic Power, has the great advantage of the support and sympathy of the priesthood; but Austria has still great difficulties to contend with in Galicia, and would have more, but that she is the only one of the partitioning Powers who has kept in some degree the engagements undertaken towards the Poles in the Treaty of Vienna.

The Treaty of Vienna provided for the Poles a position which, if it did not answer to their wishes or rights, yet fully corresponded with their expectations. It was a position which at that time they were willing loyally to accept. Napoleon had pretended to sympathize with them, but had only used them for his own purposes. When Prussia, in 1807, after Jena, lay entirely at his feet, he, by the Peace of Tilsit, took from her all her share of the second and third partitions—the great bulk of her acquisitions—and erected them into the Duchy of Warsaw, which he gave to the King of Saxony. When Austria was in her turn defeated in 1809, she ceded, by the Peace of Schoenbrunn, a portion of Galicia, including Cracow, which was incorporated in this new Duchy of Warsaw. When Buonaparte fell his satellites fell too. The King of Saxony saw himself stripped of all his possessions, and at the mercy of the allies. The fate of Poland was the subject of much compassionate interest with the English and French plenipotentiaries; and the necessity of putting Prussia into as good a condition as before the war broke out caused many difficulties in settling the treaty. The Emperor Alexander wanted the Duchy of Warsaw for himself. At last the matter was arranged; the province of Posen was detached from the duchy, and restored to Prussia, who received compensation for the rest in a large slice of Saxony. Cracow was declared “a free, independent, and neutral city, in perpetuity, under the protection of Russia, Austria, and Prussia,” and the duchy, thus curtailed, was handed over to the Empire of Russia. The Czar reserved to himself the right of giving to this State, which was to enjoy a distinct administration, the interior extension which he should judge fitting; he took the title of King of Poland. The same article of the treaty declared, “that the Poles, respectively subjects of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, shall obtain a representation and national institutions regulated according to the mode of political existence that each of the Governments to which they belong shall deem it useful and convenient to grant them.” These stipulations seemed to guarantee Poland a national life; a liberal representative Constitution was given to the Kingdom of Poland; no foreigner, no Russian was eligible to any office; the army was to bear the Polish colours. The Constitution was soon trampled under foot. Yet the Poles were patient and hopeful. Alexander had reserved to himself the right of annexing all the Polish provinces to the Polish Kingdom; he often announced his resolve to do this, and in this hope the Poles bore the violation of their Constitution. With his death that hope departed. The Poles, unable to bear the disappointment and the tyranny, rebelled. They were conquered, and the Emperor Nicholas declared, in spite of the remonstrances of Europe, all the rights given them by the Treaty of Vienna, forfeited. The years which have elapsed since then have been one long denial of justice to Poland. With the same insolent defiance of solemn engagements exhibited by the Czar, in denying the Poles the rights given them at Vienna, Austria seized the independent city of Cracow, and incorporated it in her dominions.

In Prussia, although they have never enjoyed the national institutions promised them, the Poles can share in the common liberties given by the Constitution, and the Polish fraction in the Chamber of Deputies can at least declare their grievances. In Austria each province has now as much self-government as is consistent with the maintenance of the empire. But the Poles of Russian Poland have had no franchises. It must be added that they would not have accepted them. The Emperor Alexander has shown a desire to conciliate the Poles. He did relax the iron severity of his father's rule; he has offered them liberties, trifling in degree, no doubt, far from equivalent to their violated rights, yet franchises which ought to have been accepted, because they would have formed a foundation upon which to build a larger liberty. To have given the Poles at once a large measure of freedom would have been equivalent to inviting insurrection, and even if it would have been received with loyalty, the measure would still have been imprudent. The Poles have no practical political aptitude. They have none of them known liberty for nearly a hundred years, and the bulk of them never knew it. There is yet no intelligent middle-class to form the safeguard against the extravagances alike of the nobility and the peasantry. The relaxation which the Czar has ventured upon has been used, not to ask for more liberty of the sort given by the Treaty of Vienna; it has been employed for demonstrations in favour of the independence of Poland, and its reconstitution within its ancient limits. The Czar offered the Poles municipal institutions, and they replied by requiring him to withdraw from Poland, and surrender up Lithuania, by threatening Austria and Prussia with the resumption of their appropriations. Demonstrations have led to severe repressive measures. The Russian police and military have shown their usual brutality; the situation has been aggravated by attempts at assassination; and now the efforts of the Russians to enforce, with even more than their usual brutality, the conscription have been seized as the occasion for an insurrection, which would appear to be general throughout the kingdom. The leaders of the movement, which has evidently been some time in preparation, appear to have felt that whilst in ordinary times men would see the hopelessness of rising, and refuse to obey the summons, the conscripts, driven to desperation by their abhorrence of service in the Russian army, will willingly risk their lives. On the night of the 22nd of January a brutal massacre of all the detached parties of Russian soldiers, commenced the insurrection. In this, their first step, the Poles have proved that they have learnt nothing. Their only hope of success lay in the assumed unreliability of the Russian army; this massacre, which only the assurance of success by its means could extenuate, will unite the Russian soldiers, however disaffected, in a ferocious resolution to destroy the insurgents. Already, if we may believe the telegrams from Russian sources—and the intelligence from the Prussian and Austrian frontiers seems to confirm them—the rebels have been generally defeated. Warsaw, at least, where the chance of success was greatest, seems to be in quiet possession of the Russians. But whether the insurrection is already quelled or not is no matter of great importance. It must be suppressed. The insurgents cannot cope with the forces of Russia; they will soon be crushed; the flower of the Polish youth will be shot on the battle-field, or buried alive in Siberia. The Czar, convinced that the Poles are not to be conciliated, will restore, in its full severity, the rule of the sword and stick. The peasants, as before, will be the object of his attention, the enmity between them and the nobility will be stimulated. The only classes who care for Polish independence will be ruthlessly maltreated; the peasants, who have never concerned themselves about it and hold aloof from this rising, will be treated with some consideration. But although this may be the last struggle of Poland, generations will pass away before Russia can enjoy the quiet fruition of her crimes. Order may reign again at Warsaw; but the burning hate of the Poles will only die out with the extinction of the Polish gentlemen, and sympathy with Poland, and abhorrence of Russia, will long be the general sentiment of all free nations.

Statistics of Southern Trade.

HOME TRADE.

The amount of the home or internal trade for 1859, in the South, is the aggregate of the imports and exports, and the produce and manufactures consumed in the country. The amount of Southern exports would appear still more remarkable if we had the means of ascertaining them fully; for besides the produce sent northwards for export to Europe a large quantity is consumed in the North. Long before Secession—from the differences of climate, of production, and in other respects—the North and South were essentially separate nations so far as commerce was concerned, and their commercial interests were directly opposite—opposite, we mean, in the sense of the one being an agricultural, and the other a manufacturing country. The only way in which we can arrive at the total amount of the Southern trade is by adding to the export of Southern produce from the United States the produce and manufactures consumed in the North and South. We must refer to the census returns of 1850, but the abstract of the return for 1860 will enable us to form a reliable estimate of the production for 1859.

$385,641,311

Being the value of the agricultural produce of the South not included or not distinguished in the exports of the United States. It will be observed that we included rice in the above, and from that we ought to deduct about $2,000,000 for exports; on the other hand, we do not include sugar, while we ought to allow, for 1850, not less than $12,000,000 for that article, not included in the exports. Making the deduction for rice and the addition for sugar, we have:—

Agricultural produce of South for 1850 not included in United States' exports..	$395,641,311
Deduct for Delaware and District of Columbia, say	4,000,000

$391,641,311

Besides the articles of Southern origin exported from the United States there is also the cotton, &c., used in the United States. For instance, the cotton manufacture in the North for 1850 was $52,000,000, and the raw materials came from the South. Again, an enormous quantity of tobacco is consumed in the States. If for these items we add $50,000,000 to the above, we shall have as the total result:—

Products exported $441,641,311

Now, if the reader will inspect the above table, he will find that in many important items the produce of the South has doubled. According to the official returns for 1850, the cotton crop was 2,796,706 bales, and in 1860, 5,196,985 bales of 400 lbs. In 1859 the cotton crop was 3,851,481 bales. If then we estimate the products in 1859 at 50 per cent. over that of 1850, we shall not be doing full justice to the productiveness of the South.

Products of the South not exported from United States:—

1850.. .. .	$441,641,311
And 50 per cent.	220,820,655

1859 $662,461,966

We now come to the items of manufacture which were, according to the report of the Secretary of the Interior, presented to Congress in January 1859, for the South:—

	Population.	Value.
1840	7,334,434	$93,362,202
1850	9,664,656	164,579,937

From the total for 1850 we must deduct for flour mills the sum of $43,111,766 being a total for Southern manufactures in 1860 of $121,468,171. By taking the increase in population, and assuming the increase from 1840 to 1850 to be the average, we should have to double that amount. We will, however, to be within the fair estimate, add only 50 per cent. to the amount, making the Southern manufactures for 1859, $182,202,256.

According to the census of 1860 the value of home manufactures in the South was $18,526,734.

Let us now add the different items together, and we shall then have the total produce of Southern produce for 1859.

Produce not exported from the U. S.	$662,461,966
Manufactures.. .. .	182,202,256
Home manufactures	18,526,734
Exports, see No. 38 of THE INDEX	200,693,296
	$1,063,884,252

To this total we must add the imports and the amount that was sent northwards, but not exported from the United States, and therefore exchanged for Northern produce. If we assume that 50 per cent. of the entire production of the South is changed for Northern production, we shall be considerably within the true estimate. The total amount of Southern trade for 1859 will then be:—

Produce	$1,063,884,252
	$1,595,826,378

To conduct an internal trade of this magnitude—for the labour of distribution is distinct from that of production—must require great activity on the part of the free population. We print the following tables, compiled from the census of 1860, to show how largely the population of the South is engaged in commerce and industry:—

It will thus be seen that out of 2,911,994 free males over 15 years of age, more than 50 per cent. were actively engaged in commercial or industrial pursuits, and we must remember that this does not include the landowners, who are also engaged in agriculture, and that there were in 1850, 139,403 white males above the age of 50. In 1841 the population of Great Britain was 18,720,394, and the total number of males returned as having occupation was 5,517,380, including our soldiers and sailors both at home and in India.

The Church of England.

The English mind is essentially illogical. It shrinks from abstract speculation, and has no faith in what may be called the metaphysical school of politics. It is profoundly indifferent to the taunts and sneers of those who seem to think that a religion or a Constitution should be laid out like one of those Dutch gardens in which “Grove nods at grove; each alley has its brother,

And half the platform just reflects the other.”

Englishmen are rather attached than otherwise to the anomalies and logical incongruities which every English law, institution, and society presents in abundance; and they are profoundly distrustful of those fundamental principles of political right and wrong on which every Government created since 1790—save and except those of the British Colonies, and that of the Confederate States of America—has professed to found itself. “How will it work?” Such is the question which an Englishman asks himself, when he is considering the propriety of any proposed change; and unless this question be satisfactorily answered, no proof of the utter injustice and absurdity of that which it is proposed to abolish, and no demonstration of the beauty and equity of that which is offered as a substitute, will have the least weight with him. “How has it worked?” Such is the test by which he tries every political system that the wit of man ever devised; and nothing that has not worked will find any mercy at his hands, no matter how indisputably its excellence may be proved by appeals to reason and to sentiment. This goes further than politics. We verily believe that with nine-tenths of Englishmen, if they were to speak their own feelings, and not repeat the teachings of others, the one conclusive proof of the truth and divine origin of Christianity is, that “it has worked so well”—an argument which, in those or other words, we have more than once seen in English books and heard from English preachers.

This being the case, it is not strange that Englishmen should be so much attached as they for the most part are to the National Church. Her warmest friends can hardly dare to claim the merit of logical consistency either for her doctrine or her discipline. The former is the growth of a compromise between Catholicism and Puritanism; the latter has been the creation of a series of usurpations, revolts, lay and ecclesiastical laches, which have left it in such an anomalous state that only very learned ecclesiastical lawyers can tell what it ought to be, and no one in the world can define what it is. Her whole system is a series of anomalies; she is herself, not without some show of reason, reviled as an anachronism; in a word, she is exactly what, in the eye of logic, a child of compromise must always be—a living self-contradiction. So is the British Constitution. All this Churchmen and Englishmen will say, and allow to be said, without an idea that it therefore behoves them to get rid of the Church or the Constitution. Both work admirably well; far better, as conservative opinion in England holds, than any other political or ecclesiastical system on earth; and though it may be admitted that neither is suited to a foreign soil, no thoroughbred Englishmen will therefore renounce his faith in their practical perfection. If Parliamentary government proves a failure in France, so much the worse for the French. If the English Church do not flourish in America, the fact is held to damage not the catholicity of the Church, but the character of the Americans. Here, in despite of every disadvantage, the Church sustains the religious life of the nation, and the Constitution suffices for its political happiness. He must be something worse than a fool or a bigot who denies that the Church “works well;” he must be deaf to reason and blind to principle who, on reflection, is not a little surprised to see how many anomalies and absurdities, wrongs and abuses, have been made to work for good to her, and through her to the people.

What can be more inconsistent with every abstract principle of right than the system on which what is called the patronage of the Church is distributed? Clergymen are appointed to churches—from which, when once appointed, they cannot be removed but, after a most expensive procedure, by sentence of a court of law—sometimes by the Lord Chancellor, who disposes of the “livings,” or cures, which are in the gift of the Crown; sometimes by lay patrons, great landowners, or others, who are at liberty to buy and sell the perpetual advowson or patronage of a rectory, or merely the right of next presentation, and of whom some thus command one, some five, some ten or more livings; sometimes by lay corporations—the colleges at Oxford and Cambridge holding, each of them, many livings, which, as they fall vacant, are offered in turn to the clerical Fellows; sometimes by the Bishop of the diocese; in a few very exceptional instances, by the parishioners. What could be more unreasonable? One parish receives its pastor and priest from a Minister of the Crown, who never saw or heard of it, or very likely of him, till the vacancy was announced, and the letters applying for it poured in. Another, perhaps in Cumberland, perhaps in Derbyshire, receives its clergyman at the hands of a dozen scholarly gentlemen in Oxford—the former accepting the living most generally as enabling him to marry, since his fellowship is held on the condition of celibacy. A third parish learns that it is to depend on the spiritual ministrations of the squire's second son, for whom the family living is deemed a fit provision; or on those of some utter stranger, whose father has purchased "the priest's office" as a respectable means of finding bread for one of his family. Yet the system works well; and it is worthy of note, that the method of appointment which seems most just—by parochial election—is that which works worst of all in practice. The best, if we were to be restricted to one, is undoubtedly selection by the Bishop. But the result of giving all patronage to the Bishops would probably be the disruption of the Church among the conflicts of hostile and localised factions. College livings are on the whole well filled; and their existence secures the constant infusion into the Church of a kind and quality of learning—of a class of highly educated gentlemen—which is of infinite service therein. The better class of lay patrons choose conscientiously; the most careless are pretty sure to appoint gentlemen. They choose under a stronger sense of responsibility, and with a greater means of knowledge, than any other patron except the Bishop. Even the Lord Chancellor makes many good appointments; and if the chief patronage in the Church is to be wielded by a Minister of the Crown, it is best in his hands. He was formerly an ecclesiastic; now he is necessarily a lawyer; but at all times he is less than any of his colleagues a mere political partisan. The worst arrangement connected with Church patronage is that which gives the selection of Bishops and Deans to the Prime Minister, who is sure to choose from political motives. Yet no thoughtful statesman, however deep his reverence for the Church, would like to put these appointments into the hands of the diocesan clergy. And, bad as Lord Palmerston's appointments have been—notoriously as he has favoured the least learned, least intelligent, and least respectable faction in the Church—none of them have been scandalous. Even he, the worst dispenser of ecclesiastical patronage we have seen for the last fifty years, has appointed no man notoriously unworthy of his promotion. The worst of his acts was to appoint a mere popular speaker—a clerical John Bright—to the Deanery of Carlisle, while such men as Denison remain Archdeacons, and making a Villiers into a Bishop, while Trench and Milman are but Deans. The truth is that, especially where religion is in question, all Englishmen under responsibility are likely to be fairly conscientious. Most men, of any moral sense whatever, if they choose to take a living, will make an effort to do their duty by their parish. Most Ministers, having to make a Bishop will, at least, choose one of the best men of their own party. And above all, they will choose safe men; and this is exactly what the clergy would not be likely to do. Now, it is all important that a Bishop should be a man not likely to get into hot water—to quarrel with his brethren, get into difficulties with his clergy, or show himself a hasty and intemperate reformer. A Bishop elected by the suffrages of the clergy would generally be too extreme a man to be safe; a Bishop chosen by the Premier, though he may be unlearned and inefficient, is pretty sure to be a respectable, sober, peaceably disposed gentleman.

It is partly owing to this infinite variety in the distribution of patronage that the Church has remained so broadly liberal, so thoroughly national, so little, in the bad sense of the word, ecclesiastical, as she has always shown herself. In her worst days—in the days of Elizabeth, in the days of Laud, under the reigns of the last Stuarts—she was always, though neither she nor her adversaries understood the fact, the champion of religious liberty. She was not inquisitorial, she cared not to persecute opinions, so long as they were not forced upon her notice, or to pry into private affairs, so long as no treason was privately hatched against her. We doubt if among the many victims of those evil days who died for Puritanism and Covenantism, there were a hundred who did not deserve death as traitors; we are quite certain that the doctrines of the sects whom the Crown strove, in the name of religion, to suppress were at least as hostile to civil order as to religious orthodoxy, and more inimical to religious liberty and freedom of conscience than the worst principles ever avowed by the most bigoted of Anglican Churchmen. There never was any religious tyranny in England like the tyranny of the "Pilgrim Fathers" in Massachusetts. And in these days the perfect religious freedom which obtains in this country is due entirely to the ascendancy of the Established Church. Her overthrow would initiate a period of social persecution against all who did not abide by the dicta of the dissenting bodies—of restrictive religious legislation—of interference with individual liberty—of inroads on private life by the ministers of religion—which would render England uninhabitable to educated and independent men, and result in a revolt against all religion whatsoever. Any one who doubts what the Dissenters would do if they had the power need only watch their behaviour as individuals and as sects for a few months, to be assured that nothing but the maintenance of the Church can secure for a year the maintenance of effective religious liberty. That overthrown, the choice would lie between freedom without religion, and religious slavery—a slavery to the religious crotchets of the dullest, most ignorant, and least Christian believers.

There are some Dissenters who believe that this good time—the time of Sabbatarianism in legislation, of Puritanism in politics, of Boeotian preaching and pharisaic practice—is really about to dawn upon England. We believe nothing of the kind. Already, as soon as the success of the assault on Church-rates, directed by the avowed enemies of the Church, had become sufficiently probable to alarm the country, the effect was seen in a reaction which converted an anti-Church-rate majority of seventy in the Commons into a minority of one; and now that the people as a whole, not only in the great half-heathen cities, but in market towns and country villages, thoroughly understand that the political Dissenters do not wish to get rid of an obnoxious tax—will not accept exemption from a liability to pay Church-rates—but aim at nothing less than the overthrow of the National Church, the spoliation of her property, the desecration of her buildings, the degradation of her clergy to the level of a Methodist cobbler-preacher, or Anabaptist minister—the feeling of the nation has been made unmistakably manifest. The people of the rural districts, conservative in everything, are in nothing so strongly or so intelligently conservative as in religion. They are not to be deluded by declamations against the wealth or the idleness of the clergy; for they know that their pastor is poor, and they see that he works hard. They feel the comfort of having always among them at least one resident gentleman—one man connected with those above them by birth and education, and with them by the sacred duties of his profession—one adviser whose character is a guarantee for his sincerity, whose relation to them entitles them to his kindness, and whose constant intercourse with them assures them of his sympathy. Even in the pulpit, they would not for worlds miss the presence of a scholar and a gentleman. They prefer to be taught by one whose superiority to themselves is beyond question and beyond envy, rather than by one whom they shrewdly suspect—as is the case with most Dissenting ministers—to be no more than their equal by birth, and to have the advantage of them rather in conceit than in learning. Dissent has scanty hold upon the rural population; it has no credit at all with the educated classes; its strength lies wholly among the lower middle and working classes, which compose the restless Democracy of the great towns, and that Democracy, powerful as it is for mischief, is powerless when once confronted with the conservative strength of the country, and the educated opinion of the higher orders. So long as the Church is—what she is increasingly both in town and country—the great benefactor of the poor, the great promoter of education, the one institution, besides the workhouse, in which the labourer feels that he has a right, a place, and an interest, she is sure of the support of the bulk of the people. So long as she remains what she has always been, the most tolerant and the most highly educated of religious bodies, the intellect and the education of the country will fight on her side in political, if not always in theological, controversy. And when the intelligence of the educated and the conservatism of the agricultural classes are for once united on the same side, no agitation, however skilfully organized, can possibly hope to prevail against them.

THE INVASION OF THE CRIMEA.*

SECOND ARTICLE.

After the English and French contingents had been despatched to defend the integrity of the Turkish Empire, the war fever in England temporarily subsided, and it was the general opinion that, after all, there would be no war; that the mere exhibition of determination and strength would give the Czar a plausible excuse for withdrawing from an enterprise in which he had not a single ally. Those who thought that hostilities would ensue, talked about a short, and comparatively inexpensive, war. At the drawing of the sword nations never foresee or anticipate the possibility of a long or costly war, or it is certain that the peace of the world would be less frequently disturbed. The first operations in the East seemed to indicate that the views of those who called the allied expedition a military promenade on a grand scale were correct. At the end of what may be called the first or brief summer campaign, there was every probability that the allied armies would not have the opportunity of trying their prowess with the Northern legions.

When Nicholas spoke of Turkey as the sick man, he gave feeble expression to the universal opinion of Europe. The Moslem nation was thought to be utterly rotten, and that all its martial valour had departed. Our Eastern ally was looked upon as a sick man bereft of all strength and consciousness—as a corpse that could do nothing unless galvanized into temporary and weak vitality by the pressure of other nations. A few weeks were sufficient to demonstrate the erroneousness of this opinion. First there came the siege of Silistria. It was a surprise that the place should hold out for a few days, but that it should repulse every effort of its assailants, and finally compel them to retire from the contest, was an event that puzzled the wisest heads in Europe. The Turks, so helpless at Sinope, were superior to their foe at Silistria. At the last-named place important assistance was given by some English officers, who forced their way into the place, and it may be fairly said that the wonderful success was due to the gallantry the resolution, and the genius of Captain Butler and Lieutenant Nasmyth. They proved that the Turks, properly officered, were brave soldiers. They thus gained a victory of which the moral effect was out of all proportion to its material importance. When the Russians raised the siege of Silistria, the military power of Russia was shorn of its prestige, and we learnt, though it may be soon to forget, the lesson, that the numerical superiority of a nation does not, independently of all other considerations, imply military supremacy.

The battle of Giurgevo was hardly less remarkable than the siege of Silistria. The Turks crossed the river, forced on an engagement, and were victorious, being on this occasion also assisted by a band of Englishmen, who suffered severely for their gallantry. An attempt on the part of the Russian Commander-in-Chief to join the repulsed army, and by sheer force of numbers to crush the Turks, was frustrated by the timely presence of some gunboats, under the command of British officers—Prince Leiningen and Lieutenant Glyn, of the Britannia. The result of these operations was the withdrawal of the Russian armies.

But the object of the allies was not attained. It may suit Mr. Kinglake to say that we went to war to get the Russians out of Turkey, but it is notorious that we did not break the peace of forty years for any less purpose than that of crippling the power of Russia in the East. If we had patched up a peace after the battle of Giurgevo, we should have left Russia free to attack Turkey at the first convenient season—that is, at a season when the Western Powers were less prepared to resent her aggression. We had no desire, it was not our interest, to weaken the influence of Russia in European councils; it was only in the direction of the East that we were called upon to check, as far as we could, her ambitious encroachments. To do this the invasion of the Crimea and the destruction of Sebastopol were determined on, and so thoroughly was the policy of the movement understood that comparatively little regard was paid to the Baltic expedition, and by common consent the war itself was called the Crimean War.

Mr. Kinglake does not approve of the invasion of the Crimea. He says it was brought about by the advocacy of the Times, and devotes many pages to a cynical history of that journal. With the attack on the Times we need not interfere, for the Times is well able to defend itself; but we cannot avoid noticing the author's strange inconsistency. He charges the Times with being the mere representative of public opinion, and at the same time alleges that that journal is responsible for the invasion of the Crimea. But if the Times represents public opinion, then not it, but public opinion, is responsible. Again, Mr. Kinglake is never weary in finding fault with the Government of France because it is not representative, as he says, and that the wishes of Frenchmen do not exert any influence on the action of the Government. He turns to England, and says the Times is the powerful exponent of public opinion, and by it the wishes of the nation are brought to bear upon the Government; and with that he finds fault. We do not deny that the Times had much to do with the invasion of the Crimea, that it hurried on that event, and did not allow the Government to miss the opportunity of striking a decisive blow at Russian aggression in the East. But it is idle to pretend the Times did not in this instance, as a public organ, express the public sentiment.

This fanciful digression about the Times is followed by a story which a writer of a comic history of the Crimean War would reject as being a little too absurd, and far too vulgar. Mr. Kinglake says that the Duke of Newcastle, being pressed by the manifestation of public opinion, was more eager than any of his colleagues to invade the Crimea, and that he prepared a despatch which was so peremptory in its tone that it left Lord Raglan no choice but to undertake the enterprise. The despatch certainly does not seem to us to bear this construction. Lord Raglan is instructed to invade the Crimea if in his judgment the allied commanders could do so with a fair prospect of success, and the only part that can be cited as peremptory is an intimation that the Government will be disappointed if Lord Raglan decides that the enterprise is not practicable. The exact words of the despatch are: "And if, upon mature reflection, you should consider that the united strength of the two armies is insufficient for this undertaking, you are not to be precluded from the exercise of the discretion originally vested in you, though her Majesty's Government will learn with regret that an attack from which such important consequences are anticipated must be any longer delayed." There is certainly nothing in this to induce a commander to undertake an imprudent adventure, and these instructions are exceedingly tame, compared to the peremptory suggestions, not to say orders, issued to Sir Charles Napier. But granting the despatch is peremptory, we are not less astonished at the way in which Mr. Kinglake says it received the sanction of the Cabinet. The passage is too curious to be summarised, and, therefore, we quote it as a fair specimen of Mr. Kinglake's method of making history:—

The Duke of Newcastle took a despatch to Richmond, for there was to be a meeting of the members of the Cabinet at Pembroke-lodge, and he intended to make this the occasion of submitting the proposed instructions to the judgment of his colleagues. It was evening, a summer evening, and all the members of the Cabinet were present when the Duke took out the draft of his proposed despatch and began to read it. Then there occurred an incident, very trifling in itself, but yet so momentous in its consequences, that if it had happened in old times it would have been attributed to the direct intervention of the immortal Gods. In these days, perhaps, the physiologist will speak of the condition into which the human brain is naturally brought when it rests after anxious labours, and the analytical chemist may regret that he had not an opportunity of testing the food of which the Ministers had partaken, with a view to detect the presence of some narcotic poison; but no well-informed person will look upon the accident as characteristic of the men whom it befel, for the very faults, no less than the high qualities, of the statesmen composing Lord Aberdeen's Cabinet were of such a kind as to secure them against the imputation of being careless and torpid. However, it is very certain that before the reading of the paper had long continued, all the members of the Cabinet, except a small minority, were overcome with sleep. For a moment the noise of a tumbling chair disturbed the repose of the Government; but presently the Duke of Newcastle resumed the reading of his draft, and then again the fated sleep descended upon the eyelids of the Ministers. Later in the evening, and in another room, the Duke of Newcastle made another and a last effort to win attention to the contents of the draft, but again a blissful rest (not, this time, actual sleep) interposed between Ministers and cares of State, and all, even those who from the first had remained awake, were in a quiet, assenting frame of mind. Upon the whole, the despatch, though it bristled with sentences tending to provoke objection, received from the Cabinet the kind of approval which is often awarded to an unobjectionable sermon. Not a letter of it was altered, and it will be seen, by-and-by, that that cogeny in the wording of the despatch, which could hardly have failed to provoke objection from an awakened Cabinet, was the very cause which governed events.

A more disgraceful charge was never invented. Every one who reads the above passage will understand Mr. Kinglake's meaning. Indeed, he himself avows it. He rejects the theory of the "immortal Gods." It is to the influence of the food he trusts for the explanation of the incident. In order that none of his readers might fail to appreciate the slander, he drags in the "tumbling chair." In short, when the British Cabinet had met to discuss a most important duty, when they had to decide upon a matter involving the peace of Europe, the lives of their fellow-citizens, and the honour of their countrymen, they were so drunk that they could not keep their eyes open, or avoid knocking over a chair. This is the plain and unmistakable deduction from the text. When they were aroused, and met in another room they were still too far gone to comprehend or dispute the wording of the despatch. Of course, the story is a mere impertinent fabrication, inserted to make the book racy and sensational. It is clever in its way, but there is a want of judgment in introducing it. So long as Mr. Kinglake kept to abusing the Emperor of the French and his Ministers, some persons might have thought there was a vestige of truth in his assertions, but the story of reading the despatch is too gross for any one to swallow, unless he is in the state that Mr. Kinglake represents the members of the Aberdeen Cabinet when they had to transact business of the greatest importance.

Lord Raglan, without having any very reliable information as to the forces of the enemy, determined to act according to the wishes of his Government. Nor do we think he can be charged with deciding imprudently. Supposing the Russians had been in greater numbers than anticipated, and that the allied force could not, without large reinforcements, make any progress, what risk did the allies run? The intended attack on Sebastopol might have been temporarily postponed, and it might even have been found necessary for the invaders, being landed, to take up a defensive position until their armies were increased. The allies were not in the position of invaders who could be cut off from their base of supplies and destroyed. They were secure, because they had the command of the sea.

On September 14th, 1854, the allied armies landed in the Crimea without opposition, and took possession of the unfortified town of Eupatoria. The success of the landing was greatly due to the skill and zeal of Sir Edmund Lyons. On the 20th of September was fought the battle of Alma. We do Mr. Kinglake no more than justice when we say that a finer description of a fight was never written. It is wonderfully elaborate, exceedingly minute, yet it is never tedious, never dreary. From first to last it is full of martial fire. It is free from professional pedantry, and is not laden with technical expressions. Let any one compare Mr. Kinglake's Alma with M. Thiers' Waterloo, and they will see something of the comparative power and gracefulness of the former. We are not vouching for the truth of the details, for that is more than Mr. Kinglake himself can pretend to guarantee. He writes, of course, from hearsay, since he narrates, with much exactness, what regiments widely separated were doing at the same time. He also uses freely that romantic colouring which is put on to make the picture more effective. Mr. Kinglake could not know the exact impression produced in the minds of the Russian infantry by the appearance of the bearskin caps of the English infantry. He could not know exactly what was passing in the mind of Prince Mentschikoff during the fight. The speculation of the Russian commander's movements, though ingenious, cannot be received as an authenticated fact. No one will accept Mr. Kinglake's narrative as historically reliable. We do not mean by this that it is merely a romance. In its main incidents it is strictly accurate, and the details are generally probable. But the merit of the narrative consists in the vividness with which the battle is brought before us. There is no well-worn appeal to wholesale horrors, for when they come in the narrative is abruptly terminated. We follow, with absorbing interest, the fortunes of each regiment. We are proud to find the heroes of Alma are the men we loved at college, or who we had met in the hunting field. The officers are not martinet's, but our friends, showing their pluck and energy in another pursuit. We are brought face to face with the soldiers, and we understand the power there is in the British line—in the thin red line so peculiarly British—and which is such an effective weapon in the hands of its officers. We see how it is the British line is able to meet the columns of an enemy without flinching. So far as the military movements are concerned, Mr. Kinglake's work is a fitting text-book, or it will, at all events, prove an excellent help to military students in understanding their text-books.

The Alma was a hard-won victory, but it was satisfactory to the nation, for it showed that forty years' peace had not destroyed our national spirit, and that we had not grown enervated as well as rich. It is true we did not gather all the material harvest we might have done from the victory. We did not crush the retreating army, and enter Sebastopol. This was no fault of the commanders. If they had known as much as the critics do now, they would have done so; but not knowing the strength of the enemy and the preparations at Sebastopol, they were bound to act prudently. Military critics may speculate as much as they like, and by speculating do no harm; but commanders to whom the fate of armies is entrusted must not speculate, but esteem prudence a higher virtue than valour. We deplore the lives subsequently lost at the famous siege, but we may nevertheless rejoice that the efficiency of our military arrangements was not tested nearer home. We paid a fearful price for a priceless lesson, and woe to us if we forget it. With the battle of the Alma Mr. Kinglake's present instalment of his work closes. What remains to be told is the best part of the history, and in that we sincerely hope Mr. Kinglake will resist the temptation of introducing a description of the Malakoff Tower by 111 pages of a dissertation upon the creation of the world, upon the pretence that such a dissertation is not a digression, because if the world had not been created, the Crimea would not have been invaded.

TWO BOOKS ON AMERICA.*

The American War has stimulated a rapid and not altogether healthy growth of American political literature. Secession and coercion are topics on which almost every American and a good many Europeans have much to say; and in the present state of anxiety and excitement produced by one of the most gigantic wars on record—a war, too, which afflicts neutral nations as scarcely any previous war has done—every one who has anything to say expects a hearing, no matter how often or how much better all that he can tell us has been said before. The two books before us are alike in this respect. Neither of them contains much that is particularly new or particularly striking. Nevertheless, each of them possesses an interest of its own; the one because it professes to have been written eighteen years ago by a man who had actually mixed in the political warfare of America, and to give the opinions of his retirement upon the character of the people among whom he lived and the Government which he had served, and upon the gloomy prospects of their future—the other because it gives, in a lively and easy, if somewhat flippant form, two different views of the present situation; that of the friends of peace at the North, and that of the resolute Secessionists of the South; because it contains a number of useful quotations; and because it is a book of which about half may be read with pleasure, and the other half skipped with advantage. In every other respect the volumes differ—unless in this, that they are both somewhat shallow and disappointing. The White Republican expresses obvious but substantially correct thoughts in very tolerable English; the "late Statesman" reveals a horrible picture of the inner national life of America, and reasons sometimes well upon the inevitable consequences of the state of things which he reveals, but writes the most execrable English it has ever been our fate to read. Indeed, it is not English at all; it is not even American; it is the language of a man without education, of a writer who has not the most rudimentary notion of the laws of grammar. His dissertation on "the weakness of the American Government" is full of faults which would disgrace a charity-school boy; it is distinguished by a slipshod slovenliness which would hardly be tolerated in the most careless letters of a woman to her intimate friends, or in the most informal conversation of educated men "across the walnuts and the wine." We never saw anything worse in print—not even in the messages and proclamations of the Illinois rail-splitter, whom popular caprice has made ruler of twenty millions of persons, of whom not one million are as ignorant as himself. Mr. Lincoln's indifference to grammar is as notorious as his contempt of law; and he treats Lindley Murray with no more reverence than he accords to the Constitution of the United States; but neither he nor his famous prototype, Sigismund "Rex Romanus, et super grammaticam," could surpass the author of this volume in bold defiance of all Old-World rules of written and spoken language. He seems, moreover, to have picked up his knowledge of history, ancient and modern, from some school-book written fifty years ago for the use of junior classes; and his ideas of European countries, as they now exist, from that too notorious journal which lately complained of the ambitious aspirations of England to the control of the Dead Sea. He seems to have heard of the Amphictyonic Council—but never of the Achæan League, or the Cynthian Confederacy; he has vague notions of some general Italian Federation, existing at some period during the Middle Ages; he talks about the provinces of France preferring foreign alliances to the "Belle Francais" (by which, as we at last discovered, he means La Belle France) and seems wholly unaware of the relations which really subsisted between the Kings of England and the provinces they held or claimed in France; relations not of alliance but of feudal sovereignty. Another very provoking fault we may perhaps excuse in the writer, as we excuse it in the conversation of aged men; but the editor, seeing that everything in the book is said at full length several times over, and that many peculiar sentences are repeated more than once, evidently showing that the author was constantly forgetting what he had already written, might have had so much regard for the comfort of the public, and the credit of the defunct statesmen, as to cut out the greater part of the repetitions which swell the volume to 380 pages, where 180 would have amply sufficed. He is sure to suffer for his laches; for no one but a reviewer will have patience to read these pages through. Nor do we recommend any one to make the attempt. The volume is valuable only as the evidence of a reluctant and a tedious witness, which no one save the jury need hear, except in the brief summary into which a judicious advocate or a business-like judge will reduce it. The White Republican, on the other hand, puts all he has to say in a readable form; and at least his first three chapters, or about half his book, deserve to be read in extenso.

The "late Statesman" proclaims himself an apostate from the Democratic party, a slave-holder disgusted with slavery. The White Republican is, on the contrary, a Democrat whose extreme constitutionalism has driven him into exile; a Northerner with strong Southern proclivities. But their testimony on many most important points presents a striking coincidence. Both of them are thoroughly disgusted with the working of universal suffrage. The former desires to restrict the right of voting to the holders of real property; a suggestion by no means unworthy of regard, though had the writer been really acquainted with the working of foreign systems of suffrage, he would have seen reason to think that the principle adopted in England, which unites a freehold qualification in counties with a residential qualification in towns, is equally safe and more just and practicable. We may remark, however, that in the South, where two-thirds of the heads of families, probably, own some kind of real property, such a restriction is hardly necessary. Universal suffrage has, as a matter of course, given the Government of the Union into the hands of the lowest classes, and fostered corruption in every class. How could it do otherwise? When educated men and men of property know that their votes will be balanced at the polls by those of their own coachmen, and that they will be utterly swamped by a mob of illiterate and half-drunken opponents, is it likely that they will take the trouble to go to the poll? When the people are—as democratic institutions always make them—jealous of wealth, and suspicious of refinement—what chance have gentlemen of honour and independence of winning their way to political power? Where the sovereign people must be courted, like other sovereigns, according to its taste; and where it has an insatiable appetite for gross flattery, vulgar compliances, and abject admiration—where it will tolerate no opposition to its will, no resolute resistance to its caprices—what hope is there that honourable and high-spirited men will condescend to ask its suffrages? Necessarily, under such circumstances, politics become the trade of men who are not sensitive about honour or scrupulous on points of conscience; naturally, such men think chiefly of making a profit by their trade. Hence that universal corruption to which all who know the Northern States of America bear emphatic testimony; that “stealage” which, according to the “late Statesman” adds 50 per cent to the burden imposed by the State and Federal Governments. Hence, too, an evil which aggravates the vices engendered of mob-rule; a devotion to party which overrides all considerations of truth, justice, and patriotism. The machine of universal suffrage can only be worked by party organization; the withdrawal of respectable men from political strife leaves those who may dissent from their party no rallying-ground on which to assert their independence; and “the party” becomes absolute over the consciences and conduct of its supporters; their idol and their tyrant. No man, this writer declares, need fear to be condemned for riotous acts done in the party cause, or for peculations committed in any office in which his party has placed him; it is not likely that he will ever be prosecuted, and if he should be so unfortunate, there must be one or two of his party on the jury, and then his conviction becomes impossible. The Secretaries of War and of the Navy under Mr. Lincoln have proved, as distinctly as the author asserts it, the perfect impunity which attends speculation in the Northern States. In the South, where different feelings and different manners prevail—though this ex-Democrat, with the usual candour of an apostate, forbears to notice the difference—the best men of the country are generally the leaders of the people, give the tone to politics, and guide the counsels of the State. Hence the manifest superiority which the statesmen of the South always maintained in the Federal Congress, where men of honour and repute were met by political intriguers or puppets—where Davis and Yancey and Mason were confronted by the Searles, the Sumners, and the Lovejoys.

On another topic, from entirely opposite points of view, the two witnesses give concurrent testimony. “The weakness of the American Government” is attributed by the Statesman who descants upon it to its Federal character. He writes as if the colonies had, on their separation from the British Empire, constituted a single and united nation; as if the framers of the Constitution in 1787 had had to decide on the form of a national Administration, and had deliberately adopted the present one; as if the States had derived their authority from the Union, and had been constantly encroaching thereupon; and he laments the utter helplessness of the central Power, which is the result of such a system. He admits, and even exaggerates, the authority of the States over the individual citizen, while he misrepresents the character and origin of that authority. No ignorant person would learn from his book that the States were acknowledged, independently and severally, by Great Britain before the Union was formed; that in forming the Union they reserved, in the most distinct manner, their sovereign character; and that whatever allegiance individual citizens may owe to the Union they owe only through their State, and on account of the connection of their State with the rest of the Federation. No one would suppose, on reading this book, that the original Union included only the States which voluntarily seceded to it from the old Confederation: that its organization was complete, and its first President elected, before New York became a member; and that Rhode Island and North Carolina were free and independent Republics for months after the installation of George Washington. On all these points the White Republican lays great emphasis. But on the moral aspect of the question—the feeling of the citizen towards the State, and towards the Union—the power of the State over every relation of his daily life, and the entire absence of any direct tie between himself and the Federal Government—the evidence of an author who throughout espouses the cause of the Union against the States, and sees in State rights a kind of treason to the Union, deserves greater attention. Scarcely a page in his volume that does not contain some complaint of the overwhelming tendency of State loyalty towards disunionism; of the universal prevalence of the doctrine of State sovereignty; of the absoluteness of the tie between the citizen and the authorities of his State, and the looseness of the almost invisible bond between him and the central Power at Washington. This testimony is invaluable; for it is the testimony of an enemy and an apostate to the real character of the Federation now dissolved, and the real nature of that “rebellion” which the North claims to put down; a “rebellion” of the citizens of ten sovereign States, acting under the authorities to whom they have all their lives been taught to pay homage, who protect their property, punish their crimes, command their obedience, and defend their laws, against an imaginary “country,” whose very title negatives the idea of unity, and a phantom Power to which they owe nothing, and from which they have never received anything. It is worthy of remark that the “late Statesmen” prophesies disunion, and predicts that there will be no attempt at coercion.

There has been a great deal of speculation as to whether the other States, or any one of them, would stir in aid of the Union, in case a single State, or a combination of States, openly resisted the central Government? The better opinion of those deepest interested in the question, and who have not only had the best opportunities, but observed with the closest scrutiny, is, that in no case would the other States move a finger in their sovereign capacity to put down the refractory sister. Their sympathy would be so strong in favour of State power, that they would do nothing but try to effect a compromise, as has been often done already, but would not fight against her or them. When South Carolina nullified, and every person thought a crisis unavoidable, some of the States resolved that they would not oppose her, and others, particularly the great, wise, and domain State of Virginia, sent one of her most prudent men, or politicians, to her, to “reside,” as she expressed it, “near the Government of South Carolina,” advise or consult with her on the difficulty with the Union, and try to effect a compromise—a compromise did take place, and the tariff was modified or altered to suit the case. The very mode in which Virginia sent down to her added fresh insult to the thing, for she claimed to do it or interfere as a sovereign and friend, and from her own impulses, not those of the Federal Power, and sent, as it were, an ambassador under the flag of a sovereignty, to the court of, or to reside near, another sovereign, to offer her mediation only, not threaten her. The States have a sort of “esprit de corps,” a pride, and make it a point of honour not to take sides against a sister State under any circumstances; what, then, could the abstract and helpless thing, the Federal Government, do of herself, with five or six thousand common soldiers, scattered to the four winds, without pride, against a free State, with all the impulses of liberty, and their resources of men? I would venture a prophecy, that if the thing be put to the test, which it most likely will, that the State carries her point.

Sentiments of disunion gain strength daily. I can remember when an idea uttered or a feeling manifested against this Union would have cost its author his life, or at least his standing in society. A thousand voices would have scouted him, and it would have been spoken of all through the country as most abominable, and even treasonable. So sacred were the sentiments or feelings of Union, that the prevailing toast at all the Fourth of July dinners and feasts, as we have said, was “Palsied be the arm that is lifted against the Union, and stiff the tongue that dare to denounce its sacredness.” This toast was always drunk standing, out of respect to the Confederation. Gradually, as general suffrage and demagoguism corrupted the land, and State rights weaned the minds of the people from their allegiance to the Union, did the bold and the reckless begin to express their jealousies and doubts, and State politicians arraign its acts, and gainsay its powers. Then you heard the bold nullifier, the Jeffersonian Democrat, the anti-tariffite, the slave-holders, calculating its value in dollars and cents, and expressing most ruthlessly their indifference to its fate. This is not only the case under high excitement and heat of debate, but coldly and deliberately talked of as a matter of course in every ale-house, on the public squares, court houses, legislative halls, and in the colleges and schools, in the mouths of striplings and almost babes. The progress of the ball of disunion gathers force as it goes, as well as velocity in a geometrical ratio; and unless something stays its course, or weakens its impetus, it will not, on the same ratio, require many years to do its work.

The White Republican collects a number of passages from authorities of all sorts—jurists, statesmen, and conventions, to prove the right of secession and the wrongfulness of coercion—quotations worth the attention of those whose minds are still confused with the idea of a national Government assailed by a provincial rebellion.

We may further call attention to the fact that the anti-Southern author, writing in 1845, dwells comparatively little on the subject of slavery, and attributes the disunionism which he laments to the selfishness of the non-manufacturing States, which object to be heavily mulcted for the benefit of their needy sisters in the North-East; being a vehement advocate of the tariff, and a Protectionist of the most ignorant and obstinate school. The White Republican, on his part, makes the insults and thefts of the Abolitionists are trifles compared with the injury inflicted by the protective legislation of the Federal Government. We recommend this evidence, also, to the perusal of those who will not believe that secession had any other provocation than the honest antipathy of the North to negro slavery.

The White Republican writes in a spirit of kindness towards the South. The “late American Statesman,” on the other hand, is rancorous in his hostility towards her. Nevertheless, if the friends of the North are wise they will rather direct the notice of their readers towards the former; for few will be able to read even a few score pages of the latter’s work without feeling that the disruption of a Union which bred and subsisted by such profligacy as is there described was an object worth secession and civil war; and that those who are fighting to restore it must either be hopelessly mad or desperately wicked.

THE FRENCH DISPATCH.

The Moniteur publishes a dispatch, of which the following is a translation, addressed by M. Drouyn de Lhuys, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, to M. Mercier, the French Minister at Washington:—

Paris, Jan. 9.

Sir,—If, in forming the design of assisting by the offer of our good offices in bringing to a close the hostilities which desolate the American continent, we had not been actuated, in the first instance, by the friendship which animates the Government of the Emperor towards the United States, the little success of our overtures might slacken the interest with which we follow the chances of that struggle. But the sentiment which we have obeyed is too sincere for indifference to take place in our mind, or for us to cease to be painfully affected as long as the war continues to rage. We cannot look without deep regret upon a war which is more than a civil war, and which may be compared to the most terrible feuds of the ancient republics, and the disasters of which multiply in proportion to the resources and to the courage displayed by both belligerent parties.

The Government of his Majesty has, therefore, maturely examined the objections which were made to us when we suggested the idea of a friendly mediation, and we asked ourselves whether they were really of a nature to put aside as premature all attempt at a reconciliation.

On the one hand was objected the repugnance of the United States to admit the intervention of foreign influences in the struggle; on the other, the hope which the Federal Government has not relinquished of obtaining a solution by arms.

Assuredly, Sir, recourse to the good offices of one or more neutral Powers has nothing incompatible in itself with the legitimate pride of a great people, and purely international wars are not the only ones to provide examples of the useful task of mediators. We flatter ourselves, moreover, that by offering to place ourselves at the disposal of the belligerent parties, to facilitate between them negotiations, the bases of which we abstain from anticipating, we have shown all the respect due to the patriotism of the United States, now, perhaps, more due than ever, after so many new proofs of moral strength and energy. We are not the less ready, in the wishes which we form in favour of peace, to take into account all the susceptibilities of national feeling, and we by no means contest the right of the Federal Government to decline the assistance of the great Maritime Powers of Europe. But is that assistance the only means which offers itself to the Washington Cabinet to hasten the termination of the war? And if it thinks fit to reject all foreign intervention, could it not honourably accept the idea of direct negotiation with the authority which the Southern States represent?

We are aware that the Federal Government does not despair of giving a more active impulse to hostilities; the sacrifices it has made have not exhausted its resources, still less its perseverance and firmness. The length of the struggle, in short, has not shaken its confidence in the final success of its efforts. But the opening of negotiations between the belligerent parties does not necessarily imply an immediate cessation of hostilities. Negotiations for peace are not always the consequence of a suspension of hostilities; on the contrary, they generally precede the establishment of an armistice. How often have plenipotentiaries met, exchanged communications, agreed upon all the essential dispositions of treaties, resolved finally the very question of peace or of war, while the leaders of the army continued the struggle, and endeavoured, up to the last moment, to modify the condition of peace by force of arms? Only to recall one instance in the history of the United States, the negotiations which consecrated their independence commenced long before hostilities had ceased in the New World, and the armistice was only established by the act of the 30th of November, 1782, which, under the name of “Provisional Articles” embodied beforehand the chief clauses of the final treaty of 1783.

There is therefore nothing to prevent the Government of the United States, without relinquishing the advantages it fancies it might acquire from a continuation of the war, from entering into negotiations with the Confederates of the South, in case the latter should feel that way inclined. Representatives or Commissioners from the two parties might meet at a given point deemed suitable, and which, for the purpose, might be declared neutral ground. The reciprocal grievances might there be examined into. Instead of the accusations which North and South now launch against each other a discussion on their mutual interests might be established. By regular and serious deliberations they would investigate what interests are finally irreconcilable, whether separation is an extreme not possibly to be avoided, or whether the remembrances of a common existence, whether the bonds of every description which made the North and the South one and the same federate State and raised it to so high a degree of prosperity, are not more powerful than the causes which induced the two populations to take up arms.

A negotiation with its object thus defined would not comprise any of the objections raised against a diplomatic intervention of Europe, and, without giving rise to the same hopes of the immediate conclusion of an armistice, it might exert a happy influence on the course of events. Why, then, should not a combination which consults all the delicate susceptibilities of the United States not obtain the approval of the Federal Government? Persuaded, on our part, that it is conformable to its real interests, we do not hesitate to recommend it to its notice, and, in the project of a mediation of the maritime Powers, not having sought for any vain display of influence, we should applaud without any feeling of offended vanity the opening of a negotiation which would call the two populations to discuss the solution of their differences without the concurrence of Europe. I request you, Sir, to give this assurance to the Washington Cabinet, recommending to its wisdom advice dictated by the most sincere interest for the prosperity of the United States. You are, moreover, authorized, should Mr. Seward express the wish, to leave him a copy of this despatch.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organized, classified, and liberal SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING. Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organized in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interests that might have been the Press, and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies. Through the medium of a liberal advertising patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganized trade. The object of this Agency is threefold:—

1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.

2nd. To advertise Southern business, property &c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will room about agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance, and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.

Address of President Davis to the Legislature of Mississippi	238

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

We publish elsewhere a verbatim report of President Davis's address to the Legislature of Mississippi, of which only a very imperfect abstract has previously been given.

The Federal Government, pressed, it may be, by the exigencies of its position, shows no sign of retiring from the ruinous contest. Notwithstanding the disasters of last year, and the Federal reverses that occurred at the commencement of the present year, new and gigantic efforts are being made to win a victory and get a footing in the South. The Governor of the State of New York, in his Message to the Legislature mentioned that, since the beginning of the war, the State, with a population of less than 4,000,000 at the census of 1860, has sent into the field 222,836 men, and that there are only 125,000 of them left. But neither the financial difficulties nor the loss of men has, however, checked the prosecution of the war by the Lincolnites. Even the Army of the Potomac is, if possible, to be spurred into activity. General Burnside is no longer to rest on his Fredericksburg laurels. A resolution was offered in the Federal Congress inquiring if General Burnside had formed any plans for movement since the battle of Fredericksburg, and whether subordinate officers had written to Washington to interfere with such movement, and if there had been interference, by what authority. To please the members of the Government, and to add to his reputation, General Burnside resolved to once more cross the Rappahannock and encounter the Southern army. His total force is reported to be 125,000 men—a sufficient force for any practical enterprise, if it were not disheartened and demoralized. But the Army of the Potomac has no confidence in its leaders, is clamouring for arrears of pay, and the desertions from it are constant and numerous. But Burnside, having first circulated a story about the Confederate army being divided, and that General Longstreet had taken at least thirteen brigades into Tennessee, determined to make the advance. For some days rumours were rife in Washington and New York, that the river had been crossed, that a terrible engagement was progressing, and that General Hooker had been mortally wounded. All the rumours were unfounded. On the 20th of January, General Burnside issued an address to his troops which contained the usual Federal assurance about crushing the rebellion, and entreating his soldiers, both officers and men, to make an effort. Then the camp was broken up, and once more the grand Army of the Potomac was en route for Richmond. But it did not get very far on the way. The rain fell, the roads were bad, and so, under stress of mud, the grand Army of the Potomac turned back before it reached the north bank of the Rappahannock, and occupied its old camping ground. Strangely enough, General Burnside has not proclaimed a glorious victory—but then, to be sure, he has not lost 20,000 men, as he did at Fredericksburg. The Federal commander promises to set out for Richmond as soon as possible. According to the latest accounts, the Confederate army is intact, and ready to give the enemy a warm reception when he thinks proper to cross the Rappahannock.

A Washington despatch states that in the Quartermaster's Department there is condemned clothing to the value of $1,280,000, which was passed last year by the inspector in Philadelphia, and for which the contractors were duly paid. Being unfit for use, it is turned over to the hospitals. The Federal contractors are determined to prove the truth of the old proverb that "It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good."

The official report of Rear-Admiral Porter says the number of guns at Arkansas Post was eleven, and that the place surrendered after a combined attack from ironclads and land forces.

The Federals have captured St. Charles, Duval's Bluff, and Desarie, on the White River, Arkansas. We are not aware that they were defended positions.

The Confederates are prepared for an attack on Wilmington. It has been resolved to defend the place to the last extremity. General Whiting has issued the following address to the citizens:—

Head-quarters, Wilmington, Jan. 14.

To the Citizens of Wilmington:

I have once and again advised the people about their families and property in case of an attack on the city. Many, however, who were driven off by the fever, confiding either in the supineness of the enemy, or the strength of the defences, have returned with their families, and, to my great regret, there are now many women and children in the city.

It is my duty to inform you of my belief that, within a very few days—perhaps three—the enemy will appear in force to attack this place by land and water.

While I am confident we shall beat them, I must repeat that an attack will be likely to cause much distress, privation, perhaps even peril, to women, children, and non-combatants, whose presence must always embarrass. Should God so order it that we fall before a superior force, or unexpected disaster, their lot will be infinitely worse. In every respect it is best that such should retire while they have opportunity.

It should be remembered that, when the enemy are before the place, military necessity must take precedence of all interests, even those of humanity.

Very respectfully and truly yours,

W. H. C. WHITING,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

On the 13th of January the Federals made an unsuccessful attack upon Fort Haswell, one of the defences of the water approach to Wilmington. It is reported that a simultaneous attack is to be made on Wilmington and Charleston. General Beauregard is in command at the latter place. Besides his army he has some iron-clads at his disposal.

General Bragg, in an address to the army, states that at Murfreesborough he captured 10,000 prisoners, 30 pieces of artillery, 7000 small arms, and 800 waggons. So much the better for the Federal contractors, who will have to replace the artillery, small arms, and stores.

Governor Letcher, of Virginia, has called out twenty-six regiments of militia from all counties near to the North Carolina line, to aid in repelling any invasion of the enemy from that direction. The militia will rendezvous at Petersburg for six months' service.

The Confederate authorities have ordered that all Federal officers captured after the 12th of January shall be delivered to the Governors of the States where captured, for trial. General Halleck has ordered that no Confederate prisoners are to be released on parole until further orders. This will not prevent the punishment of officers who are found guilty of attempting to incite the negroes to revolt.

The Federal war steamer, the Vanderbilt, has returned to New York after an unsuccessful cruise in search of the Alabama. She is forthwith to make another attempt. The Sacramento is to be despatched on the same errand.

There is another claimant on the attention of the Federal cruisers. The Confederate steamer Retribution has put in an appearance off St. Thomas, and has taken five seamen from the brig Gilmore Meredith, who, we are told, were quite willing to enter the Confederate service. The Retribution is very fast and armed with five guns.

A Federal gunboat has been destroyed by the batteries of Fort Hudson.

The steamer Columbia, which was captured by the Federals while attempting to run the blockade at Charleston about a year ago, and subsequently turned into a vessel of war, grounded off the North Carolina coast on the evening of the 14th. On the 16th she was captured by the Confederates; her commander, twelve officers, and twenty-eight men were taken prisoners.

The Signal Book, giving the keys to Howe's code, naval code, and merchants' code of signals, was in the Harriet Lane when she was taken by the Confederates.

On the 17th of January a vessel, supposed to be the steamer Huntress, with 400 bales of cotton on board, attempted unsuccessfully to get out of Charleston, and was burnt off the mouth of the Swash channel.

A resolution has been introduced into the Federal Senate, for granting letters of marque.

Private letters from New Orleans state that Mr. P. N. Wood, the President of the Merchants' Bank, died lately at Canton, Mississippi; and that Mr. Davis, President of the Orleans Bank, has been released by General Banks, but that his mind has given way from the effects of his rigorous confinement.

Not having quite work enough on hand, some people in the North desire to pick a quarrel with France. In the Federal Senate, on the 19th January, Mr. McDougal (Democrat) offered the following concurrent resolutions:—

Resolved, That the present attempt by the French Government to subjugate the republic of Mexico to her authority by armed force is a violation of the established rules of international law, and that it is, moreover, a violation of the faith of France, pledged by the treaty made at London on the 31st of October, 1861, between the allied Governments of Spain, France, and England, and communicated to this Government over the signatures of the representatives of the allied Powers by the letter of the 30th of November, 1861, and particularly and repeatedly assured to this Government through its Minister resident at the Court of France.

Resolved further, That the attempt to subject the republic of Mexico to French authority is an act not merely unfriendly to this republic, but to free institutions everywhere, and is regarded as not only unfriendly, but as hostile.

Resolved, further, That it is the duty of this republic to require of the Government of France that her armed forces should be withdrawn from the territory of Mexico.

Resolved, further, That it is the duty and proper office of this republic now, and at all times, to lend such aid to the republic of Mexico as is or may be required to prevent the forcible interposition of any of the States of Europe in the political affairs of that republic.

Resolved, further, That the President of the United States causes to be communicated to the Government of Mexico the views now expressed by the two Houses of Congress, and that he be further requested to cause to be negotiated such a treaty or treaties between the two republics as will tend to make these views effective.

On the motion of Mr. McDougal the resolutions were laid over.

The Federal press generally approves the resolutions, but thinks the moment inopportune for their introduction, and that it is not possible to carry them out.

Mr. Lincoln has approved the bill to issue $100,000,000 in green backs, for the payment of arrears to the soldiers and sailors, and took the opportunity of sending a message to Congress deprecating the issue of so much United States' paper. The burden of the message was to advise the members to accept the proposal of Mr. Chase. We will not trouble our readers with the whole of this message, but content ourselves with giving the description given of its reception:—

As the reading of the document proceeded, curiosity gave place to astonishment. The recommendation to Congress to adopt Secretary Chase's banking scheme provoked laughter over most of the House. Mr. Washburne's motion to refer the message to a special committee was speedily laid on the table by a vote of 62 to 20. While thus placing the document where the House could handle it to-morrow, the expression of irritation at what was called the interference and dictation of the President was very general. The message fell on a very thin Senate. The printing of it was refused by the few members present, and the adjournment took place in a greater and more general expression of resentment at what a distinguished senator called the President's growing habit of returning Bills with his signature, accompanied with lectures to Congress for having passed them.

No financial scheme has been adopted. Mr. Chase's plan being rejected, a bill has been promoted for raising $900,000,000 by twenty year six per cent. loans, $300,000,000 by three year six per cent. Treasury notes, and a further issue of $300,000,000 legal tender notes.

Gold after receding to forty-six per cent., was, on the 24th of January, fifty per cent. premium.

At a Democratic meeting at Fort Lee, New Jersey, on the 8th instant, ex-Governor Price said: "The Union is broken, and the States must fall back into the original elements, the same as before the Constitution was adopted." He added "If the Southern States are willing to come back, New Jersey will say to them: 'Come back; you shall have all the guarantees you had before, and if you want more for the institutions in your respective States, you shall have them.'" Mr. T. D. English, a member elect of the State Legislature, was not less emphatic. He said: "If this war on the South continued much longer, he did not hesitate to say we would have war at the North—at our own hearthstones. If the Administration would not heed the lessons of the late elections—if they would persist in the violation of States and popular rights—the people would seek a remedy in the Constitution; but, if that should fail, they would turn upon them the mouths of their cannon and the points of their sabres!"

The Governor of New Jersey, in his Message to the Legislature, denounces the Emancipation Proclamation and the illegal arrests.

In the Federal House of Representatives Mr. Hardy, of Kentucky, denounced the Emancipation Proclamation. He said it was a war upon the Constitution. It was an assumption of despotic power. No State could be safe with such a power suspended over it. No stronger disunion document was ever issued. Those who approved it were ready to yield their liberty and confess themselves slaves.

Colonel Wall, who was elected United States' Senator from New Jersey, to fill a vacancy in the present Congress, was arrested by Mr. Stanton, several months ago, and confined in Fort Lafayette. He is the brother of the representative of Texas in the Provisional Confederate Congress, and is now a Brigadier-General in the Confederate army.

The New York Tribune urges the arming of every man, native or foreign, black or white, who will fight for the Union.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher is clamouring for a servile war. In an address written by him, in the Independent, occurs the following paragraph:—

Congress is in a dispute over a bill to arm and equip 150,000 negroes, to serve in the war. Let it stop the debate! The case is settled; the problem is solved; the argument is done. Let the recruiting-sergeants beat their drums! The next levy of troops must not be made in the North, but on the plantations. Marshal them into line by regiments and brigades! The men that have picked cotton must now pick flints! Gather the great third army! For two years the Government has been searching, in an enemy's country, for a path to victory: only the negro can find it! Give him a gun and bayonet, and let him point the way! The future is fair: God and the Negro are to save the republic!

The New York World remarks that if such brutal and profane words came from Bedlam they would be sufficiently disgusting, but that they are printed in a paper professedly religious. It is astonishing how closely irreligion and Northern abolitionism are united.

The New York State Assembly has not yet elected a Speaker, although there has been nineteen ballots. The excitement is very great. General Seymour had declined, on the recommendation of the Senate, to call out the militia unless requested to do so by the members of the House of Representatives. In order to make a diversion, the Republicans proposed a War-Democrat, but the compromise was rejected by the Democrats.

General Wool, appointed by the Federal Government to command the troops of New York and the New England States, finds his task anything but an easy one. He ordered the commanders of militia regiments to report to him. Some refused to do so, and General Hall, the commander of the militia, entered a rigorous protest against General Wool's proceedings. General Seymour has been officially informed of General Wool's interference in the affairs of the State. The matter caused great excitement.

General Fitz John Porter has been convicted of shameful disobedience to the orders of General Pope. The court sentenced him to be dismissed the service, and Mr. Lincoln has approved the finding. This decision has caused general surprise, and some of the papers consider it as another blow to the army.

General Hitchcock has publicly accused General McClellan of disobeying Mr. Lincoln's orders, and it is probable that McClellan may be tried by court martial. The Northern people appear to enjoy these trials, and they certainly lead to some amusing revelations.

The New York Herald, so far from endorsing the Republican condemnation of McClellan, recommends President Lincoln to place him at the head of the War Department.

The Hon. Geo. W. Randolph is the People's candidate for next Governor of Virginia.

Judge Holt died in Augusta on the 14th of January.

The Mexican Minister at Washington has complained to the Federal Government that he was refused permission to ship arms to a Mexican blockaded port, while it permitted the shipment of mules and waggons for the French in Mexico.

Mr. Seward replied that he did not recognize a state of war as existing between Mexico and the Allies, as there had been no declaration of war; therefore the United States could not govern their conduct by the rules of neutrals; but the prohibition to ship arms applied to all nations on the ground of the military necessities of the United States.

The Northern papers are filling their columns with extracts from intercepted despatches of the Confederate Government to its agents in Europe. The despatches are nearly all of old date, being duplicates of originals which had long since reached their destination, and contain little of importance at this juncture of affairs. The most interesting is one giving an account of a very foolish scheme, in the course of last autumn, on the part of the French Consul at Galveston, to detach Texas from the Confederation. The plot was neither very deep-laid, nor had progressed beyond the initiative steps when it was discovered, the Consul having applied directly to the Governor of Texas, and through an accomplice the French Vice-Consul at Richmond, to one of the Senators from that State. The result was that the would-be intriguers were, figuratively speaking, taken by the ear by the authorities to whom they had applied, and taken before the Confederate Secretary of State. The latter dismissed both the Consuls from the country, but afterwards recalled the sentence in the case of the Vice-Consul at Richmond, who appears to have been the lesser offender, and to have played only a very subordinate part. It is needless to say that the French Government had no part in the affair.

ENGLAND.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

The following is the paragraph relating to America:—

Her Majesty has abstained from taking any step with a view to induce a cessation of the conflict between the contending parties in the North American States, because it has not yet seemed to Her Majesty that any such overtures could be attended with a probability of success.

The apparent improvement of the condition of Lancashire does not proceed more rapidly than heretofore. The following is the variation in the amount of pauperism in the undermentioned 21 unions, on a comparison of the fourth with the third week of the present month. The total number of paupers in the third week of January in the section of unions marked (a) was 47,790; in the section (b) 28,190; and in the section (c) 170,760; together, 246,740. The aggregate population of these unions is 2,080,000.

(a) Five unions have more:—

	Paupers.		Paupers.
Chorley	250	Warrington ..	100
Chorlton	1,050
Liverpool	110	Total ..	1,630
Macclesfield ..	120

(b) Three unions are in respect of the amount of pauperism the same as in the previous week—Glossop, Preston (no return this week), Saddleworth.

(c) Thirteen unions have less:—

	Paupers.		Paupers.
Ashton-under-Lyne	830	Rochdale ..	180
Blackburn	540	Salford	400
Bolton	110	Stockport ..	400
Barnley	470	Todmorden ..	90
Bury	200	Wigan	70
Haslingden ..	290
Manchester ..	680	Total ..	4,920
Oldham	630

NET DECREASE IN THE PAUPERISM OF THE WHOLE DISTRICT.

To the end of December, 1862 ..	10,950
First week of January, 1863 ..	7,310
Second ditto	8,620
Third ditto	4,490
Fourth	3,390

The net decrease from the highest point attained in the following unions is, in respect of Ashton-under-Lyne, 6,450; Blackburn, 10,230 (of this number 6,000 were transferred to the local Relief Committee); Barnley, 3,460; Haslingden, 5,350; Oldham, 4,970; and Stockport, 4,880.

It is quite clear that a diminution in the numbers of the unemployed, which proceeds at so very slow a rate (about one to one and a quarter per cent. per week on the whole number out of work), affords no solid ground for any hope of a revival of trade. Indeed, it is plain to all who look to the statistics of the cotton market, or who consider the relative prices of calico and of cloth, that no such revival is possible while the American war continues.

Complaints are beginning to be made of waste and mismanagement in the distribution of the funds entrusted to the local committees. Such complaints must always occur, and must often be well-grounded, when a vast scheme of charitable relief has suddenly to be organized. The chief fault, in the present case, lies in the egotistical obstinacy of the Mansion-house Committee. Knowing nothing about the local affairs of Lancashire, and yet insisting on keeping in their own hands the apportionment of the funds they have collected, they have done everything in their power to thwart the efforts of the Central Executive Committee at Manchester to introduce order and economy into the system of distribution. Their defence is rested on two grounds; first, that the moneys in their hands were entrusted to them, and that they ought not to resign the trust; and secondly, that the local Committees have, in many cases, written to beg them not to hand over their funds to the executive in Manchester. There is not the slightest force in either excuse. Those who have sent their subscriptions to the Mansion-house have done so merely for convenience sake; no one knowing or caring anything about the composition of the Committee which sits there: while every one knows that the Manchester Executive comprises the ablest, most eminent, and best informed men in Lancashire of all classes, sects, and parties. And the reason why the Local Committees wish to retain the division of distributive agencies is plain enough—it serves to emancipate them from effective control and supervision. The waste and confusion at Ashton is due solely to the Mansion-house Committee, which persists in supporting there a local faction of no repute or influence, which has chosen to set up a rivalry to the Relief Committee composed of the leading men of the town, and acknowledged by the Executive at Manchester. We believe that the chief merchants, manufacturers, and gentlemen of Lancashire would be almost unanimous in the wish that the Mansion-house Committee would resign functions which it cannot possibly discharge with efficiency.

The Central Executive Committee held their usual meeting on Monday, in the Manchester Town-hall. It was announced that the George Griswold was bringing at least 10,000 barrels of flour from New York. Mr. Farnell read his report, of which the following is an extract:—

Your Committee may have observed a statement in the Times of last Saturday that imposition had been discovered by a local Committee in Manchester, which resulted in 250 pensioners taking their names off the relief list, and you may also have observed that a compiler of reports of the Times, headed "Notices," collects from every source and republishes all information similar to that to which I have alluded. These proceedings are calculated to lead the benevolent subscribers to your funds to the conclusion that their money is not carefully disbursed, and I therefore take this opportunity of assuring the public that there are upwards of 140 Local Committees earnestly at work in the cotton manufacturing districts; that these Committees are composed of some of the best men in each locality; that, in conjunction with the Guardians of the poor, they are feeding and clothing with economy and care upwards of 430,000 persons; and that, to my knowledge, the conduct of those persons has been conspicuous, not only for fortitude, but for honesty, and that cases of imposition have been in an extraordinary degree rare. I have considered it my duty to point out to the secretary to the Lord Mayor of London that circumstances in connection with relief in the township of Ashton-under-Lyne have been officially reported to your Committee, clearly establishing the conclusion that it is inexpedient to support two Committees for the distribution of charity in that township; and that it will be impracticable to maintain a sound local administration of relief while two Local Committees are distributing charitable funds there without co-operation or mutual understanding. Information has reached me which now enables me to state that the following 12 Unions are in a position to avail themselves of the provisions of the 25th and 26th of Victoria, cap. 110, viz.:—In the county of Lancaster: Blackburn, Burnley, Bury, Haslingden, Oldham, Preston, Rochdale, Salford, and Todmorden. In the county of Chester: Ashton-under-Lyne and Stockport. In the county of Derby: Glossop.

A discussion took place, in which the opinion was generally expressed that the present improvement in trade would not last long, and that very soon numbers of workmen in the trades indirectly dependent on cotton—engineers and so forth—would come upon the relief funds.

What is called by the Daily News and the Morning Star a great demonstration in favour of negro emancipation, and of President Lincoln's policy, took place on Thursday night at Exeter Hall. The old farce of "The People of England; or, The Three Tailors of Tooley Street," was reproduced on that occasion, in a place generally destined to more solemn purposes. The parts of the three tailors were taken by the Rev. Baptist Noel, Dr. Newman Hall, and Mr. Ludlow—(did any of our readers ever hear of any of these gentlemen before?)—while, for this occasion only, a fourth tailor made his appearance, in the person of the eccentric Member for Leicester. Mr. Thomas Hughes, the author of a rather clever school-boy story, and formerly eminent as a supporter of trades-unions, and trades-union murders, also rendered his valuable assistance, and the audience were kind enough, in compassion to the weakness and inexperience of these good-natured amateurs, not to hiss them off the stage. But it was fully understood that the performance was not to be repeated, and the critiques of the press the next day were exceedingly severe. Mr. Forster also spoke at Bradford in defence of his Northern friends—as well as a man could speak in so hopeless a cause. He thought that Mr. Lincoln ought to have gone further, and declared the country in a state of revolution, law and constitutional forms at an end, and abolition a military necessity throughout the Union. We agree in part with Mr. Forster. This would have been more consistent, and not more criminal, than the course which Mr. Lincoln has actually pursued. It would, however, have been necessary, in order to the effectual working of such an edict, to raise 200,000 men to occupy the Border Slave States; and this Mr. Lincoln is not in a position to do.

At a meeting held at Rochdale, to return thanks for the paltry contribution of New York towards the relief of the distress which the criminal insanity of the Northern States has inflicted upon Lancashire, Mr. Bright delivered a furious speech against the South. He affirmed that it had kept back cotton in order to injure England, and drive her to break the blockade. He said that that which the South had seceded from the United States to maintain was felony by our law. They were not only slave owners, slave buyers and sellers, but that which out of Pandemonium itself never was conceived of,—they were slave breeders for a slave market. He regretted more than he could express this painful fact, that of all the countries of Europe, England was the only one which had men in it willing to take active steps in favour of this intimidating slave Government.

Slavery is not felony by our law; it simply cannot exist in England. And it did exist, when Mr. Bright was a young man, in English colonies. The rest of his choice epithets may be left to answer themselves—we have simply to record that once more Mr. Bright has proved himself incapable of truth and contemptuous of decency.

Mr. F. Peel, one of the subordinate members of the present Ministry, addressed his constituents at Bury on Tuesday last. He admitted that the Government would have to stand on the defensive in regard to their American policy. In respect to their refusal to mediate, the burden of proof would be with them, and he believed they would be able to show that the offer of mediation would have certainly been rejected, and have done no good. The North complained rather of the English people than of the Government. They complained that we had no sympathy with their desire to abolish slavery. The answer to that complaint was that they had no such desire; that they wished to use the offer of emancipation only as a weapon of offence, and that their object was not to free the blacks, but to ruin the white men of the Southern States. With such a feeling Englishmen could have no sympathy.

The British Minister in China has sent home an address to Lord Russell, signed by several of the leading British firms in the Celestial Empire, complaining of restrictions imposed upon the rights to which they consider themselves entitled under the treaty concluded by Lord Elgin. They affirm that that treaty gave them the right of trading freely at any point on the Yangtze-kiang River; whereas the Chinese Government desires to limit them to the three consular ports thereon, and further, to establish custom-houses at each of these ports, instead of only at the mouth of the river; an arrangement inconvenient to trade and unprofitable to the revenue. Further, they complain that the treaty entitled them to buy land, rent houses, and settle in the interior; which they are forbidden to do by the Chinese, supported by our Ambassador at Peking. They assert that the object of the Chinese officials is to keep the inland trade in the hands of natives, who must submit to extortion; and request the Government to enforce their treaty rights to the letter. It is to be hoped that Lord Russell will think twice, before adding to the manifold troubles and difficulties which beset the Regency that governs in the name of the infant "Brother of the Sun and Moon."

Lord Russell has given a new proof of that gentleness towards the weak and firmness towards the strong which so eminently distinguish his foreign policy. He has endured with patience the affronts put upon him by the United States, and has nobly forborne to resent the outrages committed against British subjects and British vessels by their commanders at sea and their officials on shore, in consideration for their weakness and insignificance. But how differently he treats the great and powerful empire of Brazil. A few wreckers on the coast near Rio de Janeiro are said to have plundered some British seamen. Instantly amends are required; pecuniary compensation for the sufferers, punishment for the Brazilian officers who ought to have prevented the outrage. The Imperial Government resists the demand; on which five merchantmen in the port of Rio are immediately seized by the English commander there, and not released until the Government of Brazil agrees to make reparation for the alleged injury, leaving the details of that reparation to be settled by the King of the Belgians. Circumstances alter cases. Of course Lord Russell would have treated France as he has treated Brazil, and Denmark as he has treated the United States.

The Marquis of Lansdowne, one of the most eminent of the Whig party in the House of Commons during the Napoleonic wars, and afterwards, though never in the highest offices, and never prominent as a political partisan, the acknowledged chief of the Whig aristocracy, died on Saturday last, at the age of eighty-two. He held a seat in the Cabinet, though without office so lately as March 1858.

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—The address voted by the Senate in answer to the Imperial speech is somewhat less favourable to Italy, and more open in its expressions of support to the Pope, than the Emperor's speech. but it has passed with only one dissentient vote—that of Prince Napoleon. At a recent ball at the Tuileries, his Imperial Highness was also absent; marking thereby his disapproval of the reception given by the Empress to a number of Neapolitan refugees. The Italian Minister also absented himself.

M. de Montalembert having been attacked in the Journal des Debats as the author of the Pope's misfortunes, wrote to protest against so unreasonable an accusation. After an interval of silence, the editor refused to insert his letter, conveying his refusal in such form as to imply that he acted under compulsion from above. Able as M. de Montalembert is, the bitterest things he could say would not do the French Government a tithe of the damage it receives from such acts as this.

The Times correspondent does not think that the Emperor anticipates any success from his proposal lately conveyed to the Government at Washington. It is said to be merely intended to pave the way for more effective action.

GERMANY.—The Prussian Chamber has debated and voted the address of the Liberal majority, reflecting very severely on the Ministry. M. von Bismark-Schönhausen asserted in vain that the Chamber was trespassing on the Royal prerogative, and endeavouring to arrogate to itself the command of the army, to which it has no manner of right. There is, of course, some truth in the assertion. It is beyond doubt that the refusal of the Chamber to vote the Ministerial budget of 1862 did not rest simply on financial grounds. They disapproved the Royal plan for the military organization of the country, and therefore refused to vote the funds required. M. Bismark's error lies in his inability to perceive that this must inevitably be the case; that those who hold the national purse must inevitably rule the country. If the King is not prepared, as his Ministers declare that he is not, to accept this conclusion, he must either alter the Constitution or abdicate. At present he is in no yielding temper; he has gone so far as to refuse to allow the address to be presented by a deputation from the Chamber. It will therefore be forwarded to him in the form of a letter. Some members of the Herrenhaus are trying to effect a compromise.

DENMARK.—At a dinner given by the King, on the occasion of the fifteenth anniversary of his accession, the Prince Christian, father of the future Queen of England, gave "His Majesty's health," in a speech expressive of the strongest feelings of loyalty and patriotism; feelings stimulated to unusual warmth by the menaces and aggressions of the German Confederation.

The Estates of Holstein have met, and the measures which have passed, or are to pass, the Danish Parliament have been submitted to them by a Royal Commissioner. The Estates are about as loyal to their King as the Ionian Senate to the protecting Power; and the authority exacted for them by the Confederation will, of course, be used only to annoy and thwart the Danish Government.

POLAND.—The Polish insurrection assumes more and more formidable dimensions. We have none but Russian accounts, but they all represent the insurgents as gaining strength and receiving recruits from the better classes of society, and in despite of the evident desire to deprecate the importance of the outbreak, it is plainly a very serious one. It appears that considerable numbers of refugees from the conscription have crossed the frontier, while in some cases conscripts have been released by the insurgents. So far as we can judge from the telegraphic statements, the enforcement of a conscription by selection appears to have driven the Polish nation generally to despair; and though Warsaw wisely and patriotically submitted, in the first instance, the rest of the country has not had the endurance to follow so magnanimous an example. The insurrection once commenced, thousands who see its utter hopelessness will probably be induced to join it. Encounters have taken place between the Poles and the Russian troops, in some of which the latter have been worsted. Everything betokens the probability of a wide-spread and desperate struggle. The clergy are said to be the chief instigators of the rebellion.

The telegraph announces anarchical conspiracies and insurrections in Greece, which are not likely finally to disappear until a king is elected. It is also announced that the Duke of Coburg is willing to become a candidate for the crown, nominating his nephew, the Prince of Coburg-Kohary, who is to adopt the Greek faith, as his heir. It is thought that the proposal may prove satisfactory to the Greeks.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Feb. 4.

Our last report closed on a dull market with Fair Dhollerahs at 17½d., and Middling Orleans, 23½d.

The cause of the depression then existing, was mainly the unfavourable aspect of the money market; a further rise in the Bank minimum of one per cent. had just taken place, and fears were generally entertained that this step would not be sufficient to check the efflux of bullion, and that another rise was imminent. Under this adverse influence, holders became very anxious sellers, and on Friday with sales of 3000 bales some very low prices were accepted. Fair Dhollerahs being sold at 16½d., and Middling American from 21d. to 22d. The greatness of the decline, together with a more hopeful view regarding the course of our Money Market, led to a better demand on Saturday, the sales reaching 5000 bales at rather higher rates.

On Monday, India telegrams were to hand, reporting a rise in goods of from 6d. to 1s. per piece, which served to maintain the better feeling, and with sales of 5000 bales, prices were steady on the basis of 17d. for Fair Dhollerahs.

On Tuesday the sales reached 6000 bales without change.

The Manchester market had, in sympathy with our own exhibited more activity, and the depression of the previous week had disappeared, but very little business was transacted, with almost no buying for foreign markets, the margin between India and Manchester being still too great to create an export demand for that quarter.

Our market to-day has not exhibited so much tone, and we close with more disposition to sell than was apparent yesterday. The sales reach 5000 bales, and we quote Fair Dhollerahs and Omrawattec 17d. Fair Broach 17½, and Middling Orleans 22½d.

The American news, though interesting in detail, contains no item of special importance. The premium on gold, by latest advices, had reached 50 per cent., while cotton had run up to 76 cents. Though the Army of the Potomac had left its quarters, the river still separated the two armies, and a battle was soon expected. As the time of the Federal nine-months' recruits had almost expired, it was thought that Mr. Lincoln would force all his available forces into action, and before long we may hear of severe fighting in Virginia, Tennessee, and the Mississippi.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, February 3.

The advance in the rate of discount to five per cent. on Wednesday last, and the downward tendency of the Liverpool cotton marked from day to day, have produced such a depressing effect on our yarn and cloth market, that next to no business has been done at all in consequence.

Yarns for export and those suitable for the home manufacturers have been quite neglected, still such is the firmness of holders, that no material concession would be made, in the case of offers, at lower rates than those of the week previous.

Cloths are in the same category, neither buyers nor sellers caring to operate for the present.

To-day there has been a better tone imparted to the market generally, owing to better telegrams from Calcutta and Bombay, with dates of 10th and 11th of January, respectively, those from the former place advising an advance of from 9d. to 1s. per piece on shirtings, and from 1½d. to 2d. per lb. on yarns, and those from the latter place advising an advance of from 6d. to 9d. per piece on shirtings during the fortnight.

There were some buyers in the market for India shirtings who offered 2s. per lb., but no sales were effected. Some few yarn agents disposed of a little, 32s. and 40s. twist cops to the home manufacturers at 2s. and 2s. 3d. per lb. respectively, still the market has been altogether unsatisfactory.

PRIVATE LETTER.

Extract of a letter from a young lady in Richmond, Virginia, to a near relative now in London, dated Richmond, December 14, 1862.

I have written you one letter to-night, my dear —, but shall begin another to go by a gentleman who will leave here on Tuesday. I shall, I know, have a busy day to-morrow, and shall not be able to send you a letter, unless it is written to-night. Mr. —, who will give you this, we have seen frequently during the last few months, although we have not known him very well, yet I have heard him spoken of in the kindest terms by —, and by all those who know him; I doubt not he will give you an interesting account of everything in this country. The city is filled with refugees, who must be provided for. You have probably been informed that every one has been compelled to leave Fredericksburg, many of them have come here, and very many have found shelter in the little country houses, and even in the churches, on the road between here and there. Gentlemen who have come from the army tell me they saw, everywhere on the road, ladies handsomely dressed standing at the doors of the poorest little cabins. It is a sad condition—hundreds of families compelled to crowd together into Richmond, and to seek an asylum in all manner of remote country villages. We are obliged to practice great economy, neither mother, —, or I have bought a dress or bonnet this winter, but have brushed up our old ones. We have been wanting to get homespun dresses, but have not yet succeeded, except in getting one dress for —, as it is scarce, and so expensive. — wears her homespun cotton on all occasions, and it is much admired; she bought it from an old woman in North Carolina. But this scarcity is felt most keenly by our soldiers, many of whom are without blankets. A day or two ago, I received a letter from Colonel —, telling me he had in his command 200 men who had not a single blanket, and they were living in tents, and the ground was covered with snow. Colonel — is the son-in-law of your friend Mr. —, and was the captain of the company of Marylanders to whom — presented a flag a year ago. I knew him last winter in Winchester, and was then instrumental in having uniforms made for his men. He is now in Giles county, Virginia, and wrote me a very good letter describing the sufferings of his men, and saying he had been unable to get any blankets, and determined to appeal to me for aid, hoping I could get blankets or carpets from some of the societies for aiding the soldiers. I took the letter to Mrs. —, who is always interested in these matters and has told me always to apply to her when I want assistance—she is, moreover, on very intimate terms with Colonel —, the Quartermaster-General. So I asked her to go with me to see Colonel —, which she did. I showed him the letter, and urged the case so strongly that he promised to make every effort to give me the blankets; but the following day I had a note from him saying he had not a single blanket in his department. I then took Colonel —'s letter and Colonel —'s note, and went to see two of the ministers of the largest Episcopal churches, and asked for the carpets from the churches, or for some assistance in collecting blankets; the consequence was, the clergy had a consultation yesterday as to the best mode of obtaining the supply required, and this morning appeals were made from the pulpits for donations of blankets or of carpets; a place was appointed for receiving such donations, and a meeting requested to-morrow of the ladies to cut the carpets into the right sizes and shapes, and to line them with cotton in order to increase their warmth. I also went to see Mr. —, who is the president of the Young Men's Christian Association, which is doing an immense amount of good, and obtained the promise of cotton enough to line the carpets, and made all necessary arrangements for having them packed and sent to Colonel —. All this sort of work requires no little energy and perseverance, and my courage sometimes fails me when I find myself taking so prominent a position, and going about very often alone, to see those whose assistance is necessary and who are yet strangers to me; but I shall be rewarded when I succeed, as I do not doubt I shall, in providing for the wants of these soldiers, who are now suffering so severely. I have never yet failed in any scheme I have undertaken for the soldiers, either in the field or in the hospitals, and I am always engaged in some such enterprise. My only trouble is to avoid neglecting my home duties. . . . I have been trying the experiment of sending you the newspapers, but fear the type is so bad you will not be able to read them after they have had a sea voyage. I have said nothing of the battle going on near Fredericksburg, because we know little more than the fact; and I have written you another long letter to-night to go by Mr. —, and in that I told you all I knew. May God bless and preserve you, ever prays,

Foreign Correspondence.

PARIS, February 3.

Some surprise is felt here that the latest telegrams from the States make no mention of the despatch of M. Drouyn de Lhuys, which must have reached Washington before the departure of the Africa. I leave you to imagine what impression has been produced at finding, instead of the grateful acknowledgments which the French Government conceives itself entitled to, resolutions introduced into the Senate denouncing the expedition to Mexico.

If this be a symptom of public feeling in the North, there is little doubt of the non-acceptance of the advice tendered by M. Drouyn de Lhuys with so much delicate forbearance. In the event of such being the case, I have reason to believe that the recognition of the South is contemplated. This is not a mere idle assertion, it does not originate from the "wish that is the father to the thought." The statement is deliberately made by the Independence Belge, which is generally considered the mouth-piece of the French Foreign Office; the Independence not only affirms that the Confederate States are to be recognized if the Northern Cabinet refuses to negotiate on any terms, but that the sham blockade which has been respected with an ostentatious show of neutrality, is to be pronounced as non-effective, and therefore null and void by the French court. Upwards of a year ago that was the conclusion arrived at by M. Hautefeuille, one of the most eminent jurists in France, and there is every reason to hope that his opinion will be acted on.

The debate on the address in the French Senate was a mere formality, gone through on au galop, with no other feature than a speech by M. Thouvenel, some amusing abuse of England by M. de Boissy (the husband of the lady described some hat irreverently by one of your contemporaries, as "la Guiccioli," and a silent and solitary negative vote of Prince Napoleon, who thus enjoyed the honours of forming a minority of one. M. Thouvenel, though he spoke against the address, had not the courage to accompany into the lobby the Prince, whose views he professed to share. It is remarked that in replying to the address which was presented to him last Sunday, the Emperor treated the adverse vote of his cousin as utterly unimportant, and pointedly dwelt on the unanimity of the Senators! In the Corps Legislatif the cause of debate, which commences to-morrow, is not likely to run smooth. Messrs. Jules Favre, and Ollivier, have given notice of amendments to the address which evidently mean mischief. They protest against the constant avertissements given to the papers, and denounce the hypocrisy of following up liberal professions by arbitrary acts; they protest against the Mexican expedition as rash, ill-defined, adventurous, and utterly uncalled for, either by the honour or the interest of France. They then proceed to condemn the course pursued by the Government in the Roman question, and with regard to the elections.

Prince Napoleon and the Imperial party are once more at war. The Trojan war, Hesiod tells us, rose out of the Goddess of Discord not being asked to the wedding feast of Pelpos and Thetys. The feud between the Tuileries and the Palais Royal has its source in a couple of dozen Neapolitan refugees being invited to the soirée dansantes, given by the Empress every Monday. The Italian Legation were the first to hear of it, and every member of it sent notes apologizing for their non-attendance on the score of indisposition, but ostentatiously paraded at the Opera the same evening. Prince Napoleon first vented his wrath upon the Chamberlain (Duke de Bassano), and to mark his displeasure went to dine with Princess Clotilde in the public room at the Trois Freres. The court party gives out that no offence was intended, but they are so decidedly in the wrong, that it is believed the Tuileries will make amende honorabile, and that the Neapolitans will henceforth be excluded.

In spite of the subscriptions universally got up, and the aid afforded by the Government, the most harrowing distress continues to prevail among the operatives in the cotton districts. It is given out, but I can hardly believe it to be true, that the English workmen at Rouen, who are numerous, have been excluded by the French Committees from any share in the bounty, with the distribution of which they are entrusted. However that may be, the relief as yet is wholly insufficient, and the sufferings are none the less from its being carefully kept out of sight by most of the papers, which seem to think that their first brief mention of it was sufficient. The general distress does not, however, in any way affect the gaieties of the Parisian season, especially in the official world. There is a great ball to-morrow at the Tuileries; a dance on Thursday at M. de Persigny's; a fancy ball on Saturday at the Foreign Office; a dance on Monday next at the Tuileries; a fancy ball on the 11th at the Austrian Embassy, and another on the 14th at Count Walewski's. These balls are good things in themselves, inasmuch as they promote trade of a certain kind, but truth compels me to state that they are not favourably viewed by the general public.

No Paris paper has been warned or suppressed since I last addressed you—but English residents here complain that for the last five weeks they have not seen the Saturday Review.

Marshal Pelissier (Governor-General of Algeria) has given an avertissement to L'Echo d'Oran, and a Martinique paper, the Propagateur has been suspended for two months. In spite of this, M. Peyrat, an able writer, but an ardent republican, has dit-on, by dint of perseverance, obtained the requisite authorisation to start a new paper.

The French Government has granted a sum of 87,000,000 francs for the working of the silver and gold mines in Mexico. In addition a brigade of "miners" (not sappers and miners) is being formed to accompany the army, and there is a report that the district of Guaxa is to be "occupied" permanently, so as to defray the costs of the expedition.

THE SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE PRESIDENT OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO CONGRESS.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Confederate States.

At the date of your last adjournment the preparations of the enemy for further hostilities had assumed so menacing an aspect as to excite in some minds apprehension of our ability to meet them with sufficient promptness to avoid serious reverses. These preparations were completed shortly after your departure from the seat of Government, and the armies of the United States made simultaneous advances on our frontiers on the Western rivers and on the Atlantic coast in masses so great as to evince their hope of overbearing all resistance by mere weight of numbers. This hope, however, like those previously entertained by our foe, vanished.

In Virginia, their fourth attempt at invasion by armies whose assured success was confidently predicted has met with decisive repulse. Our noble defenders, under the consummate leadership of their general, have again, at Fredericksburg, inflicted on the forces under General Burnside the like disastrous overthrow as had been previously suffered by the successive invading armies commanded by Generals McDowell, McClellan, and Pope.

In the West, obstinate battles have been fought with varied fortunes, marked by frightful carnage on both sides; but the enemy's hopes of decisive results have again been baffled, while at Vicksburg another formidable expedition has been repulsed with inconsiderable loss on our side, and severe damage to the assailing forces.

On the Atlantic coast the enemy has been unable to gain a footing beyond the protecting shelter of his fleets, and the city of Galveston has just been recovered by our forces, which succeeded, not only in the capture of the garrison, but of one of the enemy's vessels of war, which was carried by boarding parties from merchant river-steamers.

Our fortified positions have everywhere been much strengthened and improved, affording assurance of our ability to meet with success the utmost efforts of our enemies, in spite of the magnitude of their preparations for attack. A review of our history of the two years of our national existence affords ample cause for congratulation, and demands the most fervent expression of our thankfulness to the Almighty Father who has blessed our cause. We are justified in asserting, with a pride surely not unbecoming, that these Confederate States have added another to the lessons taught by history for the instruction of man, that they have afforded another example of the impossibility of subjugating a people determined to be free, and have demonstrated that no superiority of numbers or available resources can overcome the resistance offered by such valour in combat, such constancy under suffering, and such cheerful endurance of privation as have been conspicuously displayed by this people in the defence of their rights and liberties. The anticipations with which we entered into the contest have now ripened into a conviction, which is not only shared with us by the common opinion of neutral nations, but is evidently forcing itself upon our enemies themselves. If we but mark the history of the present year by resolute perseverance in the path we have hitherto pursued, by vigorous effort in the development of all our resources for defence, and by the continued exhibition of the same unflinching courage in our soldiers and able conduct in their leaders as have distinguished the past, we have every reason to expect that this will be the closing year of the war.

The war, which in its inception was waged for forcing us back into the Union, having failed to accomplish that purpose, passed into a second stage, into which it was attempted to conquer and rule these States as dependent provinces. Defeated in this second design, our enemies have evidently entered upon another, which can have no other purpose than revenge and thirst for blood and plunder of private property.

But, however implacable they may be, they can have neither the spirit nor the resources required for a fourth year of a struggle uncheered by any hope of success, kept alive solely for the indulgence of mercenary and wicked passions, and demanding so exhausting an expenditure of blood and money as has hitherto been imposed on their people. The advent of peace will be hailed with joy. Our desire for it has never been concealed. Our efforts to avoid the war, forced on us as it was by the lust of conquest and the insane passions of our foes, are known to mankind. But, earnest as has been our wish for peace, and great as have been our sacrifices and sufferings during the war, the determination of this people has, with each succeeding month, become more unalterably fixed to endure any sufferings and continue any sacrifices, however prolonged, until their right to self-government and the sovereignty and independence of these States shall have been triumphantly vindicated and firmly established.

In this connection the occasion seems not unsuitable for some reference to the relations between the Confederacy and the neutral Powers of Europe since the separation of these States from the former Union. Four of the States, now members of the Confederacy, were recognized by name as independent sovereignties in a treaty of peace concluded in the year 1783, with one of the two great maritime Powers of Western Europe, and had been prior to that period allies in war of the other. In the year 1778 they formed a union with nine other States under articles of Confederation. Dissatisfied with the Union, three of them—Virginia, Carolina, and Georgia—together with eight of the States now members of the United States, seceded from it in 1789, and these eleven seceding States formed a second Union, although by the terms of the Articles of Confederation express provision was made that the first Union should be perpetual. The right to secede, notwithstanding this provision, was never contested by the States from which they separated, nor made the subject of discussion with any third Power. When, at a later period, North Carolina seceded to that second Union, and when, still later, the other seven States, now members of this Confederacy, became also members of the same Union, it was upon the recognized footing of equal and independent sovereignties; nor had it then entered into the minds of men that sovereign States could be compelled by force to remain members of a confederation into which they had entered of their own free will, if at a subsequent period the defence of their safety and honour should, in their judgment, justify withdrawal.

The experience of the past had evinced the futility of any renunciation of such inherent rights, and accordingly the provision for perpetuity contained in the Articles of Confederation of 1788 was omitted in the Constitution of 1789. When, therefore, in 1861 eleven of the States again thought proper, for reasons satisfactory to themselves, to secede from the second Union, and to form a third one, under an amended Constitution, they exercised a right which, being inherent, required no justification to foreign nations, and which international law did not permit them to question. The usages of intercourse between nations do, however, require that official communication be made to friendly Powers of all organic changes in the constitution of States, and there was obvious propriety in giving assurance of our desire to continue amicable relations with all mankind.

It was under the influence of these considerations that your predecessors, the Provisional Government, took early measures for sending to Europe commissioners charged with the duty of visiting the capitals of the different Powers, and making arrangements for the opening of more formal diplomatic intercourse. Prior, however, to the arrival abroad of these commissioners, the United States had commenced hostilities against the Confederacy by despatching a secret expedition for the reinforcement of Fort Sumter, after an express promise to the contrary, and with a duplicity which has been fully unveiled in a former Message. They had also addressed communications to the different Cabinets of Europe, in which they assumed the attitude of being sovereign over this Confederacy, alleging that these independent States were in rebellion against the remaining States of the Union, and threatening Europe with manifestations of their displeasure, if it should treat the Confederate States as having an independent existence. It soon became known that these pretensions were not considered abroad to be as absurd as they were known to be at home, nor had Europe yet learned what reliance was to be placed in the official statements of the Cabinet of Washington. The delegation of power granted by these States to the Federal Government to represent them in foreign intercourse had led Europe into the grave error of supposing that their separate sovereignty and independence had been merged into one common sovereignty, and had ceased to have a distinct existence. Under the influence of this error, which all appeals to reason and historical fact were vainly used to dispel, our commissioners were met by the declaration that foreign Governments could not assume to judge between the conflicting representations of the two parties as to the true nature of their previous mutual relations. The Governments of Great Britain and France accordingly signified their determination to confine themselves to recognizing the self-evident fact of the existence of a war, and to maintaining a strict neutrality during its progress. Some of the other Powers of Europe pursued the same course of policy and it became apparent that by some understanding, express or tacit, Europe had decided to leave the initiative in all action touching the contest on this continent to the two Powers just named, who were recognized to have the largest interest involved, both by reason of proximity and of the extent and intimacy of their commercial relations with the States engaged in war.

It is manifest that the course of action adopted by Europe, while based on an apparent refusal to determine the question, or to side with either party, was in point of fact an actual decision against our rights and in favour of the groundless pretensions of the United States. It was a refusal to treat us as an independent Government. If we were independent States the refusal to entertain with us the same international intercourse as was maintained with our enemy was unjust and injurious in its effects, whatever may have been the motive which prompted it. Neither was it in accordance with the high moral obligations of that international code whose chief sanction is the conscience of sovereigns and the public opinion of mankind, that those eminent Powers should decline the performance of a duty peculiarly incumbent on them from any apprehension of the consequences to themselves. One immediate and necessary result of their declining the responsibility of a decision which must have been adverse to the extravagant pretensions of the United States was the prolongation of hostilities to which our enemies were thereby encouraged, and which have resulted in nothing but scenes of carnage and devastation on this continent, and of misery and suffering on the other, such as have scarcely a parallel in history. Had these Powers promptly admitted our right to be treated as all other independent nations, none can doubt that the moral effect of such action would have been to dispel the delusion under which the United States have persisted in their efforts to accomplish our subjugation.

To the continued hesitation of the same Powers in rendering this act of simple justice towards this Confederacy is still due the continuance of the calamities which mankind suffers from the interruption of its peaceful pursuits, both in the Old and the New World. There are other matters in which less than justice has been rendered to this people by neutral Europe, and undue advantage effected on the aggressors in a wicked war. At the inception of hostilities the inhabitants of the Confederacy were almost exclusively agriculturalists; those of the United States, to a great extent, mechanics and merchants. We had no commercial marine, while their merchant vessels covered the ocean. We were without a navy, while they had powerful fleets. The advantage which they possessed for inflicting injury on our coasts and harbours was thus counterbalanced in some measure by the exposure of their commerce to attack by private armed vessels.

It was known to Europe that within a very few years past the United States had peremptorily refused to accede to proposals for abolishing privateering, on the ground, as alleged by them, that nations owning powerful fleets, would thereby obtain undue advantage over those possessing inferior naval forces. Yet no sooner was war flagrant between the Confederacy and the United States than the maritime Powers of Europe issued orders prohibiting either party from bringing prizes into their ports. This prohibition, directed with apparent impartiality against both belligerents, was in reality effective against the Confederate States alone, for they alone could find a hostile commerce on the ocean. Merely nominal against the United States, the prohibition operated with intense severity on the Confederacy, by depriving it of the only means of maintaining, with some approach to equality, its struggle on the ocean against the crushing superiority of naval force possessed by its enemies. The value and efficiency of the weapon which was thus wrested from our grasp by the combined action of neutral European Powers, in favour of a nation which professes openly its intention of ravaging their commerce by privateers in any future war, is strikingly illustrated by the terror inspired among the commercial classes of the United States by a single cruiser of the Confederacy. One national steamer, commanded by officers and manned by a crew who are debared by the closure of neutral ports from the opportunity of causing captured vessels to be condemned in their favour as prizes, has sufficed to double the rates of marine insurance in northern ports, and consigned to forced inaction numbers of Northern vessels, in addition to the direct damage inflicted by captures at sea. How difficult, then, to over-estimate the effects that must have been produced by the hundreds of private armed vessels that would have swept the seas in pursuit of the commerce of our enemy if the means of disposing of their prizes had not been withheld by the action of neutral Europe.

But it is especially in relation to the so-called blockade of our coast that the policy of European Powers has been so shaped as to cause the greatest injury to the Confederacy, and to confer signal advantages on the United States. The importance of this subject requires some development. Prior to the year 1856 the principles regulating this subject were to be gathered from the writings of eminent publicists, the decisions of admiralty courts, international treaties, and the usages of nations. The uncertainty and doubt which prevailed in reference to the true rules of maritime law in time of war, resulting from the discordant and often conflicting principles announced from such varied and independent sources, had become a grievous evil to mankind. Whether a blockade was allowable against a port not invested by land as well as by sea, whether a blockade was valid by sea if the investing fleet was merely sufficient to render ingress to the blockaded port evidently dangerous, or whether it was further required for its legality that it should be sufficient really to prevent access, and numerous other similar questions, had remained doubtful and undecided. Animated by the highly honourable desire to put an end to differences of opinion between neutrals and belligerents, which may occasion serious difficulties, and even conflicts—I quote the official language—the five great Powers of Europe, together with Sardinia and Turkey, adopted, in 1856, the following solemn declaration of principles:—

Firstly—Privateering is and remains abolished.

Secondly—The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war.

Thirdly—Neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under an enemy's flag.

Fourthly—Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective; that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy.

Not only did this solemn declaration announce to the world the principles to which the signing Powers agreed to conform in future wars, but it contained a clause to which those Powers gave immediate effect, and which provided that the States, not parties to the Congress of Paris, should be invited to accede to the declaration. Under this invitation every independent State in Europe yielded its assent. At least, no instance is known to me of a refusal, and the United States, while declining to assent to the proposition which prohibited privateering, declared that the three remaining principles were in entire accordance with their own views of international law. No instance is known in history of the adoption of rules of public law under circumstances of like solemnity with like unanimity and pledging the faith of nations with sanctity so peculiar.

When, therefore, this Confederacy was formed, and when neutral Powers, while deferring action on its demand for admission into the family of nations, recognized it as a belligerent Power, Great Britain and France made informal proposals about the same time that their own rights as neutrals should be guaranteed by our acceding as belligerents to the declaration of principles made by the Congress of Paris. The request was addressed to our sense of justice, and, therefore, met immediate favourable response in the resolutions of the Provisional Congress of the 13th of August, 1861, by which all the principles announced by the Congress of Paris were adopted as the guide of our conduct during the war, with the sole exception of that relative to privateering. As the right to make use of privateers was one in which neutral nations had, as to the present war, no interest—as it was a right which the United States had refused to abandon, and which they remained at liberty to employ against us—as it was a right of which we were already in actual enjoyment, and which we could not be expected to renounce, flagrante bello, against an adversary possessing an overwhelming superiority of naval forces—it was reserved, with entire confidence that neutral nations could not fail to perceive that just reason existed for the reservation. Nor was this confidence misplaced; for the official documents published by the British Government, usually called blue-books, contain the expression of the satisfaction of that Government with the conduct of the officials who conducted successfully the delicate business confided to their charge.

These solemn declarations of principle—this implied agreement between the Confederacy and the two Powers just named—have been suffered to remain inoperative against the menaces and outrages on neutral rights committed by the United States with unceasing and progressing arrogance during the whole period of the war. Neutral Europe remained passive when the United States—with a naval force insufficient to blockade effectively the coast of a single State—proclaimed a paper blockade of thousands of miles of coast, extending from the Cape of the Chesapeake to those of Florida and to Key West, and encircling this Gulf of Mexico to the mouth of the Rio Grande. Compared with this monstrous pretension of the United States, the blockades known in history under the names of the Berlin and Milan decrees and the British Orders in Council, in the years 1806 and 1807, sink into insignificance. Yet those blockades were justified by the Powers that declared them on the sole ground that they were retaliatory; yet those blockades have since been condemned by the publicists of those very Powers as violations of international law; yet those blockades evoked angry remonstrances from neutral Powers, amongst which the United States were the most conspicuous; yet those blockades became the chief cause of the war between Great Britain and the United States in 1812; yet those blockades were one of the principal motives that led to the declaration of the Congress of Paris in 1856, in the fond hope of imposing an enduring check on the very abuse of maritime power which is now renewed by the United States in 1861 and 1862, under circumstances and with features of aggravated wrong without precedent in history.

The records of our State Department contain the evidence of the repeated and formal remonstrances made by this Government to neutral Powers against the recognition of this blockade. It has been shown by evidence not capable of contradiction, and which has been furnished in part by the officials of neutral nations, that the few ports of this Confederacy before which any naval forces at all have been stationed, have been invested so inefficiently that hundreds of entries have been effected into them since the declaration of the blockade; that our enemies have themselves admitted the inefficiency of their blockade in the most forcible manner by repeated official complaints of the sale to us of goods contraband of war—a sale which could not possibly affect their interests if their pretended blockade was sufficient really to prevent access to our coast; that they have gone farther, and have alleged their inability to render their paper blockade effective, as the excuse for the odious barbarity of destroying the entrance to one of our harbours by sinking vessels loaded with stone in the channel; that our commerce with foreign nations has been interrupted, not by the effective investment of our ports, or by the seizure of ships in the attempt to enter them, but by the capture on the high seas of neutral vessels by the cruisers of our enemies, whenever supposed to be bound to any point on our extensive coast, without inquiry whether a single blockading vessel was to be found at such point; that blockading vessels have left the ports at which they were stationed for distant expeditions, have been absent for many days, and have returned without notice either of the cessation or renewal of the blockade. In a word, that every prescription of maritime law and every right of neutral nations to trade with a belligerent under the sanction of principles heretofore universally respected have been systematically and persistently violated by the United States. Neutral Europe has received our remonstrance and has submitted in almost unbroken silence to all the wrongs that the United States have chosen to inflict on its commerce.

The Cabinet of Great Britain, however, has not confined itself to such implied acquiescence in these breaches of international law as results from simple inaction, but has, in a published despatch of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, assumed to make a change in the principle enunciated by the Congress of Paris, to which the faith of the British Government was considered to be pledged—a change too important and too prejudicial to the interests of the Confederacy to be overlooked, and against which I have directed solemn protests to be made, after a vain attempt to obtain satisfactory explanations from the British Government. In a published despatch from her Majesty's Foreign-office to her Minister at Washington, under date of February 11, 1862, occurs the following passage:—"Her Majesty's Government, however, are of opinion that, assuming that the blockade was duly notified, and also that a number of ships are stationed and remain at the entrance of a port sufficient really to prevent access to it, or to create an evident danger of entering it or leaving it, and that these ships do not voluntarily permit ingress or egress, the fact that various ships may have successfully escaped through it (as in the particular instance here referred to) will not of itself prevent the blockade from being an effectual one by international law."

The words which I have italicised are an addition made by the British Government of its own authority to a principle the exact terms of which were settled with deliberation by the common consent of civilised nations, and by implied convention with this Government, as already explained, and their effect is clearly to reopen, to the prejudice of the Confederacy, one of the very disputed questions on the law of blockade which the Congress of Paris professed to settle. The importance of this change is readily illustrated by taking one of our ports as an example. There is evident danger in entering the port of Wilmington from the presence of a blockading force; and by this test the blockade is effective. "Access is not really prevented" by the blockading fleet to the same port, for steamers are continually arriving and departing; so that, tried by this test, the blockade is ineffective and invalid. The justice of our complaint on this point is so manifest as to leave little room for doubt that further reflection will induce the British Government to give us such assurances as will efface the painful impression that would result from its language if left unexplained.

From the foregoing remarks you will perceive that during nearly two years of struggle, in which every energy of our country has been evoked for maintaining its very existence, the neutral nations of Europe have pursued a policy which, nominally impartial, has been practically most favourable to our enemies and most detrimental to us.

The exercise of the neutral right of refusing entry into their ports to prizes taken by both belligerents was eminently hurtful to the Confederacy. It was sternly asserted and maintained. The exercise of the neutral right of commerce with a belligerent whose ports are not blockaded by fleets sufficient really to prevent access to them would have been eminently hurtful to the United States. "It was complaisantly abandoned. The duty of neutral States to receive with cordiality and recognize with respect any new Confederation that independent States may think proper to form was too clear to admit of denial; but its postponement was obviously beneficial to the United States and detrimental to the Confederacy. It was postponed.

In this review of our relations with the neutral nations of Europe, it has been my purpose to point out distinctly that this Government has no complaint to make that those nations declared their neutrality. It could neither expect nor desire more. The complaint is that the neutrality has been rather nominal than real, and that recognized neutral rights have been alternately asserted and waived in such manner as to bear with great severity on us, and to confer signal advantages on our enemy.

I have hitherto refrained from calling your attention to this condition of our relations with foreign Powers for various reasons. The chief of these was the fear that a statement of our last grounds of complaint against a course of policy so injurious to our interests might be misconstrued into an appeal for aid. Unequal as we were in mere numbers and available resources to our enemies, we were conscious of powers of resistance in relation to which Europe was incredulous, and our remonstrances were therefore peculiarly liable to be misunderstood.

Proudly self-reliant, the Confederacy, knowing full well the character of the contest into which it was forced, with full trust in the superior qualities of its population, the superior valour of its soldiers, the superior skill of its generals, and above all, in the justice of its cause, felt no use to appeal for the maintenance of the rights to other earthly aids, and it began and has continued this struggle with the calm confidence ever inspired in those who, with consciousness of right, can invoke the Divine blessing on their cause. This confidence has been so assured that we have never yielded to despondency under defeat, nor do we feel undue elation at the present brighter prospect of a successful issue to our contest. It is therefore because our just grounds of complaint can no longer be misrepresented that I lay them clearly before you. It seems to me now proper to give you the information, and although no immediate results may be attained, it is well that truth should be preserved and recorded. It is well that those who are to follow us should understand the full nature and character of the tremendous conflict in which the blood of our people has been poured out like water, and in which we have resisted, unaided, the shocks of hosts which would have sufficed to overthrow many of the Powers which, by their hesitation in according our rights as an independent nation, imply doubt of our ability to maintain our national existence. It may be, too, that if in future unfriendly discussions not now anticipated shall unfortunately arise between this Confederacy and some European Power, the recollection of our forbearance under the grievances which I have enumerated may be evoked with happy influence in preventing any serious disturbance of peaceful relations.

It would not be proper to close my remarks on the subject of our foreign relations without adverting to the fact that the correspondence between the Cabinets of France, Great Britain, and Russia, recently published, indicates a gratifying advance in the appreciation by those Governments of the true interests of mankind, as involved in the war on this continent. It is to the enlightened ruler of the French nation that the public feeling of Europe is indebted for the first official exhibition of its sympathy for the sufferings endured by this people with so much heroism, of its horror at the awful carnage with which the progress of the war has been marked, and of its desire for a speedy peace. The clear and direct intimation contained in the language of the French note that our ability to maintain our independence has been fully established, was not controverted by the answer of either of the Cabinets to which it was addressed. It is indeed difficult to conceive a just ground for a longer delay on this subject, after reading the following statement of facts contained in the letter emanating from the Minister of his Imperial Majesty:—"There has been established from the very beginning of this war an equilibrium of forces between the belligerents which has since been almost constantly maintained; and after the spilling of so much blood they are to-day in this respect in a situation which has not sensibly changed. Nothing authorizes the anticipation that more decisive military operations will shortly occur. According to the last advices received in Europe the two armies were, on the contrary, in a condition which permitted neither to hope within a short delay advantages sufficiently marked to turn the balance definitely, and to accelerate the conclusion of peace." As this Government has never professed the intention of conquering the United States, but has simply asserted its ability to defend itself against being conquered by that Power, we may safely conclude that the claims of this Confederacy to its just place in the family of nations cannot long be withheld after so frank and formal an admission of its capacity to cope, on equal terms, with its aggressive foes, and to maintain itself against their attempts to obtain decisive results by arms.

It is my painful duty again to inform you of the renewed examples of every conceivable atrocity committed by the armed forces of the United States at different points within the Confederacy, and which must stamp indelible infamy, not only on the perpetrators, but on their superiors, who, having the power to check these outrages on humanity, numerous and well authenticated as they have been, have not yet in a single instance of which I am aware inflicted punishment on the wrongdoers. Since my last communication to you one General McNeil murdered seven prisoners of war in cold blood, and the demand for his punishment has remained unsatisfied. The Government of the United States, after promising examination and explanation in relation to the charges made against General Benjamin F. Butler, has by its subsequent silence after repeated efforts on my part to obtain some answer on the subject, not only admitted his guilt, but sanctioned it by acquiescence; and I have accordingly branded this criminal as an outlaw, and directed his execution in expiation of his crimes if he should fall into the hands of any of our forces.

Recently I have received apparently authentic intelligence of another general, by the name of Milroy, who has issued orders in Western Virginia for the payment of money to him by the inhabitants, accompanied by the most savage threats of shooting every recusant, besides burning his house, and threatening similar atrocities against any of our citizens who shall fail to betray their country by giving him prompt notice of the approach of any of our forces. And this subject has also been submitted to the superior military authorities of the United States, with but faint hope that they will evince any disapprobation of the act. Humanity shudders at the appalling atrocities which are being daily multiplied under the sanction of those who have obtained temporary possession of power in the United States, and who are fast making its once fair name a byword of reproach among civilized men. Not even the natural indignation inspired by this conduct should make us, however, so unjust as to attribute to the whole mass of the people who are subjected to the despotism that now reigns with unbridled license in the city of Washington a willing acquiescence in its conduct of the war. There must necessarily exist among our enemies very many, perhaps a majority, whose humanity recoils from all participation in such atrocities, but who cannot be held wholly guiltless while permitting their continuance without an effort at repression.

The public journals of the North have been received, containing a proclamation, dated on the first day of the present month, signed by the President of the United States, in which he orders and declares all slaves within ten of the States of the Confederacy to be free, except such as are found within certain districts now occupied in part by the armed forces of the enemy. We may well leave it to the instincts of that common humanity which a beneficent Creator has implanted in the breasts of our fellow-men of all countries to pass judgment on a measure by which several millions of human beings of an inferior race—peaceful and contented labourers in their sphere—are doomed to extermination, while at the same time they are encouraged to a general assassination of their masters by the insidious recommendation "to abstain from violence unless in necessary self-defence." Our own detestation of those who have attempted the most execrable measure recorded in the history of guilty man is tempered by profound contempt for the impotent rage which it discloses. So far as regards the action of this Government on such criminals as may attempt its execution, I confine myself to informing you that I shall—unless in your wisdom you deem some other course more expedient—deliver to the several States' authorities all commissioned officers of the United States that may hereafter be captured by our forces in any of the States embraced in the proclamation, that they may be dealt with in accordance with the laws of those States providing for the punishment of criminals engaged in exciting servile insurrection. The enlisted soldiers I shall continue to treat as unwilling instruments in the commission of these crimes, and shall direct their discharge and return to their homes on the proper and usual parole.

In its political aspect this measure possesses great significance, and to it in this light I invite your attention. It affords to our whole people the complete and crowning proof of the true nature of the designs of the party which elevated to power the present occupant of the presidential chair at Washington, and which sought to conceal its purposes by every variety of artful device, and by the perfidious use of the most solemn and repeated pledges on every possible occasion. I extract, in this connection, as a single example, the following declaration, made by President Lincoln under the solemnity of his oath as chief magistrate of the United States, on the 4th of March, 1861:—"Apprehension seems to exist among the people of the Southern States that by the accession of a Republican Administration their property and their peace and personal security are to be endangered. There has never been any reasonable cause for such apprehensions. Indeed, the most ample evidence to the contrary has all the while existed and been open to their inspection. It is found in nearly all the public speeches of him who now addresses you. I do but quote from one of those speeches when I declare that I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so. Those who nominated and elected me did so with full knowledge that I had made this and many similar declarations, and had never recanted them. And more than this, they placed in the platform for my acceptance, and as a law to themselves and to me, the clear and emphatic resolution which I now read:—"Resolved—That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends, and we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force of the soil of any State or territory, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest crimes."

Nor was this declaration of the want of power or disposition to interfere with our social system confined to a state of peace. Both before and after the actual commencement of hostilities the President of the United States repeated, in formal official communication to the Cabinets of England and France, that he was utterly without constitutional power to do the act which he has just committed; and that in no possible event, whether the secession of these States resulted in the establishment of a separate confederacy, or in the restoration of the Union, was there any authority by virtue of which he could either restore a disaffected State to the Union by force of arms, or make any change in any of its institutions. I refer especially for verification of this assertion to the despatches addressed by the Secretary of State of the United States, under direction of the President, to the Ministers of the United States at London and Paris, under date of 10th and 22d of April, 1861.

The people of this Confederacy, then, cannot fail to receive this proclamation as the fullest vindication of their own sagacity in foreseeing the uses to which the dominant party in the United States intended from the beginning to apply their power; nor can they cease to remember with devout thankfulness that it is to their own vigilance in resisting the first stealthy progress of approaching despotism that they owe their escape from consequences now apparent to the most sceptical.

This proclamation will have another salutary effect, in calming the fears of those who have constantly evinced the apprehension that this war might end by some reconstruction of the old Union, or some renewal of close political relations with the United States. These fears have never been shared by me, nor have I ever been able to perceive on what basis they could rest. But the proclamation affords the fullest guarantees of the impossibility of such a result. It has established a state of things which can lead to but one of three possible consequences—the extermination of the slaves, the exile of the whole white population of the Confederacy, or absolute and total separation of these States from the United States. This proclamation is also an authentic statement by the Government of the United States of its inability to subjugate the South by force of arms, and as such must be accepted by neutral nations, which can no longer find any justification in withholding our just claims to formal recognition. It is also in effect an intimation to the people of the North that they must prepare to submit to a separation, now become inevitable, for that people are too acute not to understand that a restitution of the Union has been rendered for ever impossible by the adoption of a measure which, from its very nature, neither admits of retraction nor can co-exist with union.

Among the subjects to which your attention will be specially devoted during the present session, you will, no doubt, deem the adoption of some comprehensive system of finance as being of paramount importance. The increasing public debt, the greater augmentation in the volume of the currency, with its necessary concomitant of extravagant prices for all articles of consumption, the want of revenue from a taxation adequate to support the public credit, all unite in admonishing us that energetic and wise legislation alone can prevent serious embarrassment in our monetary affairs. It is my conviction that the people of the Confederacy will freely meet taxation on a scale adequate to the maintenance of the public credit and the support of their Government. When each family is sending forth its most precious ones to meet exposure in camp and death in battle, what ground can there be to doubt the disposition to devote a tithe of its income, and more if more be necessary, to provide the Government with means for insuring the comfort of its defenders? If our enemies submit to an exchequer on every commodity they produce, and to the daily presence of the tax-gatherer, with no higher motive than the hope of success in their wicked designs against us, the suggestion of an unwillingness on the part of this people to submit to the taxation necessary for the success of their defence is an imputation on their patriotism that few will be disposed to make, and that none can justify.

The legislation of your last session, intended to hasten the funding of outstanding Treasury notes, has proved beneficial, as shown by the returns annexed to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury; but it was neither sufficiently prompt nor far reaching to meet the full extent of the evil. The passage of some enactment, carrying still further the policy of that law, by fixing a limitation not later than the 1st of July next to the delay allowed for funding the notes issued prior to the 1st of December, 1862, will, in the opinion of the Secretary, have the effect to withdraw from circulation nearly the entire sum issued previous to the last-named date. If to this be added a revenue from adequate taxation, and appropriation of bonds guaranteed proportionately by the seven per cents., as has already been generously proposed by some of them in enactments spontaneously adopted, there is little doubt that we shall see our finances restored to a sound and satisfactory condition, our circulation relieved of the redundancy now productive of so many mischiefs, and our credit placed on such a basis as to relieve us from further anxiety relative to our resources for the prosecution of the war.

It is true that at its close our debt will be large; but it will be due to our own people, and neither the interest nor the capital will be exported to distant countries, impoverishing ours for their benefit.

On the return of peace the untold wealth which will spring from our soil will render the burthen of taxation for less onerous than is now supposed, especially if we take into consideration that we shall then be free from the large and steady drain of our substance to which we were subjected in the late Union through the instrumentality of sectional legislation and protective tariffs. I recommend to your earnest attention the whole report of the Secretary of the Treasury on this important subject, and trust that your legislation on it will be delayed no longer than may be required to enable your wisdom to devise the proper measures for insuring the accomplishment of the objects proposed.

The operations of the War Department have been in the main satisfactory. In the report of the Secretary, herewith submitted, will be found a summary of many memorable successes. They are with justice ascribed in large measure to the reorganization and reinforcement of our armies under the operation of the enactments for conscription. The wisdom and efficacy of these acts have been approved by results, and the like spirit of unity, endurance, and self-devotion of the people which has hitherto sustained their action, must be relied on to assure their enforcement under the continuing necessities of our situation. The recommendations of the Secretary to this effect are tempered by suggestions for their amelioration, and the subject deserves the consideration of Congress.

For the perfection of our military organization no appropriate means should be rejected, and on this subject the opinions of the Secretary merit early attention. It is gratifying to perceive that under all the efforts and sacrifices of war, the power and means of the Confederacy for its successful prosecution are increasing. Dependence on foreign supplies is to be deplored, and should as far as practicable be obviated by the development and employment of internal resources. The peculiar circumstances of the country, however, render this difficult, and require extraordinary encouragements and facilities to be granted by the Government.

The embarrassments resulting from the limited capacity of the railroads to afford transportation, and the impossibility of otherwise commanding and distributing the necessary supplies for the armies, render necessary the control of the roads under some general supervision and resort to the power of impressment under military exigencies. While such powers have to be exercised, they should be guarded by judicious provisions against perversion or abuse, and be, as recommended by the Secretary, under due regulation of law.

I specially recommend in this connection some revision of the exemption-law of last session. Serious complaints have reached me of the inequality of its operation from eminent and patriotic citizens whose opinions merit great consideration, and I trust that some means will be devised for leaving at home a sufficient local police, without making discriminations, always to be deprecated, between different classes of our citizens.

Our relations with the Indians generally continue to be friendly. A portion of the Cherokee people have assumed an attitude hostile to the Confederate Government, but it is gratifying to be able to state that the mass of intelligence and worth in that nation have remained true and loyal to their treaty engagements. With this exception there have been no important instances of dissatisfaction among any of the friendly nations and tribes. Dissatisfaction recently manifested itself among certain portions of them; but this resulted from a misapprehension of the intentions of the Government in their behalf. This has been removed, and no further difficulty is anticipated.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy, herewith transmitted, exhibits the progress made in this branch of the public service since your adjournment as well as its present condition. The details embraced in it are of such a nature as to render it, in my opinion, incompatible with the public interests that they should be published with this Message. I therefore confine myself to inviting your attention to the information therein contained.

The report of the Postmaster-General shows that during the first postal year under our Government, terminating on the 30th of June last, our revenues were in excess of those received by the former Government in its last postal year, while the expenses were greatly decreased. There is still, however, a considerable deficit in the revenue of the department, as compared with its expenses, and, although the grants already made from the general treasury will suffice to cover all liabilities to the close of the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June next, I recommend some legislation, if any can be constitutionally devised, for aiding the revenues of that department during the ensuing fiscal year, in order to avoid too great a reduction of postal facilities. Your attention is also invited to numerous other improvements in the service recommended in the report, and for which legislation is required.

I recommend to the Congress to devise a proper mode of relief to those of our citizens whose property has been destroyed by order of the Government, in pursuance of a policy adopted as a means of national defence. It is true that full indemnity cannot now be made, but some measure of relief is due to those patriotic citizens who have borne private loss for the public good, whose property in effect has been taken for public use, though not directly appropriated. Our Government, born of the spirit of freedom and of the equality and independence of the States, could not have survived a selfish or jealous disposition, making each only careful of its own interest or safety.

The fate of the Confederacy, under the blessing of Divine Providence, depends upon the harmony, energy, and unity of the States. It especially devolves on you, their representatives, as far as practicable, to reform abuses, to correct errors, to cultivate fraternity, and to sustain in the people a just confidence in the Government of their choice. To that confidence and to the unity and self-sacrificing patriotism hitherto displayed is due the success which has marked the unequal contest, and has brought our country into a condition at the present time, such as the most sanguine would not have ventured to predict at the commencement of our struggle. Our armies are larger, better disciplined and more thoroughly armed and equipped than at any previous period of the war; the energies of a whole nation, devoted to the single object of success in this war, have accomplished marvels, and many of those trials have by a beneficent Providence been converted into blessings. The magnitude of perils which we encountered have developed the true qualities and illustrated the heroic character of our people, thus gaining for the Confederacy from its birth a just appreciation from the other nations of the earth. The injuries resulting from the interruption of foreign commerce have received compensation by the developments of our internal resources. Cannon crown our fortresses that were east from the proceeds of mines opened and furnaces built during the war. Our mountain caves yield much of the nitre for the manufacture of powder, and promise increase of product. From our own foundries and laboratories, from our own armouries and workshops, we derive, in a great measure, the warlike material, the ordnance and ordnance stores, which are expended so profusely in the numerous and desperate engagements that rapidly succeed each other. Cotton and woollen fabrics, shoes and harness, waggons and gun carriages, are produced in daily increasing quantities by the factories springing into existence. Our fields, no longer whitened by cotton that cannot be exported, are devoted to the production of cereals and the growth of stock formerly purchased with the proceeds of cotton. In the homes of our noble and devoted women—without whose sublime sacrifices our success would have been impossible—the noise of the loom and the spinning-wheel may be heard throughout the land.

With hearts swollen with gratitude, let us, then, join in returning thanks to God, and in beseeching the continuance of His protecting care over our cause, and the restoration of peace, with the manifold blessings to our beloved country.

Richmond, Jan. 12, 1863.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

THE ENGLISH PRESS ON THE EMANCIPATION SOCIETY.

(From the Times, January 31.)

No failure of the Federal politicians has been more complete than that which has attended their efforts to bring English sympathy to their side in a war of ambition, by appealing to the hatred of negro slavery which animates all classes in this country. A more striking condemnation of the recklessness and cruelty which have marked the conduct of the Republican party could not be given than the stern silence with which all that is intellectual, and cultivated, and humane in English society has received the pretensions of Mr. Lincoln to be the friend of the oppressed and the champion of civilization. His famous proclamation has been the subject of discussion among us ever since it was threatened in September last. Three weeks have elapsed since we have known that it was really issued. The English people, who have been of late singularly at a loss for topics of home interest, have thought it over and talked it over, and read all that a prolific press can say upon it, and the result is that they are confirmed in their first opinions, and refuse to be drawn by philanthropic pretences into sanctioning a measure of desperate and vindictive warfare. If the Federals have had any hopes of conquering European sympathy by hoisting the flag of servile war, such hopes must be blighted when they appreciate the temper in which this act has been received by the English people. We have waited that we might speak with certainty, and passing events give us the power of doing so.

It is well known that within the last few weeks great efforts have been made in this country to obtain demonstrations in favour of the Federal cause. It is said, probably with truth, that agents of the Northern Government, provided with funds from America, have been at work on the familiar business of agitation, in order to restore their discredited party at home by making it appear that English opinion supports them in their acts. But, wherever the agitators come from, they have been especially busy for the last two months. It has been promised that the real sentiments of Englishmen should at last be made known. If meetings could be organized, if the subject could be properly discussed, and public opinion set free from a press which misrepresented it, then America might see that the feelings and the judgment of the old country were with her in her noble crusade for the freedom of the negro. The result of the great movement was given in this journal yesterday. For weeks it has been announced that there was to be a "monster demonstration" in London in favour of the North. Provincial meetings had been already held, and had been most provokingly avoided by any one whose opinion was of the slightest importance. But in London better luck might be hoped for. This is a great metropolis, and on the 29th of January, a week before the meeting of Parliament, it must be full of persons of considerable eminence and of all shades of opinion. The most distinguished names of a country where freedom of thought is carried into eccentricity were sure to be within reach of the Emancipation Society's circulars and advertisements. What doubt, then, that an imposing meeting, attended by men of genius, of high attainments, of great social position, of political renown, would bear witness to the interest with which large and influential sections of English society follow the progress of Mr. Lincoln's policy? If even what is called the world—the frivolous, unthinking people who take their opinions from the press, who dislike Yankees for their pertness and boasting, and admire Lee and Jackson for their unexampled heroism,—if even jealous politicians or illiberal soldiers stood apart, surely there would be enough of the more original thinkers to fill a platform? More than this, in the centre of this great capital, with its hundreds of churches, in the neighbourhood of men who have spent their lives in advocating every charitable cause, it might have been thought that a meeting professedly in favour of negro emancipation would not have wanted names of eminence.

After weeks of preparation the meeting took place the day before yesterday. The speakers were a minor novelist and two or three Dissenting ministers, who seem to be of the usual intellectual calibre. Not one man who in opinion the country would listen to on any political subject—not one statesman, not one person endowed with genius, however self-willed and erratic; no representative of the Peerage, only one of the House of Commons, not one of the Church, of the gentry, or the commercial world, was found to stand on that platform and make himself responsible for Mr. Lincoln's proclamation. Of the eminent men who in past years have struggled, and will still struggle on for years to come, against oppression and evil-doing all over the world—of the philanthropists whose names are identified with this very phase of negro emancipation—there was not one who felt that he could in conscience come forward and encourage a ruthless invasion, and a still more hateful scheme of domestic warfare, by giving aid and comfort to Mr. Lincoln's tottering Cabinet. The persons we have alluded to were left alone to hold forth to the audience. What they said it is needless to comment upon, for it is quite in accord with their personal insignificance.

For our own part, we cannot but rejoice that there has been at length an organized attempt to evoke English opinion in favour of the war. It is well to know the full strength of one's own opinions, and to be able to calculate with certainty on the measure of assent which the world will give to them. That for two three months a number of men have been agitating to change the sentiments of Englishmen on this important subject, and that the result of the mountain's labour is the birth of a most ridiculous mouse, is especially satisfactory to us, who have for so long been labouring to promote a peaceful settlement of an unnatural quarrel. We now know that, in spite of importunity the most pertinacious and offensive, every man with a political character to lose has stood aloof from the Federal partisans in this country. Even the members for our populous boroughs, though their position often compels them to succumb to schemes of this kind, have in this case felt it necessary to their own dignity and the feelings of their respectable constituents to give a rebuff to the agitators. Happily, the situation of affairs in America is becoming such that the friends of peace in this country need fear no misrepresentations of the "Emancipation Society," or of the "wire-pullers," who stand behind it. While weak-minded men are congratulating President Lincoln from this side of the water, the public opinion of his own country is becoming every day more settled against him. The proclamation, by the confession of its authors, was intended to do two things—first, to conciliate European opinion; and, secondly, to terrify the South into submission. That the first object has not been attained we think is pretty clear, and the other, which is by far the more important, has been equally missed. Whatever may be the merits or faults of Mr. Lincoln's policy, his proclamation has had but one effect, and that is to make the Confederates more fierce and resolute than ever. When the last news left more than a fortnight had elapsed since the proclamation, and no sign of wavering had appeared at the South. The Confederates had opened the new year with a victory at Galveston, and at Vicksburg had inflicted on the Federals a defeat hardly less bloody, and quite as important as that of Fredericksburg. Two military disasters and a rise of gold to 50 premium are the first-fruits of the masterly document of the 2nd of January, and a still more important matter is the widespread anger of all but the Republican zealots. New York has spoken through Mr. Seymour, and now the Governor of Kentucky, a firm Unionist, and a man to whom the North is mainly indebted for keeping the State from secession, denounces the President and his schemes in a State paper which is certainly one of the most remarkable we have ever read. There are at last signs abroad that the bankruptcy of the North, the desolation of the South, and the ruin both of white man and negro will provoke some political reaction in the Federal States. At such a conjuncture it behoves us to stand aloof, and not to applaud assumptions of arbitrary power which are being sternly rebuked by the ablest men of the country where they have taken place.

(From the Morning Post, January 31.)

There seems to be a great tendency in a small but highly respectable section of our fellow-countrymen to run wild on the question of American slavery. The subject has lain dormant for some time, but the recent proclamation of the Federal President has revived it, and all sorts of excellent persons, who fancy themselves the disciples and successors of the men who carried negro emancipation in the West Indies, stand up in transports of joy, and shout "Lincoln for ever!" In the blindness of their ecstasy they can see nothing but unqualified good in the war policy of the North, and only unmitigated evil in the revolution in the South. The cause of the Union and the cause of negro emancipation is, in their view, one and the same. And in their eagerness to see it prosper they seem in great danger of sinking the distinctions between right and wrong. This is not the proper position for Englishmen. Our policy is that of strict neutrality, and it is inconsistent with that policy to take violently either one side or the other. England had no desire to see fulfilled what she could not help forecasting—the break up of the Union. Had the United States continued united Englishmen would not have grudged them their peace, nor any of the prosperity which might have come of it. Should the disunited States by any happy fortune become reunited, England's attitude towards them would be the same still. It is their affair, not ours. We are glad to see them prosper, and so long as they maintain friendly relations with us they are free to regulate their own affairs as they please. Our attitude is now what it was before the war broke out. Private persons will have their private opinions, and some will wish success to the North and some to the South, but the national feeling is purely neutral, and it is at once foolish and impertinent in voluntary associations to affect to represent the English mind, and in the name of the British public to address the American Minister in terms of unqualified adherence to the Northern policy.

The folly is greater when slavery is made responsible for the war, and emancipation the stalking-horse of officious interference. Englishmen, of course, abhor slavery. They wish to emancipate the negro, but they know as well as the Americans themselves that slavery is no more the cause of the present civil war than the recent gales are answerable for the sudden rise in the rate of discount which so astonished the City two days ago. They know, too, that emancipation would no more follow the restoration of the Union than it will result from the meeting of the English Parliament. It is desirable that this slavery question should be put upon a right footing. Recent attempts to mix it up with the triumph of the Northern arms are not creditable to English common sense. The civil war had its origin in causes only indirectly affected by the slave question, and must be finished without reference to it. Those gentlemen, therefore, who go to Exeter Hall and make heavy speeches in favour of Mr. Lincoln and General Butler, and give in their adhesion to the Northern policy through thick and thin, and talk unctuously about the Divine blessing on the Federal arms, and go in on Christian principles for a war of extermination, and who blacken the names of Southern generals, and palliate the monstrosities of the Northern leaders, would do well to reserve their eloquence to a later stage, and in the mean time learn to distinguish a little more clearly between light and darkness.

At the meeting at Exeter Hall, on Thursday, an attempt was made to fix the responsibility of the civil war upon slavery; and at the same time, because slavery is repugnant to English feelings and principles, to get up a demonstration in the name of the English public on behalf of the whole Northern policy. Mr. Baptist Noel was the principal speaker, and went beyond all reason and truth in his ignorant and one-sided declamation in behalf of remission and emancipation. Mr. Noel greatly misreads the English mind if he thinks that it—in his own words—"gives all honour to Mr. Lincoln, his Cabinet, his Congress, and all anti-slavery men of all parties." The English mind is very much disgusted with a great deal for which "Mr. Lincoln, his Cabinet, and his Congress" are answerable. So much so that, in spite of the national hatred of slavery, the current of English opinion has set in with great strength towards the South. The news of Confederate successes in the field has been received in this country with satisfaction, and from the cruelty, the trickery, the incompetency, and braggery of the North, Englishmen have come to hope that the South may succeed in seeming the independence for which they have fought so bravely and endured so much.

This absurd confusion of the cause of emancipation with that of remission has led men usually accounted good into making compromises with most execrable evil. All the worst doings of the Federal Government, its false telegrams, its abominable violations of civil liberty, its recognition and reward of the acts of that infamous wretch Butler, its indifference to the butcheries of McNeil, its avowed hatred of England, the insolence of Seward, and the tyranny of Stanton—all are endorsed and held up to admiration by Dissenting preachers and second-rate littérateurs, who either cannot or will not see that Mr. Lincoln cares no more for the three millions of slaves in the Southern States, whom his proclamation liberates, than he does for that million and a half in the Border States whom he confirms in their fetters more strongly than ever. Apologists may put it how they will, no one who is not blinded by partisanship can help seeing that that proclamation was not intended to emancipate the slave, but to induce him to massacre his master and his master's family. Mr. Noel professes to scorn such an idea. He asks how that can be when there are 500,000 whites armed with rifles, and the slaves are unarmed? Mr. Noel ought to know that there are not half a million of whites apart from the army, and available against a servile insurrection; that the women and children of men serving or falling with the army are mainly dependent upon the protection of the slaves, and might at any moment become victims to their fury; that there are many modes of murder and means of conflagration which do not require the use of firearms, and are quite within reach of a legion of negroes in mutiny against the families of their masters. The meeting at Exeter Hall is a great disgrace to the Christian religion, and an egregious blunder regarded as a step towards emancipation. Let the quarrel between North and South be finished on its own merits; and let Englishmen wait the issue.

(From the Daily Telegraph, January 31.)

Whenever a flourish of trumpets of unusually aggressive volume is ventured upon, it becomes expedient to ask what manner of men the trumpeters may be who have so very fiercely attempted to blast down the walls of Jericho. Let us glance at some of the most conspicuous of the tribesmen who, by hook or by crook, were got together under the auspices of the Emancipation Society. The chairman was Mr. William Evans, doubtless a most worthy and estimable member of society, but who, as a politician, orator or public man, is utterly unknown beyond the confines of Exeter Hall. Mr. P. A. Taylor, M. P., is a rampant kind of republican, who very speedily found his level in the Commons' House of Parliament. Mr. Thomas Hughes is a crochety clever man, who gained some literary reputation by an amusing boys' book, called "Tom Brown's School Days," and lost it by an inconceivably stupid novel, called "Tom Brown at Oxford." The Revs. Newman Hall and Baptist Noel are fluent preachers, sufficiently popular in some Dissenting circles. Mr. Edmond Beales is, we believe, a respectable auctioneer. Mr. Morse is the American Consul-General in London, and nothing further need be said about him. Mr. Chamerovzow is, or was, the secretary to the Anti-Slavery Society, and a gentleman whom we should be loth to suspect of the capacity of setting either the Vistula or the Thames on fire. Mr. Nicholay is a well-known tradesman in Oxford-street, and a capital vestryman, and Mr. G. J. Holyoake—well, Mr. Holyoake is not the author of Paley's "Evidences." The persons enumerated were really the only notabilities on the platform. There were many laymen and many clergymen, but, independently of the gentlemen whose names we have mentioned, the emancipators may be emphatically described as nobodies. We are ready to grant that the painful obscurity of this personnel was no fault of the promoters of the meeting. They had laboured hard to cajole individuals of real parts and influence into attending. They had asked Johnson and Burke, but, as in the famous instance of "the Haunch of Venison," Johnson and Burke "couldn't come." Good old General Thompson sent ten pounds to the funds of the association, but stayed away; Mr. Forster, M. P., would have come, but he was bespoken for a meeting at Bradford; Mr. John Stuart Mill had no time to spare for anything of the kind; Professor Newman was unfortunately engaged to lecture at University College; Professor Cairnes was simply "unable to attend;" Mr. W. Hargreaves was similarly incapacitated from coming, but sent instead a paragraph of florid nonsense about liberty, equality, and fraternity, and "the Bedchamber of the press;" and Colonel Salway had an appointment of long standing at Edinburgh.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 28s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 18, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

Agency for the Continent: G. FOWLER, 279, Rue St. Honore, Paris.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1863.

A QUOTATION.—On the eve of the debate which will probably ensue in Parliament on the American question, it is not inappropriate to reproduce the memorable words of Earl Russell, spoken nearly twelve months ago, early in the last session. The passage occurs in a speech delivered in the House of Lords on March 10, 1862, in reply to a motion of Lord Campbell and Stratheden, relative to the blockade of the Southern ports.

If by some misfortune, if owing to the necessity to vindicate our honour, if owing to persuasions that this blockade could not be legally acknowledged, we had entered into this war, any thought of ending this great question by peaceable means would, I am persuaded, have vanished with the first cry which the North would have raised, and which would have been a proclamation of general emancipation and liberation of the slaves. I am sure we all wish that the sin and stain of slavery may cease; but there is nothing I should look at with greater horror than a sudden insurrection of 4,000,000 of people, the devastations they would cause, and the horrors, murders, and pillage which, in the name of liberty, might have been perpetrated. I trust, then, that when this conflict ends it will end in such a way that, although the cause of the emancipation of the negroes will have gained, it will be an emancipation conducted gradually and by peaceable means, and that the slaves of America will in time take their place as free labourers without loss of life or the destruction of the property of their holders. It is not owing to their masters that slavery now exists in the Southern States of America. It is an inheritance which they have derived from their country. But if we had taken up this question of blockade, if we had said that the vessels condemned in the various prize courts of America had been unjustly and unlawfully condemned, and the Federal Government had maintained that they were justly condemned, I know no course which would have been open but war with the United States. Having taken a different course, I do trust that within three months—perhaps, even sooner—we may see the close of this civil war in America. I have not, in any language I have used, intended to have taken the part of either the one side or the other, in this conflict. I trust that that contest may end, allowing each of them a course of happiness and freedom. It would, perhaps, be impossible—I believe it would be impossible—to renew the old feeling between the North and South; and, if that be so, I trust that whatever may be their military successes, whatever may be their naval victories, whatever positions they may capture, that the North will at last consent to the peaceable separation of two States which might both be mighty—of two States inhabited by persons of very different education and of very different nature perhaps, but respecting each other—and each going on in a course of peace and prosperity, which will not only benefit that great country in the present day, but will secure its position for centuries to come.

The Confederate States before Parliament.

Before this meets the eyes of a majority of our readers, the contents of the Speech from the Throne will be known throughout the length and breadth of the land. It is not very hazardous to predict that on the most important question of the day this exposition of the Ministerial policy will be, if not silent, at least indefinite and unsatisfactory. Beyond the expression of regret at the continuance of this unhappy war, and of hope that better counsels may soon prevail in America, there will probably be nothing to indicate the intentions of the Cabinet. Not that the Cabinet has actually decided on doing nothing, but that it has been unable to decide at all. This much the public has a right to conclude from the contradictory tone of the public speeches of its members and supporters, and we do not anticipate that the Speech from the Throne will materially modify the conclusion. The Government, collectively, is far from hostile to the Confederate States, that hostility being confined to a section only of its least influential individuals, while the most important section are probably active sympathizers, and the remainder at least passive well-wishers of the South. So nicely do these various forces appear to be balanced as to completely neutralize each other, and to make any action of the Government, without a strong outside pressure, altogether impossible. So far from being able to lead Parliamentary opinion, in this respect at least, it must itself wait for the manifestation of that opinion, and thence receive its impulse. We purpose briefly to recapitulate a few of the principal points which may be urged and dilated upon in Parliament by the friends of recognition, and all of which have already been repeatedly and at length discussed in our columns during the last ten months.

The contest between the two groups of States formerly comprised under the name of the "United States of America," differs essentially, both in theory and practice, from a contest between an insurgent Power and its former Sovereign. The very style under which these States were known to foreign nations negatives the idea of unity or of a consolidated nationality, and implies what it distinctly professes to be, a Federation for certain specified common purposes of sovereign and independent States, each of which is the equal in rights and rank to every other. Whatever, from the terms of such a Federation, could be argued for or against the right of secession, it would be a self-evident absurdity to argue that the States north of the Potomac and Ohio were the sovereigns of the States south of those rivers. As members of the Federation the States severally retained unimpaired their powers and duties in regard to their own citizens. To the States, and not to the Federation, did the citizen look for the protection of life and property, and for all the laws regulating his intercourse with his fellow-men. In return his allegiance was owed to the State, and only indirectly, that is to say, through the State, was it owed to the Federation. Now secession from the Federal compact was the act of the States, and not of individuals. Nowhere was there any overthrow of, or even any outbreak against, the constituted authority. A conflict between the citizen and the authority which he was accustomed and bound to obey, could only have arisen in the case that the citizen had resisted the act of his State. If words have any definite meaning, the secession of the Southern States presents none of the features of an insurrection, and unless we assume that sovereign States can revolt against each other, it is absurd to term the secession a rebellion. Foreign nations, in their intercourse with the United States, could not possibly have assumed obligations toward one group of States to the prejudice of the other States; no obligations toward the Northern States which would not be equally binding in the case of the Southern States. When, therefore, the Southern States, by seceding from the old Federation and forming a new one, changed the agency through which they communicated with foreign Governments, and gave due notice of the same, it was clearly the right of those Governments to recognize the change, and it may be fairly argued that it was the duty of foreign Governments to do this so soon as they were satisfied that the change was consummated and permanent.

If the Confederate States might claim recognition by virtue of the relations which they sustained towards foreign Powers as members of the old Federation, no less can they claim this, when, despite the evidence of obvious facts, they are regarded only as an "insurgent Power" rebelling against its "former Sovereign." That former Sovereign, assuming the North to be such, has for two years been unable to exercise any act of sovereignty within the territory of the alleged insurgent, except in such few and isolated districts as the chances of war have temporarily placed under his military occupation, and even there he has failed to shake the loyalty of the inhabitants. The "former Sovereign" has not indeed abandoned the "substantial struggle" to recover his lost sovereignty, but he has already expended, without effect, in the effort, greater means of men and money than those which he can now devote, or may hereafter be able to devote, to the same object; while, on the other hand, the "insurgent Power" is daily adding to its means of successful resistance. Recognition of the latter cannot therefore be opposed on the ground that the issue of the contest is still undecided and doubtful.

The recognition of the Confederate States is simply the official recognition of a fact, which may be ignored but cannot be denied, the fact that these States, whether rightly or wrongly, whether wisely or unwisely, have established their de facto independence, and now securely enjoy it. To recognize this fact is not to become responsible for it implies no judgment of the merit of any quarrel between the Confederate States and any other parties, and involves no obligation to aid them in such quarrel. To ignore this fact, on the other hand, when it has become patent to all the world, is practically to aid and abet the opponents of the Confederate States.

Regarding the American combatants as respectively a "foreign Sovereign" and an "insurgent Power," the recognition by some foreign Power is an indispensable preliminary of any arrangement between them, since no Government, however weak or insignificant, has ever in a similar case abandoned its pretensions to authority before some neutral, and therefore best qualified judge had pronounced the assertion of those pretensions to be hopeless. In other words, the "former Sovereign" has never been the first to recognize an "insurgent Power." The party most interested in success cannot be expected to be the most ready to abandon the hopes of success. The withholding of recognition by neutrals from an "insurgent Power" is therefore a virtual encouragement to the "former Sovereign" to persist in his pretensions.

Recognition of the Confederate States by other neutral Powers cannot be expected so long as it is withheld by this country, since Great Britain is naturally the head of the political societies of Anglo-Saxon race, and as such, as well as from the fact that she has greater interests at stake in the quarrel than other nations, and from her nearer acquaintance with its merits, she must be presumed to be most competent to decide on the propriety and the time of recognition.

Delay of this recognition has heretofore been justified on various grounds; notably, because, as was alleged, the war would speedily terminate without this means being resorted to; and also, as was urged by Earl Russell nearly a year ago, because of the danger that any foreign interference might induce the North to give the signal for a servile insurrection. This event, which Earl Russell then deprecated with expressions of horror, has since taken place. The experience of the past has amply demonstrated the futility of all hopes of a speedy solution of the American problem by a policy of inaction. Further delay is now attended with the certainty that more blood will be uselessly spilled, and more property wasted, and that another year's crop of cotton will be lost to commerce.

The Presidential Message.

It is not necessary for us to waste words in praise of the President of the Confederate States. His language and his actions speak for themselves. His statesmanlike tone, his wise and dignified moderation, his calmness in the hour of peril and of difficulty, his resolute and consistent policy, have won a tribute of respect and admiration from contemporaries whose impartiality is beyond suspicion. Quis vituperavit Herculem? The bitterest and most unscrupulous of his enemies can lay no specific fault to the charge of Jefferson Davis. They exhaust for him their vocabulary of abuse; English fanatics call him "a man-stealer," and Northern editors and placemen revile him as "an accursed rebel," "a black-hearted traitor," whose diabolical machinations have broken up "the best Government that the wisdom of God or man ever devised;" but epithets of this kind carry their own refutation with them, and do not require from us either rebuke or reply. The confidence of his own countrymen, and the respect he has won in Europe, are his sufficient vindication and his noblest panegyric. If it were necessary for us to make any addition to the comments of all unbiassed critics on the vast and amazing contrast presented by the language, the bearing, and the policy of the statesmen who guide the destinies of the South, and the politicians who have found their way to the highest offices in the North, it would be rather in the way of explanation than of eulogy. It has been from the first the good fortune of the Southern States to combine the political constancy and clear-sightedness of aristocratic society with the width and freedom of democratic institutions. The people of those States have been content to accept the guidance of their natural leaders—to follow the counsels of the educated and enlightened classes—to repose confidence in their best men—to select as their political representatives while the Union subsisted, and as their rulers in the dangers and difficulties attending its dissolution, those statesmen whose ability had approved itself to those who are competent to criticise political men and measures, and to repose in them a hearty and encouraging trust, not to be shaken by disaster or suffering. It has been the curse of the North that democratic feelings have guided the working of political Democracy; that hatred of social and personal superiority, and dreams of an equality at once impossible and immoral, have led the people to renounce the control of the educated classes, and to put their trust, not in their best and wisest, but in their most supple and subservient politicians. The mob of the cities is king in the North-east; the rough populace of the prairies and backwoods is despot in the North-west; and like other despots, King Mob exacts from his courtiers a servility which honest men will not render, and chooses his courtiers as the directors of his policy, and the commanders of his armies. Mr. Davis and General Lee are not happy accidents, any more than Mr. Lincoln and General Butler are excrecences on the Northern system; each is the natural result of the character and habits of political thought which distinguish their respective nations. Thus the lesson of the present situation may serve to teach us what is the probable future of the rival Confederacies; what is to be feared for that country which, at the gravest crisis of its fortunes, is ruled by an Illinois attorney, and a Cabinet of mediocrities; and what may be hoped for a nation which, in the hour of its extremest and most sudden trial, has a Davis for its President, and sends its armies into the field under the command of such Generals as Lee and Johnston, Longstreet, Beauregard, and "Stonewall" Jackson. What superiority in wealth and numbers could compensate for the difference of national character between the electors of the accomplished soldier and gentleman who presides over the Confederate States, and those who entrusted their country's fortunes into the hands of Abraham Lincoln? In peace or war, in influence abroad or prosperity at home, how can a nation which is ruled by its best minds fail to surpass a people which submits to the tyranny of the meanest and most incapable of its politicians?

The Message of Mr. Davis is chiefly occupied with two subjects—the conduct of foreign nations towards the American belligerents, and the proceedings of the invaders of his country. On both these matters he speaks as the statesman should speak whom the confidence of a great nation has entrusted with the highest office in its gift at the most important epoch of its history; as a man worthy of the country which is proud of him. He has grave complaints to make of the course pursued by the European Powers; complaints which, in the opinion of his countrymen, are fully justified, and to some of which the governments of England and France would find it by no means easy to give a satisfactory reply. But he does not speak in those tones of frantic wrath or feminine reproach which distinguish in turns the language of Northern Ministers on questions of foreign policy. Whatever are the miseries of the South in this war, at least she is spared the crowning misery of weakness. There is no word of menace or of passion; none of that "You'll see next time, and look out bimoby," which a Northern satirist deprecates in the language of his countrymen of every position and degree. The forbearance of the Confederate States in the present condition of their affairs is treated only as entitling them hereafter to friendly consideration and favourable construction in the event of future misunderstandings with foreign powers, and their wrongs are stated and discussed as calmly and impartially as they might be debated in the British Cabinet.

In the first place, the Confederate States have to complain of the persistent refusal by European Powers to recognize their independent existence; a refusal chiefly, if not solely, attributable to the obstinate hostility of a portion of the British Ministry. It must be conceded that on the general question of recognition Mr. Davis's views are rather American than English; that American jurists and statesmen have always "interpreted in favour of liberty" the somewhat uncertain rules of international law applicable to this subject, while England has generally leaned to the side of sovereignty and vested rights. But as to the particular case we hold that the arguments of the President are unanswerable. Five of the States forming the Confederacy have already been separately acknowledged by Great Britain and by France; four of them were so acknowledged before the Union existed; two of them have actually held direct intercourse with European powers while the Union existed, and in entire independence thereof—the States of North Carolina and of Texas. They never surrendered the independence so acknowledged; and it does so happen that Great Britain has practical reason to know that they did not surrender it; for she has had complaints to make against the State of South Carolina, when the Federal Government avowed its inability to afford any redress, and she has been obliged to admit the interference of the Sovereign State of Maine in a negotiation between herself and the Government at Washington. There is, therefore, no question of violated or repudiated sovereignty. What Great Britain is diplomatically bound to see in the Southern Confederacy is an assemblage of Sovereign States, delegating to a new common representative that charge of their foreign relations which they formerly delegated to the Government of the United States. The case is strictly analogous to that which may one day happen in Germany. Suppose the minor Powers, weary of the useless expense and weakness which attends their several representation at foreign Courts, should agree to delegate the charge of that representation to the Diet at Frankfort; and that afterwards Bavaria and Hanover should withdraw their assent to that arrangement, and send a common representative to London—would he be refused admission by the Court of St. James's? And if not, why is not Mr. Mason recognized as the Ambassador of the Confederate States of North America? The question is one of great practical importance. But for the erroneous view taken by Europe—that is to say, by England—it may be doubted whether the United States Government would have persisted in its utterly ridiculous claim of "sovereignty," and it is certain that long ere now that claim would have been practically abandoned. It is the refusal of recognition that has induced the Federal Government to persevere in the prosecution of a wicked and hopeless war; and in the consequences of that war Europe is suffering the penalty of the fault committed by over cautious statesmen, more careful to keep the peace, than to do right and render justice.

In regard to the Treaty of Paris, the case of the Confederate States is even stronger. They were asked to accept the code of maritime law embodied by that Treaty in four famous articles; they did so, with the specific exception of the first article, relative to privateering; and England and France were fully satisfied with that qualified adhesion. It is only because that adhesion was given that England can confidently claim reparation for the destruction of English property on board Northern vessels—a claim distinctly asserted by Lord Russell. Now the fourth article of that Treaty asserts that blockades, to be binding—that is, to give the right of capturing neutral ships—must be enforced by a squadron able really to prevent access to the blockaded coast or port. England may possibly have done ill to accept that article; many English statesmen would be glad to see her acceptance of it formally and with due notice rescinded. But having obtained to that article the assent of the American belligerents, both North and South, she was bound by it, and should have enforced it. She has not done so; she has permitted a paper blockade, under which scores of her ships have been piratically captured; she has allowed its validity, when evidence of its utter inefficiency was in the hands of her Government, and when that inefficiency was actually alleged by the North as an excuse for the infamous barbarism of the "stone fleet." So far she has erred in common with France. But Lord Russell has been guilty of a piece of unfairness peculiarly his own. He has actually introduced a new definition of an effective blockade, practically repudiating that, the acceptance of which had been obtained from both the Federal and the Confederate Governments. He declares that a blockade is effective not only when an access is prevented, but when it is rendered "evidently dangerous;" and thus does a vast practical wrong to the Confederacy, and confers an inestimable advantage on its enemy. This is neither just nor honourable.

The truth is, that the neutrality of France and England has, under English influence, been systematically interpreted to the disadvantage of the weaker belligerent. The refusal of recognition, the exclusion of prizes from neutral ports, the permitance of the blockade, have all been of the most important service to the aggressors. Had the course of the great Maritime Powers been really impartial as well as neutral, it would hardly have been possible for the North to protract the war to the present time.

We have already written at length upon the savagery displayed by the North in the conduct of the war, and the painful necessity of retaliation enforced upon the Confederate Government. We have spoken also of the character and consequences of the infamous proclamation by which the Southern slaves are called to freedom and starvation through insurrection, murder, and incendiarism. We need not repeat what we have said on these topics, or do more than call attention to the distinct language in which Mr. Davis declares the utter impossibility of re-union—an impossibility always clear to him, and which this proclamation must have made evident to those who most dreaded that reconciliation, unsafe, precarious, and disastrous—might by some evil chance be brought about. "This proclamation," he says, "is an authentic statement by the Government of the United States of its inability to subjugate the South by force of arms, and as such must be accepted by neutral nations, which can no longer find any justification in withholding our just claims to formal recognition. It is also in effect an intimation to the people of the North that they must prepare to submit to a separation, now become inevitable, for that people are too acute not to understand that a restitution of the Union has been rendered for ever impossible by the adoption of a measure which, from its very nature, neither admits of retraction nor can co-exist with union."

The English Outrage at Brazil.

There are persons so lost to every honourable feeling, so thoroughly vitiated, that calling them liars or thieves, or applying to them every other infamous epithet that can be conceived, with one exception, will not irritate them; but there is one name of opprobrium that no one, be he ever so degraded, can fail to feel the sting, and that epithet is, coward. Brand a man as a liar or a thief, and he may find some who will not deem his companionship a disgrace, but brand him as a coward, and he will find none so vile as not to shun him. A coward is one who truckles to the strong, and bullies the weak. A coward is one who will lick the dust off the shoes of those who kick him, who will bear any insult from those whom his cowardice makes him dread, and who will oppress and maltreat those whom he knows cannot resent his ill-usage and his injustice. What is true of individuals is true of nations. We do not say—we indignantly deny—that England is a cowardly nation, but we do say, and we challenge denial, that Lord Russell is making us appear as a coward to the world; for he, as the Foreign Minister of England, is, with unparalleled pusillanimity, submitting to the insults of a boastful Power which he dreads, and bullying, without stint, Governments that he thinks he can trample on with impunity. Those who remember his late despatch to Denmark, and consider his subserviency to the Federal Government; those who remember how he presumed to address the Court of Denmark in terms that a liege lord would hesitate to address his vassal, and consider how, on more than one occasion, he has submitted to the English flag being flagrantly insulted by the Federals, will not charge us with accusing him unjustly; but if there could be any doubt it is solved by the gross outrage which has just been perpetrated in Brazil, by the express orders of the British Government. We will give an unvarnished account of this affair, not that it affords us any pleasure to place such a transaction upon record, but because we believe that making the circumstances public, is the surest way of redressing the grievous wrong inflicted on Brazil, and of inducing that public condemnation of the act which to some extent may redeem the honour and reputation of this country. If any of our readers should think this a mere and perhaps unwarrantable outburst of declamation, we are convinced their opinion will be changed when they consider impartially the facts of the extraordinary proceedings which have just been made public.

Between Brazil and this country there are intimate relations and something more; every Englishman—perhaps we ought to except Mr. Christie, the English Minister—who has visited or lived in Brazil will testify to the cordial good-will that Brazilians on all occasions manifest towards Englishmen. We do not suppose that Lord Russell will deny this, or pretend that the many English residents in Brazil have not been sedulously protected in their interests by the Brazilian Government, and treated with the utmost respect and honour by the Brazilian people. Those who are familiar with the details of English commerce will not need to be reminded of the importance of our Brazilian trade. We do not suppose that there is any nation on the face of the earth more anxious to cultivate friendly relations with us than the Brazilians, or any Government more ready to treat us with all due honour than the Government of Brazil. Let us see what return we have made for this friendship and respect.

In June 1861—it is important, as regards the British Government, to mark the date—the Prince of Wales, a British ship, was wrecked on the coast of Albardao, to the south of the port of Rio Grande. It is alleged that a portion of her cargo, upon being brought ashore, was pillaged. Englishmen will understand this transaction, for it is not so many years past that the villages situated on our own coast were infested with wreckers, and it is said that to this day the same genus exists in some parts of the coasts of Scotland. This affair was one cause of complaint, but not important enough to permit Lord Russell to display his unflinching boldness, where he is safe from retaliation. The next charge was, that two officers and a chaplain of H.B.M. frigate Forts had gone ashore, it is said, out of uniform, were ill-treated by a sentinel, and confined for forty-eight hours, first in the guard-house, afterwards at the central police-station. Upon the 5th of December, a year and a half after the wreck of the Prince of Wales, Mr. Christie, the British Minister at Brazil, sent in an ultimatum, requiring the Brazilian Government to pay an indemnity for the cargo and freight of the Prince of Wales, and a further indemnity to the relatives of those of the crew whose bodies were stated to have been plundered. Mr.

Christie also demanded that the Brazilian officer who had arrested the English officers should be cashiered; that the sentinel should be punished; that satisfaction should be given for the insult to the British navy; and that the chief of the police and a subaltern should be publicly reprimanded.

We need hardly observe that to indicate in this manner the particular punishment that the Brazilian Government was to inflict upon its officers, supposing them to be guilty of the alleged offences, was exceedingly discourteous and even unlawful. The proper course would have been to have demanded the trial of the Brazilian authorities. English Ministers are not entitled to demand the punishment of men without trial, unless we are to be freemen at home, and despots abroad. And further, British officers out of uniform are exactly in the position of civilians, and any insult offered to them under such circumstances could not be construed into an insult to the British navy. The Foreign Minister of the Brazils replied that his Government could not accept any responsibility with regard to the matter of the Prince of Wales, and refused to pay any indemnity; but adding that it would pay, if compelled by force, whatever was required, under protest. Respecting the British officers, the Brazilian Minister said that the authorities had done their duty, and there was no ground for giving the required satisfaction.

What did Mr. Christie then do? Did he ascertain whether he had any right to demand the freight of a shipwrecked vessel? No doubt, for the shipwreck had happened a year and a half before, and he had already corresponded on that matter with the British Foreign Secretary. In this matter, at all events, we cannot doubt that he was acting under the express directions of Lord Russell. With respect to the imprisonment of the officers, he was bound, we think, to investigate the truth of the statement of the Brazilian authorities, that they were drunk, and merited their incarceration. But in this case also he had received instructions from his Government. Mr. Christie, as soon as he received the reply of the Brazilian Government, notified that Admiral Warren would make reprisals on Brazilian property, and on the 5th of January, to the intense indignation of the people of Rio de Janeiro, it transpired that the British steamer Stromboli had seized five Brazilian vessels, the cargoes of which were valued at £30,000 sterling. The irritation of the people, we are told, and we can readily believe it, became extreme. Foreigners, as well as natives, protested against the proceeding of the English Minister. For a while the act of Mr. Christie jeopardized the property, as well as the lives of the English residents, and the excitement of the populace was with difficulty allayed by the leading men beseeching them to make no reprisals upon English property and to refrain from molesting Englishmen, but at the same time counselling them to uphold the Government in resisting and resenting the violence. Lists of volunteers were opened and immediately filled; deputations waited upon the Ministry urging it not to give way to the outrage; national subscriptions were largely responded to by the citizens; the shareholders of the Bank demanded that no more English bills should be discounted, and the people were exhorted not to purchase English goods. We hope, we are confident, that there are few men in this country who will not sympathize with the indignation of the Brazilians. A serious catastrophe was only prevented by the activity of the Emperor, and the forbearance of his Government. On the 6th of January, when the popular fury was at its height, the Brazilian Government accepted the propositions of Mr. Christie, and the following arrangement was concluded:—

The prizes are to be restored. The Brazilian Minister in London, if so required by the British Government, will pay, under protest, whatever sum may be demanded for the owner of the Prince of Wales. With respect to the treatment sustained by the officers of the Forts, it shall be submitted to the arbitration of the King of the Belgians to decide whether or not such treatment can be regarded as an outrage upon the honour of the British navy.

The Brazilian Government is revenged; there is a bitter irony in these terms. The vessels seized are to be restored, and Brazil will do what she offered to do before the outrage—pay whatever sum, be it large or small, that the cupidity of the strong Power may choose to extort. The Brazilian Government says in effect to Lord Russell, “We cannot go to war with you, we acknowledge that you have the strength as well as the will to prey upon our national honour and upon our revenue, but we have no desire to see our people revenge the insult; we are in your power; take what you will as ‘compensation’ for the wreck of the Prince of Wales. As to the insults to your officers, let the King of the Belgians, a monarch closely allied to your Royal Family, a monarch whose sympathies are notoriously with England, a monarch who can hardly help a feeling of partiality for your country—let him decide whether the arrest of drunken officers, out of uniform, is an insult to the British Navy.”

What will England say to this? It is not a party question. It concerns men of all parties, it touches the honour of the country. It may be that some few amongst us, Mr. Bright, for example, may think that national honour is a bugbear and a chimera; that the life of a nation is its riches and its commerce. We confess we are old-fashioned enough not to agree with this doctrine. We confess we feel, when our national honour is concerned, that a stain is less endurable than a wound. And we tell those who think that riches and power make us independent of the laws of honour, that they are grievously mistaken. As a matter of sordid interest, we tell those who believe in the omnipotence of Mammon, that England, with all her wealth and with all her might, cannot afford to play the part of a bully and a coward. If the British Government extorts compensation for the wreck of the Prince of Wales, or even if it does not forthwith apologise to the Brazilian Government for the outrage, it will show itself indifferent to the true welfare of England. The British Parliament meets to-day, and if the Government is unmindful of its duty, we trust, we are sure, that that assembly will protest against the system of bullying the weak and cringing to the strong, and will compel the English Government to make all the reparation in its power for the outrage perpetrated in its name, and, what is still more remarkable, by its express orders.

The Duke of Saxe-Coburg and the Throne of Greece.

Destiny, personified by Earl Russell, is too strong for the Greeks. If there was one thing more than another upon which they congratulated themselves when they heard that Otho had quietly taken his departure, it was that they had got rid for ever of the detested Germans. They promised themselves that wherever they might have to turn for a king, they would keep clear of Germany. Their experience of Otho himself, his councillors and servants, had given them a very bitter prejudice against our estimable Teuton cousins. They wanted an English prince, and they set to work at once to elect Prince Alfred. Him they found out that they could not have, and the Provisional Assembly, as soon as it had done quarrelling over the elections, was expected to look for another eligible princeling. England and France had recognized the right of the nation to discard Otho, and had promised to recognize any successor of good character, he being under no legal inability. The matter seemed clear enough; there was only an embarras de richesses; but whilst the Assembly has been constituting itself, Earl Russell has been looking for a king. What commission he has for the purpose nobody knows. The Greeks never gave him one; in electing Prince Alfred they did not offer to take any king the English Government might send them. However, Earl Russell has taken their fate into his hands and has been indefatigable in his endeavours, first to provide a king for them, when they wanted to choose one for them.

selves, and next to get a German when they were anxious, above all things, not to have a German. First his lordship applied to King Ferdinand of Portugal, there he met at once with a decisive refusal; next he turned to the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, upon whom he tried all his arguments and entreaties, for a long time, in vain. The Duke did not wish for the throne of Greece, he has already a comfortable little sovereignty in Germany, and he is flattered every now and then by visions of the Imperial Crown of Germany. The Duke seems to have refused point-blank. Beaten, Earl Russell sought another German prince, who is reported to have had the rare modesty and wisdom to have answered that he was not fit to be a king. In despair, his lordship returned to the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, and it is now announced, by the organs of the Government, that his terms having been accepted, not by Greece, but by Earl Russell, he has consented to take the throne.

The Duke of Saxe-Coburg is a prince of great ability and singularly liberal views. If the Greeks could forget his nationality, if he could divest himself of it, he would be perhaps as good a king as they could have. But the Greeks detest the Germans, and, in their detestation, will know no distinction between a Coburg and a Bavarian. Were they willing to forget that the Duke is a German, he would take care to remind them of it; for, by the terms upon which he has accepted the throne, he has shown that he does not take it at all heartily, and that German interests will always be superior with him to Greek. He will retain his two German duchies, and retaining them, will spend part of his time in them. The Greeks will therefore have every year, in a regency, the fact that their Sovereign is only partly theirs—moreover, that he is a German—brought home to them. What the Greeks wanted was a prince who, frankly accepting Greece as his country, would have made its prosperity the object of his life; a prince who could have founded a dynasty which should have rooted itself in the hearts of the people. Loyalty to a foreigner in race, religion, language, and custom, is impossible. The Greeks will never feel this sentiment, so necessary to the harmonious existence of a monarchy, until they have princes who are Greeks by birth, and have been bred up in Greek traditions and interests. Some portion of the loyalty given to such a family would be reflected upon its founder. A childless man, like the Duke of Coburg, clinging to another sovereignty, will never win their attachment. He offers them, it is true, a successor in the person of a nephew, who is ready, for the heirship, to embrace the Greek faith; but these bargains, for which German princes are so ready, although they may suit the Royal family of Russia, revolt a people; and the Prince of Coburg-Kohary would not find the loyalty which his uncle wants. But for all these objections, for all the repugnance of the Greeks to have a king chosen for them again, for all their detestation of Germany, the Duke of Saxe-Coburg will probably be elected to the Greek throne. France offers no opposition, England makes the cession of the Ionian Islands conditional upon his election. The Provisional Assembly will probably elect him by a majority, and the country will not oppose, although it is not likely to affirm, their choice. We cannot congratulate the Duke; we must condole with the Greeks. He will ascend a throne to find anarchy reigning throughout the land, corruption and intimidation the principal agencies in legislation, an exchequer empty, a people thoroughly discontented. The revolution promised them wonderful advantages, and they are not content with the explanation, that they must wait some years for the enjoyment. To restore order, and establish a sound system of liberty in such a land, and under such circumstances, will test the ability of the Duke to the utmost. He is sure in the first few months to dissatisfy the larger part of his subjects, and to become disgusted with his task. Coburg will afford him an inviting refuge from all the discomforts of Greek politics, and having no occasion to overcome his disgust with the task of Government, he will allow the disgust to overcome him. The talents and virtues of the Duke will be lost in the hopeless endeavour to make the Greeks staid, sober, reflective politicians. Those hoping to govern them well must appeal to their feelings more than to their reason. The English people have as little reason as the Greeks to applaud this great triumph of Earl Russell's diplomatic genius. The election of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg will involve them in all those embarrassments the apprehension of which led to the refusal of the crown for Prince Alfred. If they put the Duke upon the throne they will have to keep him there. They must lend him their credit that he may start fair, and afterwards give him their protection in all he does against his own subjects and other Powers, in order that English influence, so happily established in Greece, may be maintained.

The Constitutional Struggle in Prussia.

The breach between the King of Prussia and his people widens every day. When the year began there was yet ground for the hope that a compromise might be effected, which would secure the nation its rights without humiliating the crown. That ground has been cut away. The contest has assumed a shape which makes no other issue possible than the signal discomfiture of one of the combatants. The King must surrender absolutist pretensions which he has solemnly declared he cannot and will not abandon; or the Chamber must subside into a mere consultative assembly, without the power of saying no, and the Constitution of Prussia be suspended during the Royal pleasure.

The Prussian Ministers employed the recess not in efforts to conciliate public opinion, and prepare the way for an amicable understanding, but in getting up addresses to the King, in which the Chamber was grossly vilified, in punishing the public functionaries who had rendered themselves at all conspicuous in its deliberations, and in persecuting the Liberal press. The result was that the Deputies arrived at Berlin for the opening of the session in no very pleasant mood. Their constitutional rights had been deliberately violated, and their fidelity to the Constitution had been denounced by the King and Ministers as so much disloyalty. But in all that irritation, they would have accepted frankly enough any propositions from the Ministry which, admitting their right, suggested an amicable solution. Even if such propositions would not have satisfied the extreme Liberals, they would have so effectually divided the Opposition, which is, in fact, the whole House, that any thing like united action of an energetic kind against the Government would have been out of the question. But the Government held out no hand of conciliation. The Royal Speech merely told the Chamber that, in the absence of a legal budget, the Government had been economical, and that the expenditure, when the accounts were closed, would be laid before it for its approval. No wish was expressed for the attainment of an understanding, the violation of the Constitution was treated as a matter not worthy of mention; and by the non-presentation of any legislative measures, the design was clearly betrayed of giving the Chamber nothing to do, and no opportunity of renewing its protest against the infringement of its rights. The Chamber was not content to accept the rôle thus cut out for it. It has adopted, by 255 votes to 68, an address to the King, in which it protests against the violation of the Constitution and the subsequent abuse of power by his Government. The address tells the King, in firm but respectful language, that his Ministers have, in opposition to the Constitution, carried on the administration without a legal budget, and, disregarding the express declaration of the Chamber, have incurred expenditure which it had definitively and explicitly refused. It complains that public functionaries, true to the Constitution, have been punished by oppressive measures, and that the press has been persecuted. It expresses the confidence of the Chamber in the King's will to maintain and protect the Constitution, but declares that his Ministers have already violated it; and, finally, the Chamber declares that the internal peace and external strength of the country can only be restored by a return to a constitutional state of things.

Sixty-eight members of the House, as we have said, voted against this address; but this minority does not represent an unnational party; not a dozen of them approve the policy of the Government. The reactionary or absolutist party in the House numbers but eleven members. The bulk of the minority was composed of men who are prepared to vindicate as firmly as the majority the rights of the House, who repudiate as strongly as they do the absolutist pretensions of the Ministry, and condemn its interference with the public functionaries and the press; but who prefer a sort of negative policy, and believe no good result can be obtained by pressing upon the King's ear such unwelcome statements. Indeed, the speech of Herr von Bismarck Schönausen, the Prussian Premier, has rendered it quite impossible that any other than the feudal fraction, which, although using the Constitution, openly avows its desire for its overthrow, could support it. As if his design had been to irritate the House into violent measures, as if he wished to render all conciliation between King and people impossible, he defied the House in the most insolent manner, and put the King into a position of direct antagonism towards it. The address had adopted the constitutional dogma that a King can do no wrong, and has always the best intentions. Herr Von Bismarck protested that the King could not be separated from his Ministers; he declared that in everything he and his colleagues had acted in accordance with the King's orders; he accused the Chamber of seeking to extend its own privileges, and reduce the King to a mere ornamental appendage to the State; he taunted the public functionaries, members of the House, with inconsistency, in declaring the expenditure illegal, and yet accepting their own salaries; he sneered at the House as powerless, told the members that they had no power, and told them that the Government, having the power, would maintain the rights of the Royal House.

The House passed the address, but the King has refused to receive it at the hands of a deputation, as the rule provides. It will be sent to him as a letter. His answer, if he gives one, will be a rebuke of the Chamber. There can be no doubt that although Herr von Bismarck Schönausen, as the Minister of a constitutional estate, was guilty of a gross breach of the law in declaring that the Ministry had acted under the King's orders, the fact was stated truly enough. King William has shown, in his answers to the deputations who protested against the conduct of the Chambers, and more lately in his answer to a memorial from the notables of the Rhine provinces, against the Ministry, that he is determined not to admit the right given the House of Deputies by the Constitution to control the public expenditure. He regards the claim as little short of high treason, and unhappily he finds Ministers who think with him, or at least act as if they did so.

The Constitution of Prussia was granted by the late King, at a time when the revolution was at the height of its triumph. It is so framed as to give the King as much power, and the people as little, as a Constitution decently can give. It is a compact between King and people, all the advantages of which are on the side of the King. One of its articles does, however, give the people some power, and that article the King announces his determination to disregard. If the King claims a dispensive power, the people will do so too. King William is laying the axe to the important and exceptional privileges of the Prussian Crown.

Statistics of Southern Trade.

COTTON.

When the Southern planters turned their attention to the cultivation of cotton, they did not enter upon an enterprise in which they were free from rivalry. On the contrary they had to compete with growers in other countries, who had for generations been engaged in the occupation. This will be seen by quoting from

McCulloch the imports of cotton into Great Britain in the year 1786 :—

From British West Indies..	5,800,000 lbs.
French and Spanish Colonies..	5,500,000 "
Dutch Colonies..	1,600,000 "
Portuguese Colonies ..	2,000,000 "
Smyrna and Turkey ..	5,000,000 "

Total .. 19,900,000 lbs.

In 1790 American cotton was exported, but not in any considerable quantity. In 1795 the export value was $2,000,000, which at the close of the century had increased to $5,000,000. The progress of the cultivation is shown by the following abstract from a paper communicated to the Congress of the United States in 1836, by the Secretary of the Treasury :

Years.	In the whole world. Growth. lbs.	United States. Growth. lbs.	Export. lbs.
1801 ..	520,000,000 ..	48,000,000 ..	20,000,000
1811 ..	555,000,000 ..	80,000,000 ..	62,000,000
1821 ..	630,000,000 ..	180,000,000 ..	124,000,000
1831 ..	820,000,000 ..	385,000,000 ..	277,000,000

Thus the total increase in the growth of cotton was due to the development of the cultivation in the Southern States. The production of the rest of the world continued the same, though it varied in different countries. In India it increased; in the rest of Asia and in the West Indies it decreased. The development of the American cotton cultivation was of immense benefit to English manufacturers, for it diminished the price of the article, and by this diminution stimulated the demand for cotton fabrics. According to the report presented to Congress in 1836 the price of cotton in the United States was :—

1821 ..	16 " "
1831 ..	9½ " "
1834 ..	13 " "

From the earliest time the progress of the British cotton trade has been concurrent with the increasing growth of cotton in America. McCulloch gives the following account of imports of cotton into Great Britain :—

Years.	Total Imports into Great Britain. lbs.	Amount of cotton in America. lbs.
1820 ..	147,576,000 ..	160,000,000
1821 ..	126,420,000 ..	180,000,000
1822 ..	141,510,000 ..	210,000,000
1823 ..	183,700,000 ..	185,000,000
1824 ..	147,420,000 ..	215,000,000
1825 ..	244,360,000 ..	255,000,000
1826 ..	170,520,000 ..	350,000,000
1827 ..	264,330,000 ..	270,000,000
1828 ..	222,750,000 ..	325,000,000
1829 ..	218,324,000 ..	365,000,000
1830 ..	259,856,000 ..	350,000,000
1831 ..	280,080,000 ..	365,000,000
1832 ..	270,690,000 ..	390,000,000

In twelve years the total increase in the United States' crop was 230,000,000 lbs. and the total increase of British imports was 123,114,000 lbs. Great Britain consumed more than 50 per cent. of the increase, and yet during this period the consumption in the United States was considerable; in 1832, being 194,412 bales in the Northern States and about 15,000 bales in the Southern States.

In 1832 the culture of cotton in the South and the British cotton manufacture were in their infancy. The following table sets forth their growth and connection. The figures are taken from the British official returns, and the statement given in the New York Shipping List of the 14th of September, 1859; the prices are from a report of the Secretary of the Treasury :—

1835	1,254,328	216,838	$16.8
1806	1,360,725	346,753	16.8
1837	1,422,930	222,540	14.2
1838	1,800,497	236,063	10.3
1839	1,360,532	276,018	14.8
1840	2,177,835	295,193	8.5
1841	1,634,941	297,288	10.2
1842	1,683,574	267,850	8.1
1843	2,378,874	325,129	6.2
1844	2,030,409	346,744	8.1
1845	2,394,503	389,006	5.92
1846	2,100,537	422,596	7.81
1847	1,778,651	427,967	10.34
1848	2,347,634	616,644	7.61
1849	2,728,596	642,485	6.4

The decrease in price has been greater than the increase in quantity. To show how much the American cotton crop had to do with the advance of the British cotton trade we quote the following returns from a paper read to the British Association by Mr. G. R. Porter:—

CONSUMPTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.
Years.	lbs.
1800 ..	56,010,732
1810 increased by ..	67,478,203
1820 " further by ..	19,183,720
1830 " " ..	42,287,797
1840 " " ..	328,526,548
1849 " " ..	1,182,981,008
Whole consumption in 1849 ..	775,433,908
400 lbs. to the bale equal to ..	1,932,692
Imports from Brazil, Sardinia, and all other ports of the North in 1849 ..	538,000
	1,394,692

In 1849, according to the same authority, the United States consumed 600,000 bales, and the Continent 1,000,000, and, consequently, Great Britain consumed nearly 50 per cent. of the entire American production—it did, in fact, consume quite 50 per cent., for the production of the year was only 2,723,596 bales—and of the American cotton exported, Great Britain consumed more than 50 per cent.

We will now continue the table of growth and consumption to the year 1859 :—

Year.	Crop in bales.	Consumed in United States.	Imports into Great Britain.
			Total.	American.
1850	2,096,706	613,498	1,737,490	1,181,956
1851	2,355,257	485,614	1,903,475	1,396,178
1852	3,015,029	699,603	2,341,522	1,784,388
1853	3,262,882	803,725	2,264,717	1,532,034
1854	2,930,027	737,239	2,173,138	1,667,509
1855	2,847,339	706,412	2,275,553	1,621,403
1856	3,527,845	770,739	2,467,918	1,758,295
1857	2,939,519	819,936	2,421,487	1,478,437
1858	3,113,962	595,562	2,430,848	1,854,004
1859	3,851,481	927,651	2,294,000	1,907,000
1860	4,300,000

In a paper read by Mr. D. Chadwick before the London Statistical Society, he observed: "The import of raw cotton increased from 646,000,000 lbs. in 1844 to 1,034,060,000 lbs. in 1858; while the value of exports of cotton manufactured goods and cotton twist and yarns increased from twenty-six millions sterling in 1844 to forty-three millions sterling in 1858, an extension of one branch of trade in fourteen years unparalleled in the history of any country in the world." In order to show how this increase is the result of the development of the American cotton fields, we extract the following table from Mr. P. L. Simmond's valuable continuation of Dr. Ure's "Philosophy of Manufactures."

Average of each 5 years.	Imports of American. Bales.	Imports of other sorts. Bales.	Excess of American. Per cent.	Excess of other sorts. Per cent.

The above table is very important. We frequently hear people talk about fostering the growth of cotton in India and elsewhere, as though the growth of cotton in those places had been completely checked by the American growth—that no effort had been made by any cotton producing countries, except the Southern States, to supply the rapidly increasing demand—that the American planters have been without a rival. What is the true state of the case? In other cotton growing countries, beside the Southern States, great and successful efforts have been made to get a share of the commerce, and from the year when the American crop came into competition till 1859, the imports of "other sorts" into England had increased five-fold; but from 1820, when the excess of "other sorts" imported into England was 43½ per cent. till 1859—when the excess of American was 142½ per cent.—whilst the import of "other sorts" had increased three-fold, the imports of America had increased five-fold. It will thus be seen that the cotton growing countries have already exerted themselves to produce an abundant supply of cotton, and that the American supply was in excess of what they can supply—at all events, at a price to meet the demand and not to check it. We may here observe that it has been calculated by well-informed men that, at the present price of cotton, the native-made India fabrics are cheaper than English cotton fabrics; and so high prices are likely, in this respect, to discourage the export of India cotton, and to diminish the demand for English goods.

India is largely benefited by the cotton trade of the Southern States by the consumption of her gunny cloths. In 1858 the total export of that article from India was 5,892,079 pieces, of which 4,155,890 pieces were taken by America.

The Marquis of Lansdowne.

The English aristocracy are preeminently a working class. Labour as well as honoured titles are their heritage. Some prefer a life of inglorious ease, just as there are persons in other circles who prefer chronic insolvency perpetual dunning, or avowed pauperism, to earning their daily bread by the sweat of their brow. Nor must it be supposed that this remark applies solely to those who devote themselves to the public service of their country. Noblemen who are unknown at Westminster, who take no prominent part in politics, are nevertheless hard-workers. The duties in connection with their estates and their county are numerous and absorbing. My lord's man of business does not work harder than his employer. Demagogues may imitate the trap of Mr. Bright, and represent the aristocracy as an idle, enervated class, but the charge is utterly unfounded. He who is born to a large estate is born to a life of toil. Our great landlords are, in fact, the stewards of their property. When the English aristocracy ceases to discharge its functions, and accepts the gifts of fortune whilst repudiating the responsibilities, it will dwindle and sink into contempt as other aristocracies have done under like circumstances.

Lord Lansdowne, who died on Saturday last, full of years and honours, had an additional stimulus to work hard. He was a younger son, and his position depended upon his own exertions. His parentage gave him a fair start in the race, but could not assure to him the prize. The deceased peer, who was born in 1780, was destined for a public career, and was at an early age sent to Westminster School. His education was continued by a residence at Edinburgh, where, in company with Lord Palmerston (then Henry Temple), and Brougham—young men destined to obtain a world-wide celebrity—with Jeffrey, who was to play an important part in the literary history of the age, and with Francis Horner, he attended the lectures, and enjoyed the conversation of Dugald Stewart, who through the agency of others has done more than any one else to shape the policy of England.

Of course Henry Petty was a Whig—except by a species of family outrage he could not have been anything else—and Edinburgh was the place peculiarly favourable to the growth and development of Whiggery. After a short career at the Scottish University, and getting some reputation as an active member of the Speculative Society, he went to Cambridge and took his degree in 1801. A Continental tour—in those days a more serious affair than at present—finished his education, and he immediately entered upon political life as member for the family borough of Calne. The highest expectations were formed of him by his friends and party. The more sanguine regarded him as a second Pitt, but they were in this expectation doomed to disappointment. The late peer was not what is called a genius; but, gifted with excellent ability and indomitable perseverance, he gained that eminence—for though he was not Prime Minister, he had the refusal of the high office—by slow and sure advances, which men like Pitt and Canning reach with less toil, with more éclat, but not with more honour. Still Lord Henry Petty was from the first a Parliamentary success. He turned his attention to finance delivered his maiden speech on the Bank Restriction Act, and took rank as a debater by supporting the attack on Lord Melville, as Treasurer of the Navy, who was charged with making use of public money, of permitting his paymaster to do the same, and to gamble on the Stock Exchange.

After the death of Pitt, which event was supposed to be hastened by the disgrace of Melville, and the consequent increased difficulty of carrying on the Government, the Grenville Cabinet was formed, in which Fox was the de facto Prime Minister, although the firmness of the King—the courtiers' term for that species of imbecility which consists in unreasonable obstinacy and little-minded personal spite—would not permit him to assume the nominal position. Lord Henry Petty, then twenty-five years of age, was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. His financial schemes were speculative and unpopular. He proposed to raise the Income Tax to 10 per cent., and to extend it to all property yielding more than £50 a year. John Bull is undeniably patient under taxation, and in some quarters it is supposed that he rather likes being heavily taxed, and it is not unnatural that he should have come to regard heavy taxation as a necessary part of that Constitution which he reveres not only as the bulwark of English liberty, but as the mainstay of English prosperity. But certain it is, that John Bull is not partial to the Income Tax. Any impost, no matter how onerous, in any shape or form, is preferred to that. It is somewhat inquisitorial in theory, and it is particularly oppressive. No wonder, then, that our fathers should have kicked at the proposal to take two shillings in the pound out of their incomes. Lord Henry Petty, like most young financiers, was under the impression that it was not impossible to indulge in a large and an increasing expenditure without getting into debt. He proposed that the war should be carried on with loans, of the amount of which 10 per cent. was to be raised by taxation, and half of that to be so raised was to pay the interest, and the remaining 5 per cent. to be put by as a sinking fund to redeem the debt in fourteen years. The idea of borrowing money, and at the same time of putting by something out of income, instead of making the income go as far as possible, and borrowing as little as possible, was too wild to find any favour. But if Lord Henry Petty was a dreamy financier, he was honest and outspoken. In introducing a Bill, on the 21st of May, 1806, for the more effectual examination of the public accounts, he stated that there had not been an audit at the Pay Office for twenty-four years; that other offices were in the same position; that the amount of accounts not passed was £167,000,000; that the amount of the accounts not proceeded with was £58,000,000; that the amount of Pay Office and naval accounts not delivered was £230,000,000. Administrative reform was certainly demanded fifty years ago.

The Grenville Ministry was short-lived. Fox died at the end of six months, and with him departed the vitality of the Cabinet. In 1809, by the death of his brother, Lord Henry Petty became Marquis of Lansdowne, and his removal to the Upper House weakened his party, already disorganized and disheartened. For nearly twenty years the Whigs were in opposition, and for the greater part of that period possessed hardly any influence even as an Opposition. Lord Lansdowne during the interval kept together his political friends by means of his social amenities. The head-quarters of the Whigs was in the drawing room, and not in the House of Commons. Upon the return of the Whigs to power, which they held for ten years, Lord Lansdowne was President of the Council, and as leader of the Upper House pursued a course that kept his supporters in party order, and to some extent conciliated his opponents. Lord Lansdowne was again in office for six years during the Ministry of Lord John Russell, but it was evident that he did not court office, he did not seek the post of Premier, his ambition was for real power, not for high place, and his aspirations were under the control of his judgment. He did not fail, because he would not be seduced by a dazzling prospect to undertake that which he had not the strength to accomplish. In 1852, Lord Lansdowne announced his intention of finally retiring from the active duties of political life, but by the death of the Duke of Wellington, he was called on to assume the important function of advising the Monarch in the emergency caused by the resignation of Lord Derby in 1853. No one was more fitted for such an office. Lord Lansdowne was a party man, but respected by men of all parties. His views were not extreme. He was a moderate Free-Trader; and, on the question of Reform, he would have opposed any Radical measure that threatened the integrity of the Constitution with as much resolution as the most conservative peer of the realm. He had outlived the asperity of party warfare, and though he might not love Whiggery less than formerly, no one doubted that the venerable statesman would forget all party ties when he was called upon to advise his Sovereign as to the formation of a Ministry. The result of his counsel was the formation of the Aberdeen Cabinet, of which he consented to be a member, but without office. When the Aberdeen Ministry was overthrown, he continued to occupy a similar position in Lord Palmerston's Cabinet, which he retained until 1858. Since then he has devoted his time and attention to public affairs, and in him the House of Lords has lost a member whose counsels were always temperate and patriotic. The best tribute to his memory is that Conservative as well as Liberal organs have testified to his private and public virtues.

The biographer of Lord Lansdowne will have ample material for a work of absorbing interest. How the face of the world has changed since the late peer commenced his career as a Westminster school-boy. Then he attended the debates in the House of Commons, and listened to the harangues of Pitt, Burke, and Fox. He was in Parliament whilst this country was engaged in the mighty contest that ended in the overthrow of Napoleon, and the inauguration of forty years peace in Europe. He was a political veteran when the Reform Bill put an end to a political agitation that threatened to bring about a state of revolution. He lived to see the triumph of constitutionalism, the loyalty to the throne assured by the full liberty of speech and thought being granted to the people, and by the personal respect for the monarchical and domestic virtues of the sovereign. When he was young he must have heard bitter regrets that the American Colonies had been severed from the mother country; he lived to see England the mistress of a vast Indian Empire, the mother of flourishing colonies, and Australia become the heritage of the English race. He saw the early life of the United States, and the rapid development of the great Transatlantic Republic, and he lived to see that Federation dissolved and the prosperity of a Continent changed to ruin and disaster by the prosecution of a wicked and fruitless war. To the Marquis of Lansdowne Lord Macaulay owed his introduction to public life, and we cannot but regret that the Whig historian was not spared to bequeath to posterity a record of the character and conduct of the chief of his party. Many can, doubtless, do justice to the life of Lord Lansdowne; but no one can treat it so well, and perhaps so feelingly, as Lord Macaulay would have done if he had survived his early patron and his constant friend.

PARTY ORGANS ON THE PROSPECTS OF PARTIES.*

Our quarterly press occupies an exceptional and deservedly distinguished position. It is conducted with such ability that even in this age of intellectual activity it is the most satisfactory proof that can be adduced of our mental vigour. It appeals to that class which, so long as mind governs matter, will sway the destinies of England. A contributor to a Quarterly prepares his work with as much care as if he were about to publish a book upon the subject, and there are frequently articles that have cost more pains than books which have enhanced the reputation of their authors. It is, then, no wonder that our quarterly press should be so excellent in style; but besides its literary merit it has another claim on public respect. Quarterly reviewers are not necessarily journalists or even connected with literature. They do not work up a subject at the bidding of the editor to write an essay, but they write an essay because they happen to be especially familiar with the subject. This gives the utterances of the reviewer what we may call extrinsic weight. The name of the writer of such and such an essay is unknown to the public; but the reader is assured he is peculiarly fitted to deal with the subject. And this is even more true of the political essays. They are supposed to be the exposition of party views. When the Quarterly attacked Mr. Disraeli it caused a profound sensation, and the political article in the current number has been received as an announcement of the Conservative policy. Parliament meets to-day, and we are told that the present session will be marked by a severe struggle, on the one side for office and on the other for the retention of office. Whether this be so or not, we think it an opportune moment for presenting our readers with a summary of party views according to the Quarterlies. For these views, not we but the Quarterly, the Edinburgh, and the North British, are responsible.

Before giving the substance of the articles we must remark that there is no pretence for describing them as party pronunciamentos. They are reviews of the past and present and make no allusion to the future. The first on our list assails the Ministry for what it has done but it does not inform us what the Conservatives would do in the event of their accession to office; the second defends the proceedings of the Ministry; and, the third attacks the Conservatives for their conduct when in power. The article in the Quarterly is, in this respect, likely to injure the Conservative party with those who accept it as an authoritative party declaration. According to the law of England a man cannot be deprived of an estate merely because his title is bad, but the claimant to it must prove that he has a better, or rather a good title to it. So it is with political warfare. It is not enough for the Conservatives to expose the evil policy of the Liberals; but if they are to obtain that public confidence which will alone make their accession to office probable, and their possession of power lasting, they must frankly avow their own policy. What the people of this country insist on is, that a Ministry shall have an avowed policy on all leading questions. It will not do to profess sympathy with the progress of Italy, and to point out that the proceedings of Lord Russell with regard to it have been prejudicial to the true interests of Italy, without frankly stating how the Conservatives would have acted, or are prepared to act. But the most remarkable instance of this reticence is in regard to America. The Quarterly reviewer does not think it worth his while to devote a separate paragraph to that momentous and absorbing topic, but gives just three lines to it in a miscellaneous paragraph, inserting them between a passing observation about Italy and a reference to garotting. And the three lines are singularly uncertain in their tone. The reviewer says: "Whatever may have been the merits of American policy, we have obtained in that quarter simply the hatred of the North, the contempt of the South, and the ruin of the staple industry of England." Whether the reviewer approves or disapproves of the American policy of the Government is not very clear. We presume he disapproves of it, yet hesitates to announce the policy of his party. If the Conservative leaders are equally reticent, their cause will be damaged in the estimation of Englishmen. But on such a question long continued silence, now that Parliament has assembled, is impossible.

The Quarterly reviewer ascribes the chief difficulties of Lord Palmerston to the compromise he had to make in order to obtain a majority in the House of Commons. He had to conciliate the Peelites and the Radicals. The first were won by office, even Mr. Gladstone, who had voted against him in the division that unseated Lord Derby being included in the Cabinet. The Radicals were difficult to satisfy. They were urgent for Reform; but there are two points upon which Lord Palmerston "entertains a sincere belief—the danger of invasion and the danger of democracy." Reform was promised, the promise could not be fulfilled, and the Radicals had to be compensated in other ways. Mr. Milner Gibson was admitted into the Cabinet; Mr. Cobden, having refused a seat in the Cabinet, was sent as a special envoy to the first Court in Europe; and Mr. Bright was gratified by the compulsory passage of the Paper Duties Bill through the House of Lords. The Church was offered to the Dissenting Radicals as a victim, and would have been seriously injured but for "the general movement among Churchmen, which had had so striking an influence in opening the eyes of the present House of Commons to Dissenting fallacies." The scheme for depriving the Church of the education of the people was defeated in Parliament, but in the Privy Council Office Mr. Lowe is striking a far more deadly blow by "turning Church schools from Church purposes to other purposes." The sentimental Radicals have been propitiated by the profession of sympathy with Italy. The effect of the policy of the Government has been to make the Italians determined to possess Rome, the Roman Catholic Church to believe that its very existence depends upon retaining possession of the temporalities, and to force the French Emperor to put a veto upon the aggressive projects of Turin. By these means, "Italy may be placed in a dilemma from which the wisdom of many statesmen and the devotion of many patriots may fail to extricate her." In regard to finance Lord Palmerston is remarkably inconsistent. In 1857 Sir Cornwall Lewis, his then Chancellor of the Exchequer, advised the policy of taxes being laid in small per centages on a vast variety of articles; in 1860 Mr. Gladstone, his then Chancellor of the Exchequer, enunciated the doctrine that the revenue should be raised by heavy taxes laid upon a few articles of universal consumption. This fiscal policy, and the reward demanded by Messrs. Cobden and Bright for shelving Reform, have brought upon us the loss of the Ionian Isles. They are given up to decrease the army estimates and to console the Democracy for many failures by compensating "in some slender degree the disruption of America, by commencing the process of disintegrating the empire of England." The Ionian Isles have been ceded during the recess, at a time when Parliament could not protest, though it was not necessary to make the sacrifice so hurriedly—a sacrifice not demanded by any agitation—and to give them to Greece whilst Greece was without a Government and in a state of political anarchy. It is too much that Ministers "should assume of their own will, profiting by the absence of Parliament, to reverse the policy of fifty years, to straiten for all generations the power of their countrymen, and to strip the empire of their Sovereign of one of its most important bulwarks." Lord Palmerston has played off, in consequence of Mr. Gladstone's reputed opinions, the Conservatives against the Radicals with great tact; but are we always to be thus governed? The tactics of the Government inflict severe injury upon the public morality of the country. It is a system of corruption, less disgraceful than Sir Robert Walpole's, because veiled, but on that account more dangerous. It is an advantage that the Reform spectre has been laid; but we must beware of the continuance of the system. "The low morality and humiliating requirements of political life among the Americans have excluded from its arena anything like high honour or commanding talent; and the result is being worked out before our eyes. Let us look to it in time, lest their fate become our own."

The Edinburgh Reviewer ascribes the complete absence of party strife to the personal popularity of Lord Palmerston, who "has, to a great extent, outlived the distinctions of party;" and secondly, to the progress of political knowledge. The present Administration has not been encouraged by the temper of the country, or by its own supporters, to attempt organic reforms, but, nevertheless, it has had to discharge grave and difficult duties. The defences of the country, involving large expenditure, the remodeling of our Indian Empire, Church affairs, international law, Italy, Greece, Denmark ("we cannot believe" says the reviewer "that the British Government has intentionally departed from any of the principles which have regulated its policy in the Danish question for the last fifteen years") and, above all, America, have engaged the earnest attention of the Government; and these are national, not party, questions. In the present session it is presumed the War Department will give effect to the Report of the Commission on the Volunteer forces, and propose a vote of money large enough to meet certain charges that ought not to be thrown on the Volunteers, but not so large as to do away with that independence "which is the life of Volunteer organization." Holding that the fear of invasion would not be reasonable in time of war, and that it is a bugbear in time of peace, the reviewer cannot give an unqualified assent to the fortifications now erecting. Some are, no doubt, urgently required, but not such a line of defences as we have traced round Plymouth and Portsmouth. "Of all the permanent marks of the ascendancy which Lord Palmerston has acquired and exercised over Parliament, his own colleagues, and the country, none will be more surprising to posterity than these prodigious fortifications, on which upwards of ten millions sterling will ere long have been expended." We cannot hope to save much money by the reduction of our army; but the colonies now enjoying self Government ought to provide for the cost of their defence, which in 1859-60 was £2,000,000, of which the colonies paid about £300,000. The defence of Gibraltar, Malta, and the Ionian Islands cost £1,200,000. The distress in Lancashire deserves serious consideration. The system of parochial poor law relief has not had a fair trial. On the 1st of September there was £3,750,000 in the local savings' banks, besides the money invested in Building funds and associated property, and "there is reason to believe that very large sums are held by the various committees of the trades' unions, which are reserved for the emergencies of strikes, and have not been used in the present distress of the manufacturing population." Absorption into other trades and emigration are the best remedies to apply.

Occurrences like this powerfully remind us how precarious, after all, is the tenure of the prosperity based on the complicated structure of modern society. Change but one of the conditions of our daily life, and a million of men may starve. The export of a pod from a certain portion of America is stopped, and a dozen towns of Lancashire are desolate. So it was, but from natural causes, that a potato blight decimated the population of Ireland, and changed the face of the land; an aphid, brought to light in a grape-house at Clapham, spread over the habitable globe, and for years destroyed the fruit of the vine; an epidemic seized upon the worm which spins our silk, and the rich towns of Lombardy were impoverished, the weavers of the costly tissues of Lyons were beggared. If a coccus were some day to appear in an ear of wheat, an immense fraction of the human race might perish. These are the visitations, mysterious and destructive as the plagues of Egypt, which from time to time arrest the growth of population and of wealth. War alone, when it rages with the ferocity now displayed in the United States, may undo the work of a century. And it is not impossible to recognize, in the course of human affairs, the irregular but not less certain recurrence of causes which belie and confound the unlimited pretensions of human progress. With puerile complacency. President Lincoln has sought in his recent Message to Congress, to turn attention from the miseries of the present to the splendid prospect of two hundred millions of free American citizens covering, in the next century, the Western continent with wealth, knowledge, and freedom. Alas! does not this Alaschar of the West perceive that at this very moment causes are in active operation which will set bounds to these dreams, and which may, before the present century is completed, depopulate the most fertile regions of the globe!

The foreign policy of the Government has exercised a beneficent influence on the Continent, and "without firing a shot, it has made us respected abroad, and contributed to the progress of freedom and good government."

With respect to America, the reviewer treats us to a very able and valuable argument as to the right and duty of recognition. There are three degrees of recognition.—First, the bare recognition of belligerent rights; second, the establishment of diplomatic relations with the seceding States, accompanied by treaties of commerce and amity; third, a direct alliance amounting to interference in the quarrel. The first we were bound to make, the second we may make according to the prospects of the war and our own interests; and this moral recognition is not "a ground for remonstrance, much less of war."

It has been argued with considerable ability and authority, that foreign States are not warranted by the law of nations in extending their recognition to a province or colony contending for its independence, unless the contest be already terminated by the admission of the mother State, or unless, at least, the contest is so far advanced as to leave no doubt of the ultimate success of the separatists, and of the fact that they have actually established a lasting independent Government.

These propositions appear to us to call for some farther investigation by the light of precedents and of principles. It would be easy to quote numerous examples of a different, perhaps an opposite character. Thus to go back as far as the sixteenth century, at the time of the insurrection of the Netherlands against Spain, England at once entered into negotiations with them, and when they declared their independence in 1585, English agents were sent to Antwerp, and a treaty of alliance was concluded in the same year; yet the manifesto of Elizabeth, proclaiming her interest in the Low Countries, did not lead to an immediate rupture with Spain, though it was ultimately followed by war. The independence of the Netherlands was recognized by all the Powers of Europe, before it was acknowledged (in 1648) by Spain. In 1660, the Portuguese threw off the Spanish yoke, and raised the House of Braganza to the throne; the independence of Portugal was recognized within a year by England, France, and the Northern Courts; Spain only acknowledged the loss of the subject kingdom in 1668. These precedents were invoked by the American emissaries of 1777 to the Court of France; and within twenty months of the Declaration of Independence, France consented to espouse the cause of the young Republic. It is true that this was done on grounds of policy avowedly hostile to England, to avenge the loss of Canada fifteen years before. But the French rested their right to recognize the American Government on the simple fact that they were "in full possession" of their independence. The answer of the Court of St. James's was drawn up by Gibbon, and may be read in the fourth volume of his miscellaneous works; but he treats the question as an act of treacherous hostility, and repudiates, not so much the recognition, as the intervention, of a foreign State.

The next case was that of Greece, which it also fell to the lot of Mr. Canning to decide. When the Greek insurrection broke out in 1820, the British Government professed, and designed to maintain, a strict neutrality; but it was compelled, in obedience to the principles we have already adverted to, to acknowledge the belligerent character of the insurgents. In spite of the heroic resistance of the Greeks to the Turkish armies, they were, at the end of five or six years, exhausted by the unequal contest. Mr. Canning proffered the mediation of England, but it was indignantly rejected by the Porte. At length, in 1826, a protocol was signed by the Duke of Wellington at St. Petersburg, which virtually recognized the independence of Greece, at least on the footing of the other Christian Hospodarates. Turkey still resisted; and at length the battle of Navarino and the peace of Adrianople settled the question. In this case it is important to remark that the Christian Powers interfered and recognized the independence of Greece not because the contest was over, or because there was any well-grounded hope of the triumph of the insurgents, but precisely for the opposite reason. In 1826 it was apparent that the Greeks could not maintain their independence—that they must be beaten, if left to struggle single-handed against the whole power of Mahomet—and therefore, on grounds of humanity and policy, the Christian Powers interposed, even by force of arms, to extort from Turkey the recognition of their freedom.

On the last case, which is that of Belgium, it is hardly necessary to dwell, though in this case also France and England proceeded to recognize the independence of Belgium, not because that independence was already virtually established, but, on the contrary, because it could not have been established without their recognition and support. The King of the Netherlands had, in the first instance, appealed to the Conference to uphold the Treaties of 1815, which had placed Belgium under his sceptre. Two of the Powers refused to support his pretensions. They even compelled him to yield to terms, and terminated the quarrel by overruling almost all his claims.

With due respect, therefore, for the claims of a people now struggling with great difficulties and perils, and with entire deference to the principles of justice and law which may fairly be applied to the subject, we arrive at the conclusion that the conduct of the European Powers, and of England in particular, ought to be governed, not by any extreme consideration for either party in the United or disunited States, not by any imaginary restriction of law, but by the interest of our own fellow-subjects rightly understood. We hold that the war has continued long enough to give us full liberty of action; and we think it may fairly be assumed that whatever be the result of the struggle, it cannot restore the Union to its former condition. For all practical purposes, as regards the Southern States, the Union has ceased to exist. But owing to the terms of the late American Constitution, the Union alone represented the members of which it was federally composed in their foreign relations. Hence we are led back to the argument Mr. Canning applied to the case of the Spanish Colonies when he pointed out the absurdity of "the total irresponsibility of unrecognized States." Europe has many and great interests in the South: how are they to be protected? how are her rights to be enforced? An appeal to the Cabinet of Washington against an outrage in Alabama would be a bootless absurdity. Even the Federal treaties can no longer be enforced in Southern ports, where foreign Consuls have now no more than a nominal authority. It is only by direct intercourse with the rulers of the South that these necessary conditions of daily life can be renewed. This state of things cannot last. A population of eight or ten millions, inhabiting a vast maritime territory, cannot be obliterated. Quite independently of any feeling for either side in this quarrel, and without any hostility to the North, the time is approaching when our relations with both fractions of the country must be placed on the same footing. Our policy ought not to be governed either by sympathy or by hostility to either party, but by "the plain and legitimate interest of the nation," which is confided to the Ministers of the Crown.

We have not space to do justice to the article in the North British. It is too full of thought and suggestion to be summarised in a few lines. It traces the present confusion of parties to the defection of Sir Robert Peel, and to the refusal of the Conservatives to follow their great leader, and in adopting Protection as their principle. Lord Palmerston's popularity is due to his exposition of foreign policy in 1850, to his disinterestedness when he consented to take the office of Home Secretary, and to his courage when in pressing emergency he accepted the post of Premier. We now occupy "a dignified position abroad," and have recovered from "Lord Malmesbury's feeble diplomacy." The foreign policy and the leaders of the Opposition excite the hostility "of the cultivated intelligence of the country." Mr. Disraeli's political career has not been long, but it has been marked by violent contrasts. Thirty years ago he was with Hume and O'Connell, and advocated Triennial Parliaments and Vote by Ballot. He was a Free-Trader before he was a Protectionist. He hates the middle-class. In 1858 he dragged his party through the mire by an alliance with the Radicals, and he is about, if he can, to play the same game over again. In spite of the warning in the Quarterly, Mr. Disraeli clings to the neck of the Tory party. But though the Government is safe, the position of the Liberal party is not satisfactory. The independent Liberals must remember that nothing can be done in politics without compromise, and that it is their duty to rally to the support of the Liberal Government.

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT DAVIS TO THE LEGISLATURE OF MISSISSIPPI.

DELIVERED IN THE HALL OF REPRESENTATIVES, JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI, DECEMBER 26, 1862.

Friends and Fellow-Citizens, Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, and Senate of the State of Mississippi:—

After an absence of nearly two years I again find myself among those who, from the days of my childhood, have ever been the trusted objects of my affections, those for whose good I have ever striven, and whose interests I have sometimes hoped I may have contributed to subserve. Whatever fortunes I may have achieved in life have been gained as a representative of Mississippi, and before all, I have laboured for the advancement of her glory and honour. I now, for the first time in my career, find myself the representative of a wider circle of interest, but a circle in which the interests of Mississippi are still embraced. Two years ago, nearly, I left you to assume the duties which had devolved on me as the representative of the new Confederacy. The responsibilities of this position have occupied all my time, and have left me no opportunity for mingling with my friends in Mississippi, or for sharing in the dangers which have menaced them. But, wherever duty may have called me, my heart has been with you and the success of the cause in which we are all engaged has been first in my thoughts and prayers. I thought when I left Mississippi that the service to which I was called would prove to be but temporary. The last time I had the honour of addressing you from this stand I was influenced by that idea. I then imagined that it might be my fortune again to lead Mississippians in the field, and to be with them where danger was to be braved and glory won. I thought to find that place which I believed to be suited to my capacity, that of an officer in service of the State of Mississippi. For, although in the discharge of my duties as President of the Confederate States, I had determined to make no distinction between the various parts of the country—to know no separate State—yet my heart has always beat more warmly for Mississippi, and I have looked on Mississippi soldiers with a pride and emotion such as no others inspired. But it was decided differently. I was called to another sphere of action. How, in that sphere I have discharged the duties and obligations imposed on me, it does not become me to constitute myself the judge. It is for others to decide that question. But, speaking to you with that frankness and that confidence with which I have always spoken to you, and which partakes of the nature of thinking aloud, I can say with my hand upon my heart, that whatever I have done, has been done with the sincere purpose of promoting the noble cause in which we are engaged. The period which elapsed since I left you is short; for the time which may appear long in the life of man is short in the history of a nation. And in that short period remarkable changes have been wrought in all the circumstances by which we are surrounded. At the time of which I speak the question presented to our people was, "Will there be war?" This was the subject of universal speculation. We had chosen to exercise an indisputable right—the right to separate from those with whom we conceived association to be no longer possible, and to establish a Government of our own. I was among those who, from the beginning, predicted war as the consequences of secession, although I must admit that the contest has assumed proportions more gigantic than I had anticipated. I predicted war, not because our right to secede and to form a government of our own was not indisputable and clearly defined in the spirit of that declaration which rests the right to govern on the consent of the governed, but saw that the wickedness of the North would precipitate a war upon us. Those who supposed that the exercise of this right of separation could not produce war, have had cause to be convinced that they had credited their recent associates of the North with a moderation, a sagacity, a morality they did not possess. You have been involved in a war waged for the gratification of the lust of power and of aggrandizement, for your conquest and your subjugation, with a malignant ferocity and with a disregard and a contempt of the usages of civilization entire unequalled in history. Such, I have ever warned you, were the characteristics of the Northern people—of those with whom our ancestors entered into a union of consent, and with whom they formed a constitutional compact. And yet, such was the attachment of our people for that Union, such their devotion to it, that those who desired preparation to be made for the inevitable conflict were denounced as men who wished to destroy the Union. After what has happened during the last two years, my only wonder is that we consented to live for so long a time in association with such miscreants, and have loved so much a Government rotten to the core. Were it ever to be proposed again to enter into a union with such a people, I could no more consent to do it than to trust myself in a den of thieves.

You in Mississippi have but little experienced as yet the horrors of the war. You have seen but little of the savage manner in which it is waged by your barbarous enemies. It has been my fortune to witness it in all its terrors; in a part of the country where old men have been torn from their homes, carried into captivity and immured in distant dungeons, and where delicate women have been insulted by a brutal soldiery and forced even to cook for the dirty Federal invaders; where property has been wantonly destroyed, the country ravaged, and every outrage committed. And it is with these people that our fathers formed a union and a solemn compact. There is indeed a difference between the two peoples. Let no man hug the delusion that there can be renewed an association between them. Our enemies are a traditionless and a homeless race; from the time of Cromwell to the present time they have been disturbers of the peace of the world. Gathered together by Cromwell from the bogs and fens of the north of Ireland and of England, they commenced by disturbing the peace of their own country; they disturbed Holland, to which they fled, and they disturbed England on their return. They persecuted Catholics in England, and they hung Quakers and witches in America. Having been hurried into a war with a people so devoid of every mark of civilization you have no doubt wondered that I have not carried out the policy which I had intended should be our policy, of fighting our battles on the fields of the enemy instead of suffering him to fight them on ours. This was not the result of my will, but of the power of the enemy. They had at their command all the accumulated wealth of seventy years—the military stores which had been laid up during that time. They had grown rich from the taxes wrung from you for the establishing and supporting their manufacturing institutions. We have entered upon a conflict with a nation contiguous to us in territory, and vastly superior to us in numbers. In the face of these facts the wonder is not that we have done little, but that we have done so much. In the first year of the war our forces were sent into the field poorly armed, and were far inferior in number to the enemy. We were compelled even to arm ourselves by the capture of weapons taken from the foe on the battlefield. Thus in every battle we exchanged our arms for those of the invaders. At the end of twelve months of the war, it was still necessary for us to adopt some expedient to enable us to maintain our ground. The only expedient remaining to us was to call on those brave men who had entered the service of their country at the beginning of the war, supposing that the conflict was to last but a short time, and that they would not be long absent from their homes; the only expedient, I say, was to call on these gallant men; to ask them to maintain their position in front of the enemy, and to surrender for a time their hopes of soon returning to their families and friends. And nobly did they respond to the call. They answered that they were willing to stay, that they were willing to maintain their position and to breast the tide of invasion. But it was not just that they should stand alone. They asked that the men who had stayed at home—who had thus far been sluggards in the cause—should be forced, likewise, to meet the enemy. From this resulted the law of Congress, which is known as the Conscription Act, which declared all men, from the age of eighteen to the age of thirty five, to be liable to enrolment in the Confederate service. I regret that there has been some prejudice excited against the act, and that it has been subjected to harsher criticism than it deserves. And here I may say that an erroneous impression appears to prevail in regard to this act. It is no disgrace to be brought into the army by conscription. There is no more reason to expect from the citizen voluntary service in the army than to expect voluntary labour on the public roads or the voluntary payment of taxes. But these things we do not expect. We assess the property of the citizen, we appoint tax-gatherers; why should we not likewise distribute equally the labour, and enforce equally the obligation of defending the country from its enemies? I repeat that it is no disgrace to any one to be conscripted, but it is a glory for those who do not wait for the conscription. Thus resulted the Conscription Act; and thence arose the necessity for the Conscription Act. The necessity was met; but when it was found that under these acts enough men were not drawn into the ranks of the army to fulfil the purpose intended, it became necessary to pass another Conscription Act, and another Conscription Act. It is only of this latter that I desire to speak. Its policy was to leave at home those men needed to conduct the administration, and those who might be required to support and maintain the industry of the country—in other words, to exempt from military service those whose labour, employed in other avocations might be more profitable to the country and to the Government, than in the ranks of the army.

Permit me now to say that I have seen with peculiar pleasure the recommendation of your Governor in his Message, to make some provision for the families of absent soldiers of Mississippi. Let this provision be made for the objects of his affection and his solicitude, and the soldier engaged in fighting the battles of his country will no longer be disturbed in his slumber by dreams of an unprotected and neglected family at home. Let him know that his mother Mississippi has spread her protecting mantle over those he loves, and he will be ready to fight your battles, to protect your honour, and in your cause to die. There is another one of the Governor's propositions to which I wish to allude. I mean the proposition to call upon those citizens who are not subject to the Confederate conscription law, and to form them into a reserve corps for the purpose of aiding in the defence of the State. Men who are exempted by law from the performance of any duty do not generally feel the obligation to perform that duty unless called upon by the law. But I am confident that the men of Mississippi have only to know that their soil is invaded, their cities menaced, to rush to meet the enemy, even if they serve only for thirty days. I see no reason why the State may not, in an exigency like that which now presses on her, call on her reserved forces and organize them for service. Such troops could be of material benefit, by serving in entrenchments, and thus relieving the veteran and disciplined soldiers for the duties of the field, where discipline is so much needed. At the end of a short term of service they could return to their homes and to their ordinary avocations, resuming those duties necessary to the public prosperity.

In considering the manner in which the war has been conducted by the enemy, nothing arrests the attention more than the magnitude of the preparations made for our subjugation. Immense navies have been constructed, vast armies have been accumulated, for the purpose of crushing out the rebellion. It has been impossible for us to meet them in equal numbers; nor have we required it. We have often whipped them three to one; and in the eventful battle of Antietam, Lee whipped them four to one. But do not understand me as saying that this will always be the case. When the troops of the enemy become disciplined, and accustomed to the obedience of the camp, they will necessarily approach more nearly to an equality with our own men. We have always whipped them, in spite of disparity of numbers; and on any fair field, fighting as man to man, and relying only on those natural qualities which men are endowed, we should not fear to meet them in the proportion of one to two. But troops must be disciplined in order to develop their efficiency, and in order to keep them at their posts. Above all, to assure this result, we need the support of public opinion. We want public opinion to frown down those who come from the army with sad tales of disaster and prophecies of evil, and who skulk from the duties they owe their country. We rely on the women of the land to turn back to these deserters from the ranks. I thank the Governor for asking the Legislature to make the people of the State tributary to this service. In addition to this, it is necessary to fill up those regiments which have for so long a time been serving in the field. They have stood before the foe on many hard fought fields, and have proven their courage and devotion on all. They have won the admiration of the army and of the country. And here I to day repeat a compliment I have heard which, although it seems to partake of levity, appears an illustration of the esteem in which Mississippians are held. It happened that several persons were conversing of a certain battle, and one of them remarked, that the Mississippians did not run. "Oh, no!" said another, "Mississippians never run." But those who have passed through thirteen pitched battles are not unscathed. Their ranks are thinned, and they look back to Mississippi for aid to augment their diminished numbers. They look back expecting their brothers to fly to their rescue; but it sometimes seems as if the long anticipated relief would never come. A brigade which may consist only of 1200 men is expected to do the work of 4000. Humanity demands that these depleted regiments be filled up. A mere skeleton cannot reasonably be expected to perform the labour of a body with all its flesh and muscle on it. You may have many who might assist in revivifying your reduced regiments—enough to fill up the ranks if they would only consent to throw off the shackles of private interest, and devote themselves to the noblest cause in which a man can be engaged. You have now in the field old men and gentle boys who have braved all the terrors and dangers of war. I remember an instance of one of these, a brave and gallant youth, who, I was told, was but sixteen years of age. In one of those bloody battles by which the soil of Virginia has been consecrated to liberty, he was twice wounded, and each time bound up the wound with his own hands, while refusing to leave the field. A third time he was struck, and the life-blood flowed in a crimson stream from his breast. His brother came to him to minister to his wants, but the noble boy said:—"Brother, you cannot do me any good now; go where you can do the Federals most harm." Even then, while lying on the ground, his young life fast ebbing away, he cocked his rifle, and aimed it to take one last shot at the enemy. And so he died, a hero and a martyr. This was one of the boys whose name sheds glory on Mississippi, and who, looking back from their distant camps, where they stand prepared to fight your battles, and to turn back the tide of Federal invasion, ask you now to send them aid in the struggle—to send them men to stand by them in the day of trial, on the right hand and on the left.

I may say here that I did not expect the Confederate enrolling officers to carry on the work of conscription. I relied for this upon the aid of the State authorities. I supposed that State officers would enroll the conscripts within the limits of their respective States, and that Confederate officers would then receive them in camps of instruction. This I believed to be the policy of your Governor's arguments. We cannot too strongly enforce the necessity of harmony between the Confederate Government and the State Government. They must act together if our cause is to be brought to a successful issue. Of this you may rest assured, whatever the Confederate Government can do for the defence of Mississippi will be done. I feel equal confidence that whatever Mississippi can do will likewise be done. It undoubtedly requires legislation to cause men to perform those duties which are purely legal. Men are not apt to feel any obligation to discharge duties from which they may have been exempted. Ours is a representative Government, and it is only through the operation of the law that the obligations towards it can be equally distributed. When the last Congress proclaimed that a certain number of men were required to fill up the ranks of the army, that class of men who were already in the field and who were retained in service, would not have been satisfied had there been no conscription of those who had remained at home. I may state also, that I believe this to be the true theory for the military defence of the Confederacy. Cast your eyes forward to that time at the end of the war, when peace shall nominally be proclaimed—for peace between us and our hated enemy will be liable to be broken at short intervals for many years to come—cast your eyes forward to that time, and you will see the necessity for continued preparation and unceasing watchfulness. We have but few men in our country who will be willing to enlist in the army for a soldier's pay. But if every young man shall have served for two or three years in the army, he will be prepared when war comes to go into camp, and take his place in the ranks, an educated and disciplined soldier. Serving among his equals, his friends and his neighbours, he will find in the army no distinction of class. To such a system I am sure there can be no objection.

The issue before us is one of no ordinary character. We are not engaged in a conflict for conquest, or for aggrandizement, or for the settlement of a point of international law. The question for you to decide is, "Will you be slaves or will you be independent?" Will you transmit to your children the freedom and equality which your fathers transmitted to you, or will you bow down in adoration before an idol baser than ever was worshipped by Eastern idolaters? Nothing more is necessary than the mere statement of this issue. What ever may be the personal sacrifices involved, I am surprised that you will not shrink from them whenever the question comes before you. Those men who now assail us, who have been associated with us in a common Union, who have inherited a Government which they claim to be the best the world ever saw—these men when left to themselves, have shown that they are incapable of preserving their own personal liberty. They have destroyed the freedom of the press; they have seized upon and imprisoned members of State Legislatures and of municipal councils, who were suspected of sympathy with the South. Men have been carried off into captivity in distant States without indictment, without a knowledge of the accusations brought against them, in utter defiance of all rights guaranteed by the institutions under which they live. These people, when separated from the South and left entirely to themselves, have, in six months, demonstrated their utter incapacity for self-government. And yet these are the people who claim to be your masters. These are the people who have determined to divide out the South among their Federal troops. Mississippi they have devoted to the direst vengeance of all. "But vengeance is the Lord's," and beneath His banner you will meet and hurl back these worse than vandal hordes.

The great end and aim of the Government is to make our struggle successful. The men who stand highest in this contest would fall the first sacrifice to the vengeance of the enemy in case we should be successful. You may rest assured then, for that reason if for no other, that whatever capacity they possess will be devoted to securing the independence of the country. Our Government is not like the monarchies of the Old World, resting for support upon armies and navies. It sprang from the people, and the confidence of the people is necessary for its success. When misrepresentations of the Government have been circulated, when accusations have been brought against it of weakness and inefficiency, often have I felt in my heart the struggle between the desire for justice and the duty not to give information to the enemy—because at such time the correction of the error would have been injurious to the safety of the cause. Thus, that great and good man, General A. S. Johnston, was contented to rest beneath public contumely and to be pointed at by the finger of scorn, because he did not advance from Bowling Green with the little army under his command. But month after month he maintained his post, keeping the enemy ignorant of the paucity of his numbers, and thus holding the invaders in check. I take this case as one instance; it is not the only one by far.

The issue then being: Will you be slaves? will you consent to be robbed of your property? will you renounce the exercise of those rights with which you were born and which were transmitted to you by your fathers? I feel that in addressing Mississippians the answer will be that their interests, even life itself should be willingly laid down upon the altar of their country.

By the memories of the past; by the glories of the field of Chalmette, where the Mississippians, in a general order of the day, were addressed as the bravest of the brave; by the glorious dead of Mexico; by the still more glorious dead of the battle-fields of the Confederacy; by the desolate widows and orphans, whom the martyrs of the war have left behind them; by your maimed and wounded heroes—I invoke you not to delay a moment, but to rush forward and place yourself at the disposal of the State. I have been one of those who, from the beginning, looked forward to a long and bloody war; but I must frankly confess that its magnitude has exceeded my expectations. The enemy have displayed more power and energy and resources than I had attributed to them. Their finances have held out far better than I imagined would be the case. But I am also one of those who felt that our final success was certain, and that our people had only to be true to themselves to behold the Confederate flag among the recognized nations of the earth. The question is only one of time. It may be remote, but it may be nearer than many people suppose. It is not possible that a war of the dimensions that this one has assumed, of proportions so gigantic, can be very long protracted. The combatants must be soon exhausted. But it is impossible, with a cause like ours, we can be the first to cry, "Hold, enough."

The sacrifices which have already been made have perhaps fallen heavily upon a portion of the people, especially upon the noble little city of Vicksburg. After Memphis and New Orleans had fallen, two points which were considered to be admirably defended, two points which we had no reason to believe would fall, Vicksburg became the object of attack. A few earthworks were thrown up, a few guns were mounted, and Vicksburg received the shock of both fleets; the one which, under Commoire Foote, had descended the river, and the one which, under Farragut, had achieved the capture of New Orleans. Nobly did the little city receive the assault, and even the women said, "Rather than surrender, let us give them the soil, but with the ashes of our dwellings upon it."

This was the heroic devotion of a people who deserve to be free. Your Governor left his chair, and went himself to the scene of danger. Nothing more profoundly touched me amid my duties in a distant land, than to hear that the chief magistrate of my own State was defending the town which the enemy had made the object of his attack, and that the defence was successful. Now we are far better prepared in that quarter. The works, then weak, have been greatly strengthened; the troops assigned for their defence are better disciplined and better instructed, and that gallant soldier who came with me has been pouring in his forces to assist in its protection. Himself, the son of a Revolutionary hero, he has emulated his father's glorious example upon other fields, and comes to Mississippi to defend, and, I believe, to protect you.

In the course of this war our eyes have been often turned abroad. We have expected sometimes recognition and sometimes intervention at the hands of foreign nations, and we have had a right to expect it. Never before in the history of the world had a people for so long a time maintained their ground and showed themselves capable of maintaining their national existence, without securing the recognition of commercial nations. I know not why this has been so, but I say, "Put not your trust in princes," and rest not you hopes on foreign nations. This war is ours; we must fight it out ourselves, and I feel some pride in knowing that so far we have done it without the good-will of anybody. It is true that there are now symptoms of a change in public opinion abroad. They give us their admiration—they sometimes even say to us God speed!—and in the remarkable book written by Mr. Spence the question of secession has been discussed with more of ability than it ever has been, even in this country. Yet England still holds back, but France, the ally of other days, seems disposed to hold out to us the hand of fellowship. And when France holds out to us her hand, right willingly will we grasp it.

There are now two prominent objects in the programme of the enemy. One is to get possession of the Mississippi River, and to open it to navigation in order to appease the clamours of the West, and to utilize the capture of New Orleans, which has thus far rendered them no service. The other is to seize upon the capital of the Confederacy, and hold this out as a proof that the Confederacy has no existence. We have recently repulsed them at Fredericksburg, and I believe that under God and by the valour of our troops, the capital of the Confederacy will stand safe behind its wall of living breasts. Vicksburg and Port Hudson have been strengthened, and now we can concentrate at either of them a force sufficient for their protection. I have confidence that Vicksburg will stand as before, and I hope that Johnston will find generals to support him if the enemy dare to land. Port Hudson is now strong. Vicksburg will stand, and Port Hudson will stand; but let every man that can be spared from other vocations hasten to defend them, and thus hold the Mississippi River, that great artery of the Confederacy, preserve our communications with the trans-Mississippi department, and thwart the enemy's scheme of forcing navigation through to New Orleans. By holding that section of the river between Port Hudson and Vicksburg we shall secure these results, and the people of the West, cut off from New Orleans, will be driven to the East to seek a market for their products, and will be compelled to pay so much in the way of freights, that those products will be rendered almost valueless. Thus, I should not be surprised if the first day-break of peace were to dawn upon us from that quarter.

Some time since, for reasons not necessary to recapitulate, I sent to this State a general unknown to most of you, and, perhaps, even by name, known but to few among you. This was the land of my affections. Here were situated the little of worldly goals I possessed. I selected a general, who, in my view, was capable of defending my State and discharging the duties of this important service. I am happy to state, after an attentive examination, that I have not been mistaken in the general of my choice. I find that, during his administration here everything has been done that could be accomplished with the means at his command. I recommend him to your confidence as you may have confidence in me, who selected him. For the defence of Vicksburg I selected one from the Army of the Potomac, of whom it is but faint praise to say he has no superior. He was sent to Virginia at the beginning of the war, with a little battery of three guns. With these he fought the Yankee gunboats, drove them off, and stripped them of their terrors. He was promoted for distinguished services on various fields. He was finally made a colonel of cavalry, and I have reason to believe that, at the last great conflict on the field of Manassas he served to turn the tide of battle and consummate the victory.

On succeeding fields he has won equal distinction. Though yet young he has fought more battles than many officers who have lived to an advanced age and died in their beds. I have therefore sent Lee to take charge of the defences of Vicksburg. I have every confidence in the skill and energy of the officers in command. But when I received despatches and heard rumours of alarm and trepidation and despondency among the people of Mississippi; when I heard even that people were fleeing to Texas in order to save themselves from the enemy; when I saw it stated by the enemy that they had handled other States with gloves, but Mississippi was to be handled without gloves, every impulse of my heart dragged me hither in spite of duties which might have claimed my attention elsewhere. When I heard of the sufferings of my own people, of the danger of their subjugation by a ruthless foe, I felt that if Mississippi were destined for such a fate, I would wish to sleep in her soil. On my way here I stopped at the headquarters of General Johnston. I knew his capacity and his resolution. I imparted to him my own thoughts and asked him to come with me. I found that his ideas were directed in the same channel. He came in the shortest time for preparation; but whatever man can do will be done by him. I have perfect confidence that with your assistance and support he will drive the enemy from the soil of Mississippi. After having visited the army—after having mingled among the people of the State—I shall go away from among you with a lighter heart. I do not think the people of Mississippi are despondent or depressed; those who are so are those on whom the iron tread of the invader has fallen, or those who, skulking from their duty, go home with fearful tales to justify their desertion.

Nor is the army despondent; on the contrary, it is confident of victory. At Grenada I found the only regret to be that the enemy had not come on. At Vicksburg, even without reinforcements, the troops did not dream of defeat. I go, therefore, anxious but hopeful. My attachment to Mississippi, and my esteem for her people, have risen since the war began. I have been proud of her soldiers. I have endeavoured to conceal my pride, for I wished to make no distinction between the States of the Confederacy; but I cannot deny that my heart has warmed with a livelier emotion when I have seen those letters upon the boy's caps that have marked him for a Mississippian. Man's affections are not subject to his will; mine are fixed upon Mississippi. And when I return to where I shall find Mississippians fighting for you in a distant State, when I shall tell them that you are safe here, that you can be defended without calling upon them, and that they are necessary to guard the capital, and to prevent the inroads of the enemy in Georgia and Alabama, I shall be proud to say to them for you that they are welcome to stay.

As to the States on the other side of the Mississippi I can say that their future is bright. The army is organized and disciplined, and it is to be hoped that at no distant day it may be able to advance into that land which has been trodden under the feet of despotism, where old men have been torn from their homes and immured in dungeons, where even the women have been subjected to the insults of the brutal Federal soldiery—that under the flag of the Confederacy Missouri will again be free.

Kentucky, too, that gallant State whose cause is our cause, the gallantry of whose sons has never been questioned, is still the object of the ardent wishes of General Bragg. I heard him say, in an address to his troops, that he hoped again to lead them into Kentucky, and to the banks of the Ohio River.

I can then say with confidence that our condition is in every respect greatly improved over what it was last year. Our armies have been augmented, our troops have been instructed and disciplined. The articles necessary for the support of our troops and our people, and from which the enemy's blockade has cut us off, are being produced in the Confederacy. Our manufactures have made rapid progress; so much is this the case that I learn with equal surprise and pleasure from the general commanding this department, that Mississippi alone can supply the army which is upon her soil.

Our people have learned to economise, and are satisfied to wear homespun. I never see a woman dressed in homespun that I do not feel like taking off my hat to her; and although our women never lose their good looks, I cannot help thinking that they are improved by this garb. I never meet a man dressed in homespun but I feel like saluting him. I cannot avoid remarking with how much pleasure I have noticed the superior morality of our troops, and the contrast which in this respect they present to those of the invader. I can truly say that an army more pious and more moral than that defending our liberties, I do not believe to exist. On their valour and the assistance of God I confidently rely.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The war news is important, for though no engagements are reported, we hear of extensive preparations for another series of bloody battles. The South-West appears to be the destined scene of the next conflict. The Federals are determined on making another effort to open the Mississippi by the capture of the gallantly defended Vicksburg. General McClelland has left the Arkansas River, and landed his forces on the Louisiana side of the Mississippi opposite Vicksburg. General Grant has left Memphis with his forces en route for Vicksburg. General Goran has been recalled from the White River, to add to the numbers of the invading army. The Confederates are prepared for the attack. General Joseph E. Johnston has, according to Federal accounts, concentrated 150,000 men for the defence of Vicksburg. Port Hudson, naturally a strong position, has been so fortified as to discourage any immediate attack. The only operation of the Federals has been a renewal of the attempt by General McClelland's troops to divert the course of the Mississippi by enlarging Commodore Farragut's little ditch. We will not speculate upon the probable issue of the impending conflict, but we may be sure that once more the clergy of New England, who, as the Boston Courier observes, "are not yet sated," and who "every friend of the country wants to know how much more blood will satisfy," the ministers of the Gospel who call a midnight assassin John the Baptist—will be gratified by a long list of killed and wounded; and that the Federal contractors will rejoice in having to replace the arms and stores that will be captured and destroyed. Unless the Federals draw back, the battle will not be long delayed.

The Federal General Foster is reported to have repulsed 13,000 Confederates at Pollocksville, North Carolina. The Federals claim to have captured a flag. If we may rely upon Federal accounts with regard to the strength of General Foster's command, he was at least ten times as strong as his enemy.

The Federal cavalry is said to have made an incursion into Onslow, Trent, and Jones counties, North Carolina, and to have captured some prisoners.

It is rumoured in New York that General Corcoran has gained a victory at Suffolk, Virginia, over the Confederates, under the command of General Roger A. Pryor; and that the Confederates have been defeated near Savannah.

The resignation of General Burnside could not have surprised anybody who has studied the accounts of the Army of the Potomac. He had lost all command over his troops, who could not forget, and would not forgive, the carnage at Fredericksburg, where they were led up against an almost impregnable position, to be mowed down by the fire of the enemy. The Northern soldiers do not make sufficient allowance for the difficulties of a general who is the servant of the tool of a mob of fanatics. Burnside assumed the command "to go on to Richmond" without delay, and not to exercise his judgment as to the best use he could make of the Army of the Potomac. There is something exceedingly droll in the constant change of commanders. In his letter of resignation, Burnside hints that the army would, under more favourable circumstances, have accomplished great results. We do not doubt it. If the pontoons had arrived in time, if the Confederate troops had been, say a thousand miles from Richmond, it is not utterly impossible that Burnside would have got to Richmond. Burnside is too modest. He did effect great results. He crossed the Rappahannock, lost some 20,000 men, and recrossed the Rappahannock.

It is said in Washington that the immediate cause of the resignation of Burnside was a dispute with General Hooker. According to this story, when the artillery was mud-locked, Burnside determined to proceed with his infantry alone, and Hooker refused point-blank to take any part in such a movement. General Franklin has been relieved of his command absolutely, and demands a court-martial to inquire into the charges against him of tardiness and inefficiency. General Sumner was relieved at his own request.

General James Hooker has been appointed to succeed General Burnside, but how long he may retain the command is uncertain. There is a considerable agitation in favour of reinstating General McClelland. A resolution has been introduced in the Jersey Legislature, that the people are discouraged by reverses for which the generals in the field are not responsible, and that his restoration is the only means to save the country from utter ruin. General McClelland's popularity is daily increasing. He has had a brilliant reception. Mrs. McClelland has been presented with an elegant furnished house in the Fifth Avenue. Among the subscribers to this McClelland testimonial, we learn, are the names of Astor, Aspinwall, Morgan, and others equally distinguished and prominent. The Army of the Potomac and the Democratic party generally demand his restoration to the command.

The Alabama is now efficiently assisted in her warfare against American vessels. The Florida ran the blockade on the 15th of January, and lost no time in getting to work. She proceeded to the West Indies, and in two days captured and destroyed four American ships. The Northern papers are exceedingly indignant at the favour manifested at Havannah for the Confederate cause, but although there is pleasure expressed at the success of the Florida, it is not alleged that any undue privileges have been granted to the Confederates. There is, indeed, a story promulgated by Captain Adams, of the steamer Eagle, that the Florida was allowed to pass the guard-ship after nightfall on the 22nd of January, whilst Admiral Wilkes, who arrived in the gunboat Wachusett, was detained at the guard-ship until the next morning. But we all know that Yankee captains never hesitate to dress up a narrative. Much indignation, too, is evinced because Mr. Helm, the agent of the Confederate Government at Havannah holds weekly receptions, at which the most important personages of the place are present. The Northern press may be assured that in this respect the people of Havannah are not peculiar. The Florida has so alarmed the American captains, that they are afraid to put to sea with their vessels.

The Northern papers give us an account of what they are pleased to call a Spanish outrage. It appears that on the 23rd of January the Federal steamer Reanie, which left the port of Havannah that morning, was fired into by the Spanish man-of-war, Princess de Asturias. The Federal captain returned to Havannah, to complain to the United States' Consul that that functionary had ordered him to return to his vessel. The details of this affair have not transpired, but there can be little doubt that in some way or other the Federals had been violating Spanish regulations. The Federals will soon learn that though they may insult the British flag with impunity, they must not try the same game with the Spanish flag.

An important Confederate naval triumph is the sinking the Federal gunboat Hatteras, off the port of Galveston, to after a smart engagement. This victory was achieved by the Alabama, whose commander is known to have been for a long time anxiously on the look-out for a fight with a Federal war vessel. The Hatteras was of considerable tonnage, and powerfully armed.

The Federal gunboats were engaged on the 14th of January at Bayou Tescbe, Savanna, the issue of the contest may be gleaned from the Northern account that "the Federal commander was killed. No Confederates were captured." Later accounts say that the Federals have destroyed the Confederate war steamer Cotton, which steamer, as we reported in our issue of the 15th, of January, had repulsed, about that date, the Federal gun-boats after two hours' fighting.

The Federals claim to have destroyed four vessels trying to run the blockade, and to have captured the Virginia and the steamer Pearl; the latter, carrying the British flag, was taken off the Bahama Banks.

The Lincoln Government has been guilty of a tyrannical proceeding, which is calculated to test the strength of the Democratic party. In the Philadelphia Evening Journal there was a review of President Davis's Message, which seems to have offended the Lincolnites. Mr. Boileau, the editor of the Journal, was taken from his home at midnight and conveyed to Washington. Mr. Carr, a joint editor, was also arrested, but subsequently released. Not only was Mr. Boileau thus seized and incarcerated, but his office was occupied by the Provost-Guard, and the publication of his paper entirely suppressed. The affair caused, as may be supposed, considerable sensation, and it was instantly resented. Judge Ludlow, of Philadelphia, instructed the Grand Jury to suspend all other business to inquire into the case. In his charge to the Grand Jury he said, "that it had come to his knowledge that within the last twenty-four hours a citizen of this Commonwealth and this county had been suddenly arrested at his residence in this city, and forcibly carried, against his will, beyond the limits of this State, and jurisdiction of this Court. Such events have heretofore taken place, but as we have been anxious to support the United States' Government in every way compatible with the proper discharge of our duty, we were not inclined to believe that those in authority would attempt to exercise a power, under all circumstances, questionable and delicate, when temporary excitement had given way to reason, and a patriotic and, I believe, an honest desire to do a great public duty, had resolved itself into a settled purpose to discharge that duty according to law, and with, at least, decent respect for the laws of this Commonwealth and for the constituted authorities of the State." Judge Ludlow then quoted from the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the Commonwealth, to show that the inestimable rights of "a speedy and public trial," are guaranteed to every citizen by both instruments. In conclusion, he said: "Gentlemen of the Grand Jury,—I have alone taken the responsibility of addressing you to-day. It has not been done without the most serious reflection. From the commencement of the rebellion, I have endeavoured, in every possible legal method, to support the constituted authorities. A legal and moral necessity urges us to this step, not to counter-balance any act committed by any man against the authority of the general Government, but to sustain a right as clear as the noon-day sun, as vital as life-giving breath, without the existence of which the Government itself is a stupendous deception, and which, if firmly maintained, now and here, will go far to unite a people of immense resources, and which power can yet be wielded as a unit, when and as soon as the constitutional rights of each citizen shall be respected and enforced. I request you at once to suspend all other business before you at present, and to instruct the District-Attorney of this county to send for General Montgomery and the Provost-Marshal, together with all other persons who have any knowledge of this transaction, and after you shall have heard them, your duty will be simply to present the facts to the Court." The result of the inquiry was, the Grand Jury indicted all persons concerned in making the arrest. In the Legislature resolutions were introduced, authorizing the Governor of the State to proceed to Washington, and demand the release of Mr. Boileau. Mr. Lincoln has now provoked a conflict which cannot fail to damage him. If he recedes, he will offend his own party; if he refuses compliance, he will enrage the Democrats, and make them more activity hostile.

The negro is causing an irrepressible conflict in the North. The Secretary of War has issued an order authorizing Gen. Andrews to enlist negroes to garrison the posts of Massachusetts, and for the volunteer service: an order that the people of Massachusetts will probably not approve of even as a war measure. In the Federal House of Representatives, Mr. Hickman, of Pennsylvania, introduced a substitute for the Bill of Mr. Thaddeus Stevens for the enlistment of 150,000 troops of African descent. The Bill was warmly opposed by the Border States' representatives and the Democratic members, and its discussion, prevented by successive motions of adjournments, prolonged from noon till daylight next morning. The House ultimately adjourned without coming to a vote. Mr. Wadsworth, of Kentucky, has declared in Congress that if negro regiments were sent into Kentucky, the Kentuckians would resist their passage through the State.

A curious scene occurred in the Federal Senate on the 27th of January. Mr. Saulsbury, of Delaware, "violently denounced the policy and character of the President, calling him 'an imbecile,' and using other epithets. As Mr. Saulsbury persisted in his disorderly remarks, he was taken into custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and removed from the Senate. During the struggle Mr. Saulsbury exhibited a revolver, with threats of vengeance upon the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Speaker, and other senators. A resolution was introduced by Mr. Clarke, of New Hampshire, the next day, to expel Mr. Saulsbury from the Senate. When the motion came up, Mr. Saulsbury, whose friends assert that he was intoxicated at the time of his violation of the rules of the Senate, made an apology, and the matter was dropped.

Mr. Lincoln, not contented with employing negroes to fight his battles, is said, to favour a plan to enlist the Indians in Minnesota and Dacotah.

The excitement in Wall-street continues. On the 31st of January, gold was 59 per cent. premium, and exchange on London, 175. A great rise has taken place in cotton. On the 30th of January the price of Middling Uplands was 92 c. per lb.

ENGLAND.

The diminution of pauperism in Lancashire last week was about 7000; the total diminution since the tide first turned amounting to over 41,000. The number of paupers is now about 243,000; that of persons dependent for relief on parochial or voluntary charity, 466,000; that of those assisted by the Relief Committees solely about, 210,000. This state of things is lamentable enough; but the continuous decrease leads many persons to hope that the next half-year will not witness sufferings so severe as those of the last six months. It is found that only a small proportion of the recipients of relief are also provided with employment; and the difficulty of finding work for them is admitted and regretted by all who have turned their attention to this subject. It has been suggested that they should be transferred to those agricultural districts in which the rate of wages is highest; and the President of the Poor Law Board has offered, through Mr. Farnall, to furnish to the Central Executive at Manchester, and to the Local Relief Committees, the requisite information. We cannot feel confident as to the prudence or propriety of the scheme.

The condition of Lancashire has been touched upon in some of the desultory discussions which have already taken place in Parliament, and charges have been made against the manufacturers and the guardians of the poor which are not altogether devoid of truth, but which nevertheless are substantially unjust. Mr. Bentinck thinks that the distress has been caused not by the American war, but by excessive speculation, and that the manufacturers are responsible on that score. The fact, however, is that but for the war there would only have been a brief period of slack trade, the evil effects of which would have been first and most severely felt by the merchants and speculators, who are very seldom manufacturers; next, and much less severely, by the manufacturers; and last, and least, by the operatives. The merchants held large stocks, which, at the commencement of 1861, were almost unsaleable. The American war raised the value of those stocks, not as much or as quickly as it raised the price of cotton, but so quickly as to enable the merchant holders to realize large profits; which they further enhanced by speculations in cotton. In the meantime the mill-owners found their raw material increasing in price so much more and so much faster than their finished goods, that it became impossible for them to manufacture; and they were obliged, at an enormous loss, to close their mills, thus entailing severe sufferings on their hands. There had, indeed, been an excess of production; but it is obvious to those who consider the course of trade that the manufacturers were in no wise answerable for that excess. The merchant sends his order to the mill-owner; the latter executes it. It is not the business of the manufacturer to look further than Manchester; while he is sure of selling his goods there at a good price, it is his duty to make as much and as fast as he can. The Manchester market is regulated by the merchants in accordance with their expectations of a home and foreign demand; and if they err in those expectations, and stimulate the manufacturer to over-production, the fault is, and the punishment should be, theirs. The American war has come to save them from the consequences of their mistakes in 1859 and 1860, and has saved them at the expense of the comparatively innocent mill-owner and perfectly innocent operatives.

Again, the Poor Law authorities of the suffering districts are charged with having availed themselves of the liberality called forth by the distress to shift the burdens which the law imposes upon them on to the shoulders of the public. The answer is—first, that they have not refused relief to any who have applied for it; that it is not they, but the destitute, who, in their horror of pauperism, have preferred to depend on voluntary charity rather than on the parish allowance; second, that they have, in fact, expended enormous sums (no less than £15,000 weekly in the relief of the poor); third, that the condition of the ratepayers is such that they could not possibly fulfil their legal obligation to maintain all the destitute, for many of them are themselves on the verge of pauperism, most are in very evil case, and all are suffering; and finally, that of the relief funds provided by voluntary charity a very large proportion has come from Lancashire. It may fairly be said that the distressed districts are bearing half the burden of supporting their own poor; and we think that this, under the very peculiar circumstances of the case, is perhaps more than ought to have been exacted from them.

Lord Derby remarked, and we fear with truth, that notwithstanding all the efforts of the Relief Committees, a good deal of demoralization was necessarily the consequence of a system of support which did not and could not make maintenance dependent on labour. We cannot doubt that the factory towns have, like all other large towns, a floating population which subsists by inefficient and uncertain labour in a state not far removed from destitution. There are, of course, numerous cases of Irish and other families in Salford, Preston, Wigan, Oldham, and similar towns, whose aggregate income never exceeded half-a-crown or 3s. a head per week; these are now receiving 2s., or a little less, and doing nothing, and they find this pleasanter than living by honest work. The effect is, of course, demoralizing; but then these people were for the most part demoralized already. The better sort of factory hands, the great majority of that class who earned their 5s. or 10s. a head, are not likely to be demoralized by a system of relief which gives them 20d. or 2s. a head for doing nothing. They do not object to work, and they do not find themselves otherwise than exceedingly miserable on their present restricted means.

Complaints have been heard of late, that where work is given to the operatives in the mills which continue to run, it is on such terms that they can barely earn a subsistence. Some of these, in special cases, have been investigated and shown to be groundless. Nevertheless we believe that in some cases the manufacturers have acted unfairly; have reduced their rate of wages, or imposed a less profitable kind of work, without giving due notice. And we know that spinning Surat, in machinery adapted to American cotton, is a great loss to the workman; while he could make a pound of yarn out of the former, he could have made 1½ lb. or 2 lbs. out of the latter; and as he is paid by the quantity produced, he naturally grumbles at the change. The weaver is in the same predicament. Surat cotton is always breaking, and the time of the labourer is taken up unprofitably and vexatiously in piecing it. It has other faults; and even those who are accustomed, and whose machinery is suited to it, hate it and grumble against it. Whatever politicians may desire, the last thing that the operatives wish for is the substitution of Indian for American cotton. A Methodist preacher was praying one day that the Almighty would be pleased to send cotton, when one of his congregation, an old woman, endorsed his prayer, after the Methodist fashion, with a reservation—"Ay—do, Lord—but not Surat."

The debates on the Address led to no practical result, but they showed pretty clearly the feelings of both Houses in regard to the foreign policy of the present Government. The rejection of the French proposal of mediation in America does not meet the approval of any but the ultra-Radical sympathizers with the Northern States. The Opposition generally seem to desire, though not very strongly, the recognition of the Confederate States; but they are silenced by the decidedly-expressed opinion of Lord Derby, that recognition, unless we were prepared to interfere by force, would be neither effectual nor legitimate. As the Standard—whose close alliance with the Conservative party is no secret—reminded his lordship, it is evidently the opinion of both the American belligerents that recognition per se would go far, without any more peremptory action, to bring about a termination of the war, and the matter is one on which they are, of course, far better judges than the most clear-sighted of English statesmen can possibly be. Very few persons understand the Schleswig-Holstein question; but the action of the Government towards Denmark is condemned rather by the feelings than by the understanding of Parliament, as of the country. The offer of a refuge at Malta to the Pope, in spite of the Ministerial explanations, meets with general ridicule; but the Italian policy of Lord Russell is more in harmony with the sympathies of Englishmen generally than that which is attributed to the Conservative leaders. No one, except Lord Grey, seems to approve of the surrender of the Ionian Islands; and it was, perhaps, fortunate for the Government that Mr. Gladstone was not present when Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald cited against them his speeches when sent to Corfu on a special mission by Lord Derby's Ministry. This, and the Brazilian quarrel, furnish the only effective topics for dialectic attacks on the Administration. On the latter point very little has as yet been said, but it seems likely that when time has been given to study the documentary evidence on the subject, the Opposition will not fail to take advantage of an error so disgraceful to the Government and so dishonourable to England. The only question of domestic policy which has afforded material for a discussion of any interest, is the treatment of convicts; which gave to Lord Carnarvon an opportunity of saying what everybody thinks about Sir George Grey, but which cannot form the subject of a party fight. Altogether, the prospects of the Ministry seem rather brighter than they did a week ago.

A rather interesting trial has taken place in the Court of Queen's Bench. Mr. Clare claimed damages from the Crown (which was formerly done through a "petition of right," asking redress as a favour, and always answered by an injunction to the Court, "Let right be done," signed by the Sovereign, but which can now be done in a more straightforward manner) for the infringement of a patent of his by the builders of the Warrior. After a long investigation, it was decided that the patent had not been infringed, and that the plaintiff had no claim to any compensation.

The George Griswold, laden with provisions from America for the relief of the Lancashire distress, has arrived in Liverpool. An address of thanks has been prepared by the Chamber of Commerce of that port, which forbears the expression of any other feeling in regard to the American quarrel than a wish for its conclusion on terms consistent with the honour of the Northern people.

The Metropolitan, or "Underground" Railway is overwhelmed by the excess of traffic. Proposals are being made for its extension in various directions. The Pneumatic Despatch Company is also preparing to extend its operations. It has already a line at work at Euston-square and preparing to lay down one of about five miles connecting some other principal points in London. Its machinery consists of an elliptical iron tube, perfectly air-tight, fitted with a pair of rails, on which runs a car nearly the size of the tube, propelled by a blast created by an engine, which the Times describes as follows:—

At each end of the tube we have described a hollow iron wheel is erected, working in an airtight box. This wheel is 21 feet in diameter, with a thickness of about 2 feet at the nave or centre—a thickness which gradually diminishes towards its outer circumference, so as to give it the same cubical contents at the rim as at the middle. This wheel is connected with a steam-engine of about 17-horse power, which turns it at a velocity of from 70 to 90 miles an hour, when the air which is drawn in through its hollow centre is thrown off from its periphery with a force which gives a pressure of from 5 to 7 ounces on the square inch, very nearly the pressure of a hurricane, and all of which, by opening a valve at the end of the tube, is driven through it with almost irresistible velocity. The cars we have already spoken of, when on the rails in the tube, fill it almost completely and expose a surface of nearly 5 square feet to the blast. They are, therefore, driven along it at the rate of nearly 30 miles an hour. In literal fact, the cars are either drawn or driven along by what is virtually a chain of air, which costs nothing and of which the weight and friction are almost nil.

The approaching marriage of the Prince of Wales will afford the English people a much-wished for opportunity of testifying their hearty attachment to the Queen and her family; an attachment which was quickened and deepened by the Royal bereavement, and which, since that sad event, has found no suitable opportunity for its expression. Nothing has yet been determined as to the manner in which the auspicious day is to be celebrated in London. At Southampton preparations are making to receive the Princess with unusual honours. At Nottingham there is to be a procession of the Masonic orders, wearing rosettes of Coventry ribbons; a suggestion thrown out for the benefit of the ruined silk trade. Other towns will follow suit, and the day will be one of rejoicing throughout the kingdom.

The case of the Alabama, in its legal aspects, has been discussed by the Juridical Society, under the presidency of Lord Stanley. Mr. W. Keer read an elaborate paper, arguing that we ought to have detained the Alabama, that we could not seize her on the high seas; that if she came into our ports her crew would be liable to a prosecution as offenders against the Foreign Enlistment Act. Different views were expressed by subsequent speakers. Lord Stanley thought that the questions whether the Alabama could have been detained, and whether her builders could have been prosecuted, were questions of evidence rather than of law. It was distinctly admitted that the Alabama was not a privateer.

Mr. Lincoln has sent an answer to the Manchester address, in which he refers to the "sublime Christian heroism" of the nobodies who, in the name of the working-men of Manchester, congratulated him on the policy of trying to stir up a servile revolt as a "war measure." Mr. Lincoln evidently thinks, or pretends to think, the Tooley-street Tailors represent the opinions of this country.

The election for the Borough of Cambridge has resulted in the return of the Conservative candidate. Mr. Powell polled 726 votes, and Mr. Fawcett, the Liberal candidate, 609. Such is the return of the Conservative committee, the Liberal statement gives a less majority.

It is understood that prominent capitalists in Paris and Frankfort, have offered to the Confederate Government £5,000,000 on moderate terms; of which £2,000,000 are said to have been accepted. This is a striking testimony of the confidence of European capitalists in the stability of the young nationality.

EUROPE.

The insurrection in Poland has now become a national rising. The isolated resistance of a few bands of desperate conscripts has developed into a revolution which tasks all the strength of Russia to make head against it. The only trustworthy information which reaches this country of the progress of the movement, in the shape of telegrams from the Austrian and Prussian frontiers, is necessarily very imperfect, and somewhat confusing. We are told of a great many fights between parties of military and insurgents, which say very little, except that the insurrection extends over a very wide area. This much, however, may be said with some certainty, that the insurgents have, on the whole, had for a few days the advantage, and are now beginning to lose it; that they are far better provided with arms than could have been expected, and that they are commanded by officers of some experience. A rough notion of the seat of the conflict may be given by describing a crescent extending on the one hand from the point of junction of the Austrian and Prussian frontiers a little to the north-east of Cracow, passing thence by the frontier of Galicia, and then by the frontier between Russia proper and Poland, to the Prussian frontier again, directly to the north of Warsaw. Within the whole of the district embraced by these lines, that is to say, by far the larger part of the kingdom of Poland, the insurrection is general. It extends, however beyond the frontier into Russia itself; and it seems probable that it will very soon, to its certain destruction, extend over the Prussian and Austrian frontiers. In fact, the insurrection seems to have a stronger hold at the junction of the Prussian and Austrian frontiers than anywhere else; although it has also spread over the whole of the provinces of Sandomier and Lublin. The Prussian Government, which at first was not much disturbed, is now, it seems, seriously alarmed, and troops are pouring into Silesia, at the south-west corner of which province the danger seems to threaten most. Later accounts speak of part of Western Prussia as in a very excited state. Telegrams from Russian sources speak of decisive victories gained by the Russian troops over considerable bodies of insurgents, the one near Wouczok, in the province of Lublin, in which 6000 insurgents were attacked by General Mack, and were completely defeated—two battalions of peasants throwing down their muskets at the first fire—and the other near Wilna, in which the insurgents lost 1000 men, and the Russians but twelve, of whom, however, six were officers. Of course these statements must be received with some distrust, but it may be assumed that victories of some sort were gained, and, indeed, it is to be expected that whenever a large Russian force, well equipped, comes into conflict with the insurgents the latter will be signally beaten. Their strength lies in the guerilla warfare. The Russian Government is evidently alarmed at the progress which the rebellion is making, and the Emperor now seems disposed, after having deliberately provoked them—the official journal of St. Petersburg admits that the recruitment was conducted in an unusual manner, but excuses it on the ground that the Government had been aware for months that it would be the signal for insurrection—to try to conciliate the Poles. The recruitment has been stopped. Many of the conscripts have been liberated. The reports of the Council of State are henceforth to be drawn up in the Polish language; and the Council of the Empire has been ordered to prepare several measures—of but slight import it must be allowed—for the reform of the administration of the kingdom of Poland. These offers come too late; if Poland is to be conciliated, it must be by more substantial concessions. There is no midway now between a large measure of justice and rigorous repression. When a Russian general does not give satisfaction, he always falls unwell. General Ramsay, the commander in Poland, a descendant, we suppose, of some Scotch soldier of fortune, has had an attack of apoplexy, and General Samukin takes his place. We will use the falsehoods told by the Russian telegrams about the massacre of the soldiers by the insurgents, to justify a hope that the story of the attempted poisoning of the Marquis Wielopolski and his family is a foul invention to deprive the Poles of the sympathy of Europe.

The debates in the Corps Legislatif upon the address, in answer to the Emperor's speech, have been of a very interesting character. The little opposition of five has attacked the policy of the Government with the greatest boldness. The points selected for attack have been the internal administration, taken up principally by M. Ollivier, the Mexican Expedition, and the Italian policy of the Government. The greatest sensation has been produced by M. Jules Favre's speech upon the subject of Mexico, in which the Jecker claim played the principal part. The excitement has been much increased by the very unwise intimation given to the newspapers not to discuss the subject. The contrast between the Emperor's liberal promises and the oppressive acts of his Ministers has produced a very disagreeable impression.

An insurrection has broken out in the recently acquired dependencies in Cochin China. The natives in large numbers attacked the fort of Saigon, and although ultimately compelled to retire with great loss, fought with the utmost desperation. This was on the 17th of December. An attack was made, with the same result, on Fort Mytho on the 27th of December. Reinforcements have been despatched from France.

Some correspondence respecting the affairs of Rome has been laid before Parliament.

It includes the despatch of Earl Russell of October 31st, urging upon the French Government the evacuation of Rome, with the existence of which M. Drouyn de Lhuys' despatch in the Libre Jaune had acquainted us: Lord Cowley's despatch, summarizing his conversation with M. Drouyn de Lhuys upon the delivery of that despatch, the substance of the conversation being, as our readers are aware, a reference to previous opinions of the English Government in favour of the occupation of Rome; the despatch of Earl Russell in which he invites the Pope to retire to Malta, and another despatch from his lordship, in which he gives his own version of the attempt to get the Pope away from Rome.

That version really differs in substantial points very little from that of the French Ambassador, which it is designed to impugn. Mr. Odo Russell says that the Pope asked him whether, if circumstances should at any time lead him to ask a refuge in England, he would be well-received. The French Ambassador wrote that the Pope said, "Who knows whether one day I may not have to ask from you a hospitable reception?" This was on the 25th of July. It was only on the 25th of October that Earl Russell wrote his despatch, urging the Pope to leave Rome, and offering him a mansion at Malta. The principal point in the despatch is the suggestion that, as the Pope believes that Providence will maintain the temporal power in its full splendour, he had better, in reliance upon Providence, abandon Rome. The old watchword was, "Trust in Providence, boys, and keep your powder dry." Earl Russell says to the Pope, trust in Providence and carefully damp all your powder. Cardinal Antonelli politely acknowledged the offer, but pointed out the impossibility of accepting it. Earl Russell, we should observe, denies that he wrote any private letter to Mr. Russell, regretting that the Pope had not accepted his offer, and expressing the opinion that his Holiness would soon regret his determination.

That is the one error made by the Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne in his account of this strange business.

The King of Prussia has answered the address of the House of Deputies, after the fashion which his reply to the Notables of the Rhine Provinces presaged. He presumes, from the tenor of the address, that the Deputies desire to know his personal will, and therefore he replies to them without the intervention of the Ministers—another infringement, we may observe, of the Constitution, which requires all documents of the kind to be countersigned by the Ministers; but one which impartial critics will, under the circumstances, easily pardon, although the House of Deputies grumbles. The King declares all the complaints of the Chamber unfounded. He denies that his Ministers have violated the Constitution, and declares that all their acts have had his sanction, thus assuming the position of direct personal antagonism to the Chamber, into which Herr von Bismarck had, in the course of the debate, thrust him. He also repeats the quibble of his Minister, that the budget law requires the assent of the three legislative bodies, and therefore, in default of that assent, the Government has a right to govern without a budget—announces his intention to maintain undiminished the rights of the Crown—takes credit for his regard for the nation in giving up four millions of taxation, a temporary tax voted in 1853 for three years, which he only gave up because he knew that the House of Deputies would not renew it; and having thus declared himself anxious for reconciliation, on the condition, well understood, that the Deputies give way in everything, trusts the House will meet his views. His reply removes all chance of reconciliation. Meanwhile the Upper House had prepared its address, a very vague and ambiguous document, hardly intelligible, except by reference to the debates which preceded its adoption. In substance it deplored the difference of opinion between the three legislative factors, for which case the Constitution had made no provision, and suggested that, in the German word Landesvater,—"Father of his Country,"—a solution of the difficulty presented itself. In plain English, that the King should, in his profound wisdom, do as he pleased. Some members of the House thought the address too moderate; one suggested that the words "Lord and Subject," should be introduced; but the leader of the party pointed out that cases might occur in which even the Upper House would not like to be bound to unconditional obedience, and so, after several ebullitions of the same sort as this, that the "present struggle was one between Anti-Christ and Christendom," the address, in its mild form, passed. Naturally, it proved very agreeable to his Majesty, who has informed the Herrnenhaus that the Government will firmly maintain the position it has taken up, but will attend to any overtures the House of Deputies may make, with a view of increasing Prussia's military power!

The fiftieth anniversary of King Frederick William the Third's appeal to his people, the signal for that great uprising which liberated first Prussia, and then Germany, from the Napoleonic yoke, has been celebrated with great enthusiasm throughout Prussia. In the popular mind the institution of the Landwehr, now threatened by the army reorganization, is closely connected with this anniversary, and it was the occasion for the display of much enthusiasm for the maintenance in its integrity of the old military system. At Berlin, as elsewhere, the day was celebrated by banquets, at two of which the King looked in, in the pleasant, familiar way, in which only German princes meet their people, and proposed toasts to the Fatherland and the army.

The Greek throne is still open to competition. The Duke of Coburg, according to Lord Palmerston—who shows more respect for the Greeks than his organs, which talk about the Duke's declining the throne—has decidedly refused to become a candidate for the throne of Greece. A few days ago it was authoritatively announced that he had accepted it. It appears, from the explanation of the Government organs, that the blunder arose in this wise: The Duke refused to accept the throne, except upon certain conditions, inter alia, that Greece should be materially strengthened and that the Duke should retain his German duchies. These conditions Earl Russell could not accept, and looked out for another king. The Prince of Leiningen having, as our contemporaries complain, preferred his ease as the captain of an English ship of war, Lord Russell had to return to the Duke of Coburg, and accepted his conditions. His lordship seems to have assumed that, as he had accepted the Duke's conditions, the Duke would accept the throne. But he reckoned without his host. The Duke declined, and the place is open, to the great disgust of the English Government; but the failure will apparently not trouble the Greeks much, who still cling to their hopes of Prince Alfred.

Some correspondence respecting the revolution in Greece has been laid before Parliament. It gives a history of the insurrection and the subsequent diplomatic action of the British Government. It may be thus summarized:—Earl Russell at first declared distinctly that Prince Alfred would not accept the throne; then, being also anxious to exclude the Duke de Leuchtenberg, he applied to the Russian Government to make a common self-denying declaration. The Russian Government thought it unnecessary, and did not agree that the Duke was a member of the Imperial family. Earl Russell then allowed the Greeks to suppose that Prince Alfred would accept the throne, and by that means frightened the Russian Government into the expression of its readiness to make the renunciation. The renunciation made, the Greeks were told that they could not have Prince Alfred; and the Ionian Islands were offered them in compensation.

The National Assembly, having at last constituted itself, has declared the throne forfeited by Otho, his Queen, and dynasty, and Prince Alfred elected King of the Greeks by 230,000 votes. The official notification of the Prince's election has been made to the English Government.

From Spain we have fresh rumours of a Ministerial crisis, and of a dissolution of the Cortes, the sittings of which have been already suspended. Marshal O'Donnell has been ill, and General Serrano, the new Minister for Foreign Affairs, has developed at some length, in answer to an interpellation in the Cortes, the reasons of the Government for not recognizing at present the kingdom of Italy. One of them deserves mention. King Charles Albert refused for seven years to recognize Queen Isabella. The children suffer for the sins of their fathers.

A curious picture of the disorganization and demoralization of the Neapolitan kingdom has been supplied in the story of the capture of the Marquis Avitabile, president of the Neapolitan Bank, by a band of brigands. The Marquis was on a visit to his villa at Torre del Greco, the scene of the last destructive outbreak of Vesuvius, and in the immediate neighbourhood of the city. According to one account, he was out shooting; according to another, the Philistines had their Dahilah, when he was surrounded by a company of armed men and conducted to a secluded spot on the skirts of the mountain. There an exorbitant sum was at first demanded of him for his ransom, but at last his price was agreed at 20,000 ducats or $5,000 lire, or francs. A messenger was sent to Naples for the money, the Marquis being courteously treated meanwhile by Pilone, the chief of the band, and when he returned, bringing the ransom in hard Napoleons, the marquis was set at liberty, and got home the same evening. The only novelty about the story is the largeness of the ransom, the same kind of thing takes place in the neighbourhood of Naples every day, and as for the outlying provinces, nobody is safe there, in spite of General La Marmora's 90,000 men, who is not known to sympathize with Francis II. It is quite evident that the system the Piedmontese Government has been pursuing, will never extirpate the evil. Cruelty has been found ineffectual, why not try justice and mercy? The Parliamentary Committee appointed to investigate the question of brigandage is now on its way through the provinces. If Pilone, or some other adventurous leader, could manage to get hold of the members, they would probably learn a great deal more about brigandage than they will draw from the civil functionaries and military commanders who surround them. Apropos of the brigandage, we may add that a public meeting has been held at Naples to put it down, at which two priests denounced the Pope with extreme violence, and the Turin Government came in for a great deal of abuse. Some members of the Italian Parliament have been expressing their sympathies with Poland, but the Ministry took care to hold their peace. They remembered that Russia had just recognized Italy, and that part of the price was the extinction of a Polish educational establishment.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The fifth session of the present Parliament commenced on Thursday last. Her Majesty, for a well-understood reason, did not open it in person. The Commissioners appointed for the purpose entered the House of Lords at 2 o'clock. Very few peers were present, but the Opposition benches and the galleries were nearly filled with ladies. The Commons having been summoned, and appearing at the bar, the Lord Chancellor read the Royal Speech. It referred briefly to the treaty concluded for the marriage of the Prince of Wales, and requested provision for an establishment suitable to the rank and dignity of the Heir-Apparent to the throne. The offer of the Greek Crown to Prince Alfred, who had been compelled by the diplomatic engagements of England to decline it, was made the ground of a hope that the Greeks would choose a wise and non-aggressive Sovereign, in which case the Queen would be disposed, if the Ionian Islands were so disposed, to take steps for the abandonment of the British Protectorate over the Septinsular Republic. The Speech continued:—

Her Majesty's relations with foreign Powers continue to be friendly and satisfactory.

Her Majesty has abstained from taking any step with a view to induce a cessation of the conflict between the contending parties in the North American States, because it has not yet seemed to Her Majesty that any such overtures could be attended with a probability of success.

Her Majesty has viewed with the deepest concern the desolating warfare which still rages in those regions; and she has witnessed with heartfelt grief the severe distress and suffering which that war has inflicted upon a large class of Her Majesty's subjects, but which have been borne by them with noble fortitude and with exemplary resignation. It is some consolation to her Majesty to be led to hope that this suffering and this distress are rather diminishing than increasing, and that some revival of employment is beginning to take place in the manufacturing districts.

The Queen expressed her admiration of the generosity of her subjects, in all parts of her empire, towards their suffering countrymen; and informed Parliament that papers relating to Italy, Denmark, Greece, and Japan, would be laid before it. It was also stated that the condition of the revenue was "not unsatisfactory," and that the commerce of the country had not sensibly diminished. The remaining paragraphs of the speech were of a purely formal character.

The Houses then adjourned. The Lords met again at 4 o'clock, when the House and galleries were crowded. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, accompanied by several lords, who are members of the Cabinet or of the Royal Household, all wearing their peers' robes, entered the house. The Prince wore the scarlet robe with ermine bars, proper to his rank as a duke, over his general's uniform. He advanced to the woolsack, and placed in the hands of the Lord Chancellor his "writ of summons," entitling him to take a seat in the House. He then took the oaths, and seated himself on the Chair of State, which is his formal place, on the right hand of the Throne. Rising immediately, he received the congratulations of the Chancellor. The sitting was then suspended. When it was resumed, at five o'clock, his Royal Highness took his seat on the "cross benches" at the lower end of the House, opposite the Throne; the place where are usually to be seen Lord Grey, Lord Overstone, and other peers, who are not attached at present to either of the great political parties.

The Address to the Crown, which is so exact an echo of the speech that no paper ever thinks of publishing it, was moved by the Earl Dudley, and seconded by the Earl of Granard. The Earl of Derby then rose, and delivered a speech which may be regarded as a full and complete expression of the views of the Opposition on all the questions treated in the Royal speech. He began by congratulating the Royal Family and the country on the auspicious marriage treaty, concluded on behalf of the Heir-Apparent. He then passed to the American question, and expressed his regret that her Majesty's Government had not thought fit to accept the proposal of the Emperor of the French for a joint endeavour to persuade the belligerents to an armistice; at the same time, he admitted the possibility that Ministers might have information not open to the public as to the probable issue of such an endeavour, which would justify their refusal. Mediation he considered to be one of the questions, so long as the South insisted on absolute separation, and the North on enforcing union; for any mediator must, in such a case, take one side or the other, and thereby place himself in a position of hostility to the party against whom he decided. Several of his friends wished to see the recognition of the Confederate States. He did not think that the time had come at which such a step would be wise, politic, or even legitimate:—"I do not think the circumstances have yet occurred under which a revolting State is entitled to recognition from neutral Powers. The first of those circumstances is where, although the State from which a secession has taken place has not acquiesced in it as a fait accompli, yet the war is, in point of fact, at end, and no struggle is going on for the restoration of the original dominion. That was the case when the States of South America revolted from Spain. For a long period before those States were recognized by the Powers, Spain had ceased to take any active steps to keep them under her rule. Another set of circumstances under which recognition is legitimate is where other nations, having in the interests of humanity determined that a desolating warfare shall no longer be continued, agree to recognize the revolting party. But in that case recognition is always followed by something further, for it means nothing unless the Powers who join in it are ready to support by force of arms the claims of the State which they recognize. (Hear, hear.) That was the case when Belgium separated from Holland, and when Greece separated from Turkey. No doubt there are occasions when the horrors of war and the danger to the public interests of the world, from the prolongation of a contest, are so great that it is essential it should be terminated by other nations intervening to recognize the secessionist, but in that event they must be prepared to go a step further, and to maintain by force the independence which they have acknowledged. I cannot but think that this consideration has not been sufficiently weighed by those who are anxious for the recognition of the South." He believed, however, that the restoration of the Union was utterly impossible. Any Government that might be in power in this country would gladly seize any opportunity of putting an end to the war; but he feared that it must go on till both parties simultaneously should see the necessity of coming to terms. He dwelt on the widespread distress which the war had inflicted on the manufacturing districts, and on the length of time which must elapse ere they could recover from the blow. The public had been very liberal; and he feared there would be for a long time a continued call upon public generosity. The working classes had endured nobly; but it was his duty to remark that one portion of them—not the best and best paid, but the lowest class, who were always on the verge of pauperism, were almost as well off now, subsisting on alms, as ever they had been, however severe might be the sufferings of those who, formerly laborious, skilful, and therefore comparatively rich, had been suddenly reduced to the level of the former set. Of course the charity which made the worst class of labourers as well off without work as with it, had a demoralizing effect. It was, however, impossible to make a distinction in affording relief between families wont to earn 35s., and those wont to earn 7s. a week; and therefore, while the highest class of operatives felt the distress very severely, the lowest scarcely felt it all. He thought that the state of the foreign, and especially of the Oriental markets, was such as to make it certain that for a long time to come, with cotton at abnormal prices, only large capitalists, and only some of these, would be able to employ their workmen; and he therefore saw no prospect of a speedy abatement of the sufferings of the operatives.

The foreign policy of the Government did not meet with Lord Derby's approval. He censured the intrusive intermeddling of Lord Russell in the affairs of Denmark, and reminded him of the characteristic advice of Lord Melbourne, in a Cabinet of which they were both members. "Can't you let it alone? It will do very well if you will only let it alone." But to let it alone was just what Lord Russell never could do. The speaker alluded lightly to Sydney Smith's famous saying, that the present Foreign Secretary would undertake at an hour's notice to cut for the stone or take command of the Channel fleet. But if he could not let Denmark alone, he might have avoided giving his advice in such a form as to encourage her enemies to put upon her a pressure which, without the aid of England, she was not able to resist. Lord Derby also ridiculed the proposal of Lord Russell to receive the Pope at Malta, as a protégé of Great Britain; a proposal which, if accepted, would have led to the most serious complications. He censured the long delay allowed to intervene between the recommendation of Prince Alfred as a suitable King by the Greek Government to the electors, and the declaration of the English Government that he could not accept the throne, and he expressed the strongest disapproval of the cession of the Ionian Islands. It was nonsense to suppose that Greece would give up her dreams of aggression on Turkey; and Corfu, eighty miles from the Greek and within one mile of the Turkish coast, was admirably fitted to assist her in such aggressions; while, on the other hand, the cession would materially diminish our strength in the Mediterranean.

Earl Russell thought that he had done quite right in rejecting the French proposal. One day, perhaps, the Americans would voluntarily invite foreign mediation. In the meantime, he did not think we should be justified in recognizing the South, as we were not prepared to interfere by force. He thought that the subjugation of the South would be fatal to the liberties of the North, to order in the South, and to the well-being of the negro race—would be a frightful calamity; though he should be glad to see the Union restored if sentiments of amity and confidence could be restored with it. He retorted on Lord Derby that the advice given by the Conservative Government to the Sovereigns of Naples and Tuscany, to remain neutral in the late Italian war, had proved disastrous. He explained that his advice to Denmark was the consequence of a previous intervention of England to prevent a Federal attack on Holstein; and that the idea of a refuge in British territory had been suggested by the Pope himself, and not by Mr. Russell, our unofficial agent at the Papal Court, who reported that the offer made in consequence of that suggestion had produced the most friendly feeling in the minds of the Pope and his Ministers. He said that when the Greek revolution rendered the throne vacant, England was the first of the Protecting Powers to insist on the exclusion of all members of their three reigning families, but that she had insisted that the Duke of Leuchtenberg was a member of the Imperial House of Russia; a point on which some difficulties had at first been raised by the Government of the Czar. He did not, however, fully explain how it was that the Greeks were allowed to entertain hopes of Prince Alfred's acceptance of their Crown. As to the cession of the Ionian Islands, he remarked that it was in no sense a dismemberment of the empire. Those islands constituted an independent Republic under the protection of the British Crown; and when that protection ceased to be necessary for their interests and those of Europe, and proved obnoxious to themselves, it was best that it should be withdrawn.

Lord Malmesbury (late Secretary for Foreign Affairs) agreed with Lord Derby that we could not recognize the Confederate States unless we were prepared to go further. But he strongly condemned the conduct of the Government in not joining with France to bring about an armistice, and passed a high eulogium on the conduct of the Emperor. He asked if Ministers had done anything to mitigate the horrors of the American War, especially the diabolical barbarity of the North in declaring medicines and surgical instruments contraband. He defended the advice given, in 1859, to the Sovereigns of Tuscany and Naples, and strongly censured the policy of Lord Russell in reference to Rome, Greece, the Ionian Islands, and the Danish question.

Earl Grey was the next speaker. He is one of the ablest members of the Upper House, a son of the great Whig chief who bore the same title; and formerly Secretary for the Colonies under Lord Russell. For the last twelve years he has been out of office, and now, when either party would be delighted to obtain his co-operation, he is understood to be too Conservative to act with the Liberals, and to distrust some of the Conservative leaders too much to join the Opposition. He approved of the conduct of the Government in avoiding anything like mediation in America, so long as the North insisted on re-union, and the South on independence. He thought that we could do very well without the Ionian Islands, both in peace and in war. It was the French occupation of Italy which made them so important during the Napoleonic wars, and as Italy was about to become united and strong, it did not seem to him that this condition of things was likely to recur. The protectorate, and Ionian hostility to it, had brought the Government of the islands to a dead lock; and he thought it was time that the attempt to govern those who wished to be free from our rule should be given up.

The Earl of Carnarvon (a rising member of the Conservative party, and formerly an Under-Secretary of State) disputed the wisdom of the cession of the Ionian Islands, and contended that if they were ceded on economical grounds there could be no greater fallacy. It was said that the cession was a gift on our part, but two parties were necessary for such a gift, and before we ceded them we ought to consult those who had placed that trust in our hands.

Lord Wodehouse, (formerly Lord Russell's Under-Secretary) replied; after which the Address was agreed to, and their lordships adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The Address was moved by Mr. Calthorpe, who eulogized the policy of the Ministry, and Mr. Lincoln's emancipation edict. It was seconded by Mr. Bazley, of Manchester, one of the most ardent advocates of efforts to dispense with American cotton, and a disciple of Mr. Bright. This gentleman entered into an elaborate statistical disquisition on Lancashire distress and the prospects of the cotton supply. He was followed by Mr. Disraeli, who spoke evidently under great constraint upon American affairs, embarrassed by the knowledge that Lord Derby was to commit himself peremptorily against the recognition of the Confederate States. He said that he had approved the strict neutrality in act and in language at first observed by the Ministry; but regretted to see that during the recess they had individually expressed themselves in a manner anything but neutral. The Secretary for Ireland had said that the Lord of Hosts was on the side of the South; the Chancellor of the Exchequer had declared that the Southern leaders had made "an army, a navy, and a nation." If that were true, then the South was entitled to recognition; and if Government were not prepared for recognition, then Mr. Gladstone had no right to use such language. The President of the Board of Trade had used very different expressions, and displayed a very opposite feeling. Surely it was much to be regretted, unless a change had taken place in their policy, that the members of the Cabinet did not observe a stricter silence during the recess. Whatever their objection, however, to interfere in the American States, they had exhibited very little reluctance to interfering in the affairs of other states. In fact, the Government had occupied the greater part of the autumn in interfering in every part of the world except America. Their objection to interference, therefore, must be to interference in the abstract, not to interference in particular cases and under particular circumstances. He should like to know, for instance, what was the precise nature of our relations with China, and what was going on there at the present moment. So far as he could learn, there was constant fighting in that country, conducted in great measure by our fellow-subjects, whilst officers in her Majesty's service were enlisting our countrymen to interfere between the Emperor of China and his rebellious people. Our Chinese policy, begun by the noble lord at the head of the Government about twenty-five years ago, at first consisted of making war upon the Tartar dynasty; but now that policy had been changed, and we made war in favour of the Tartar dynasty against the Taepings. He contended that we had nothing to do with the Taepings, and that if we attempted in this roundabout manner to support the Tartar dynasty we should ultimately be again involved in a war with China, but on different sides and for different objects. A few months ago they were told that if they ventured to retrench the expenditure, the country would be subservient to France. He was happy to find, however, from the Speech of her Majesty's Commissioners, that they could not only retrench, but that retrenchment did not mean the humiliation of the country or subservieny to France. But hitherto, wars with China had seriously increased the expenditure of the country, and it was the duty of the Government to take care that they did not pursue a policy in this instance that would lead to expenditure. If they meant to effect a real reduction, then they must change their policy, not only with regard to Chinese, but many other questions. The right hon. gentleman also commented upon the Schleswig-Holstein difficulty—a question which everybody affected to understand, but none could explain. Explanations were required upon these questions, and also regarding Rome, the incredible conduct of the Government in respect to Brazil, their policy upon Turkish affairs, and Greece and the Ionian Islands. Why, he asked, had they delayed for four months to refuse the acceptance of the Crown of Greece by Prince Alfred, if, as the Royal Speech stated, diplomatic engagements existed to prevent it? And what was the effect of offering the Ionian Islands to the Greeks but favouring the policy which that time last year the Government denounced? He considered these islands as British territory, acquired by conquest, and if they were ceded to Greece they would be accepted only as an instalment of what that country hoped to obtain hereafter from Turkey.

Colonel Sykes (formerly Chairman of the East India Company) made a strong speech in favour of the Taepings, whose cause he always espouses, in season and out of season, with a vehemence which amuses the House. Lord Robert Montague—a Conservative malcontent, without any following, but with a perseverance that ensures him a respectful hearing from the green cushions, and the gentlemen who take it in turns to keep their seats on the front bench, on either side of the Speaker's Chair—made a rambling speech on the revenue, the cession of the Ionian Islands, and a few other topics. He was succeeded by Mr. Maguire, who strongly approved the abandonment of the Ionian protectorate, but dwelt chiefly on the distress in the north of Ireland, which was, he declared, so serious as to amount to a public danger. Several other members spoke on miscellaneous subjects; and then Lord Palmerston rose. He retorted upon the preceding Government, of which Mr. Disraeli was a member, the charge of an intriguing policy. No such charge was applicable to his Ministry. The selection of an English Prince for the crown of Greece had been avowedly influenced by the straightforwardness of policy for which England was renowned, and by her reputation of the invariable protector of the weak against the strong. He defended the consistency of his policy in China. The obstructions to our trade there had at first proceeded from the Imperial Government. We had to remove those obstacles by force. Now, the Chinese Government was on the most friendly footing with our own. The only obstacles to our trade were interposed by the Taepings—murderous marauders, who destroyed peace, industry, and commerce wherever they went; but we did not make war against the Taepings, we only required them to keep at a distance from the cities in which we had establishments. We had, indeed, allowed British officers to engage in the Imperial service to assist in restoring order. It was our interest that order should reign in China, where we had succeeded in making friends of the people, once suspicious of all foreigners. In regard to Denmark, we had long been engaged in an endeavour to mediate between that Power and the German Confederation. Last year the Diet threatened to march troops into Holstein. We prevented that step, and after that it was with the view to a permanent arrangement Lord Russell wrote the despatch which has called forth so much censure. As to Greece, the opinion of the Government, that Prince Alfred could not accept the Throne, had been communicated to the Greek Minister at the earliest possible moment. Whatever delay had occurred had been caused by the necessity of negotiation with Russia as to the exclusion of the Duke of Leuchtenberg. The Ionian Islands formed no part of the British dominions, our Queen was not their Sovereign, our treaties did not bind them. They were a separate republic, under British protection, and at present the abandonment of that protectorate appeared to him a wise and generous measure. As to the offer of a refuge for the Pope—the fact was, that the Pope had asked whether he would be received in England; and Lord Russell directed our agent at Rome to reply, that if the Pope were obliged to quit that city, he should be received at Malta in a manner befitting his rank.

Sir John Bowyer (the representative of a certain section of English Catholics) complained that Lord Palmerston had spoken more courteously of the Government of a Mahomedan Sultan, than of that of a Christian bishop. The noble lord had not given a correct account of what had passed between the Pope and Mr. Odo Russell. All that the Holy Father had really said was, "Well, if I am in trouble, perhaps some day I may ask you for assistance." On this Lord Russell wrote, offering a reception at Malta, and telling the Pope if he did not accept it now he was likely, ere long, to be compelled to do so. The speaker then launched into a bitter tirade against the Roman Triumvirate of 1849, and the present Government of Italy; and declared, to the great amusement of the House, that the British Ministry would be "eternally cursed" for the support they had given to the latter.

Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald (Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs under Lord Derby's Government) expressed surprise that Lord Palmerston had made no reference in his speech either to America or Poland. He censured the interference of Lord Russell on behalf of Germany against Denmark, and declared the cession of the Ionian Islands to be impolitic, inexpedient, and unjustifiable. He quoted the opinions of various authorities upon their political and military importance, and cited especially the strong expressions used by Mr. Gladstone, when sent on a special mission by Lord Derby's Government, against their annexation to Greece. Mr. Whalley, who has succeeded to the heritage of Mr. Spooner's hatred to Popery closed the debate, and the House adjourned at a quarter to 12.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 6.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

A conversation took place on the condition and prospects of the Volunteer force, whose claims were pressed on the Government by several peers. The Under-Secretary for War said it was the intention of the Government to make a grant of money to Volunteer corps for specified purposes.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 6.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to a question from Mr. Laird, Mr. Layard said that the papers relating to the Brazilian difficulty would be laid on the table. The facts were as follows:—Our Consul at Rio Grande do Sal had received information of the wreck of a British ship on an inhospitable part of the coast. He went thither, in the company of a judge and some coastguards, found the remains of the vessel and its cargo, and heard that some bodies had been washed ashore. With difficulty he obtained an inquest on some of these bodies, but the result of that inquest was not satisfactory. It was the belief of the Consul the seamen had been murdered, and that the local magistrate had shared in the plunder of the vessel. The Brazilian Government thought otherwise, and refused to proceed against him, though it punished others of the culprits. While the negotiation was pending on this matter, an indignity was offered to three officers of H.M.S. Forte. Reprisals were made by the Admiral commanding our squadron at Rio, and thereupon Brazil yielded, promised to pay damages for the wreck, and deferred the other question to the arbitration of the King of the Belgians.

Mr. Bentinck (a Conservative, who affects independence, and envies Mr. Disraeli) expressed his approval of the surrender of the Ionian Islands, and said that he thought that if he were again as last year to propose for the recognition of the Confederate States, the proposal would be more favourably received. The war was not a war about Slavery, if it were, the South would have no sympathizers in England. The strong sympathy which was felt was due to the infamous conduct of the Federal Government, and the gallantry of the Southern people. He thought that the distress in Lancashire was chiefly attributable to over-speculation, and expressed a fear that the habit of depending on charity would demoralize the Lancashire population. Mr. Newdegate, the exponent of Ultra-Protestant views in the House of Commons, approved of the offer of a refuge at Malta to the Pope, and thought the place exceedingly well chosen. Several other gentlemen took part in a general conversation. A brief discussion subsequently took place on the removal of Irish paupers from England, and on the expenses of the Railway legislation. The House adjourned at half-past 8.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 9.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Lord Wrottesley called attention to the condition of the multitude of charitable endowments existing throughout the country. Under the present system a great deal of money is wasted, or so applied as to do harm, not good. Many founders had attached to their bequest conditions which are now absurd or mischievous. He cited many particular instances in which educational funds were simply wasted, and others in which periodical donations of bread or money were found productive of wide-spread demoralization and drunkenness. He thought the general administration of such charities should be transferred to a competent Board. Lord Granville replied, that in the opinion of Government the Charity Commissioners had sufficient power to deal with the abuses referred to.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 9.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Colonel Sykes asked the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether, as permission was given, by a notification in the Gazette of January 13th, to British officers to accept commissions in the service of the Emperor of China, similar permission extended to British officers and British subjects to accept commissions in the service of the Taeping Emperor or his Government.

Mr. Layard said that no permission had been given to officers to hold commissions under the Taeping Emperor, with whom our Government was not acquainted.

In answer to Mr. Gregory, Lord Palmerston said, that notice had been given to the Galway Packet Company that whenever their vessels should be in a condition to fulfil the services required, her Majesty's Government would recommend to the House the renewal of their postal contracts. In answer to another question from the same gentleman, Mr. C. Fortescue, the Under-Secretary for the Colonies, said negotiations were going on among the British American Colonies in regard to the construction of the Inter-Colonial Railway, and that, on certain conditions, the Imperial Government would lend its credit to the enterprise. In answer to Lord Stanley, the Secretary for India gave an account of the progress making in the harbour of Sedashegur, the available port for the cotton districts of Bombay.

In answer to a question, Lord Palmerston said, the Greek question at present stands thus: the Greek nation fixed upon the election of Prince Alfred, son of her Majesty, and it was only yesterday that the Greek Minister communicated that decision to my noble friend at the head of the Foreign-office. To that, of course, the answer given was in conformity with the announcement in the speech; but no other candidate has yet been proposed to the Greek nation in any formal manner. The Duke of Saxe-Coburg has been sounded privately to know whether, in the event of his being proposed and elected, he would accept the throne, and he has decidedly declined being put in nomination. (Laughter.)

On a formal motion that a supply be granted to her Majesty, Mr. Hennessey began a strong speech upon Poland, but was informed by the Speaker that he was out of order. Sir George Grey asked leave to bring in a bill relating to Corrupt Practices at elections, which was granted. After a short conversation, the Secretary for War moved for leave to bring in a bill to alter the manner in which the Militia accounts are at present prepared. They have hitherto been submitted to a Select Committee. It is proposed that they shall be directly submitted to the House along with the other military accounts. Some members, especially officers, objected to the measure, but leave was given, as a matter of course.

Sir Robert Peel, Chief Secretary for Ireland, asked leave to introduce a bill to establish an efficient system of registration of births and deaths in Ireland. Some discussion took place as to the propriety of including marriages, on account of the anomalous state of the Irish Marriage Law. Great difficulty is evidently felt on this subject from the danger of affronting the religious prejudices of the Irish, and of collision with the Catholic clergy. Leave was given, and the House adjourned at a quarter to 8.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 10.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

A rather interesting conversation took place with regard to the release of convicts on tickets of leave. In answer to Lord Stanhope, Lord Granville said that in the case of persons re-convicted of felony, orders had been given by the Home Office, that no portion of the second sentence should be remitted. Complaints were made that the conditions annexed to the ticket of leave were virtually inoperative. The Earl of Carnarvon censured severely the recent conduct of Sir George Grey, and the frequency with which he had pardoned prisoners sentenced to death, contrary to the advice of the Judges. He thought that the mercy of the Crown ought to be much more sparingly exercised.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 10.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

No business of any importance was done. The order of the Home Office, in reference to re-convicted persons, referred to in the House of Lords, was asked for, and promised. Leave was given for the introduction of several Bills, and Mr. Hennessey and Mr. Darby Griffith put questions regarding Poland and the Ionian Islands. Mr. Peacock took occasion to censure the surrender of Corfu, which commands the Adriatic, as an unfriendly act to Austria, whose commerce is greatly increasing, and whose only forts are situated on that sea. Lord Palmerston said there had never been any question of reconstituting the kingdom of Poland, and that the Austrian Court was bitterly opposed to any such project. He stated also that, in his opinion, the Crown had unquestioned right to cede any of its possessions, but that it could not hand over the Ionian Islands to Greece without the consent of the other parties to the Treaty of Vienna. The House adjourned at a quarter to 6.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 11.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The House met at 12 o'clock.

The sitting was occupied almost entirely by the discussion of Mr. McMahon's bill for the amendment of the Salmon Fishery Laws in Ireland, providing for the abolition of "fixed engines" for the capture of fish. The bill was read a second time. Some formal business was transacted, and the House rose at twenty minutes after 4.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Feb. 11.

Our last report closed on a quiet market with Fair Dhollerahs at 17d., and Middling Orleans at 22½d.

The good feeling which was manifested during the few previous days, had disappeared, and we had again relapsed into dullness.

On Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, the daily sales were only 2,000 bales. Speculators held aloof, and the trade and exporters bought only to relieve their pressing necessities, while each day sellers became more anxious to realise and to effect sales, submitted to a large concession in price.

On Monday with sales of 3,000 bales, the same pressure to sell existed with great irregularity in prices, and sales were forced at a decline of fully 1d. per lb. on the rates ruling a week previous.

On Tuesday, the receipt of good India news imparted a steadier tone to the market; at Calcutta, a rise in goods of 6d. per piece was reported; at Bombay an improvement had also taken place, and native dealers were buying pretty freely for the interior markets.

The cause of this recent panic is owing to an impression on the part of many that the North is so beset with difficulties, that she soon will be glad to accept the friendly offices of European Powers, and that the French Emperor's proposal recently made may possibly be accepted. It was argued by such that the Northern armies were fully matched at all points, and, if forced to advance, would meet with fresh defeats; that no confidence was entertained on behalf of the troops for their commanders, and that on the expiring of the time of service of the nine months' recruits, it would be impossible to raise another army. To these were added their financial difficulties, whilst many believed the North was on the point of breaking up, and a revolution imminent. Such impressions as these exerted a greater influence here through the non-arrival of the usual American steamers.

To-day, however, the Hibernian's news are to hand, which have restored a measure of confidence again. No mention is made of the French mediation offer, the accounts are warlike and no Northern reverses reported. Cotton had reached the enormous figure of 92 cents, showing a margin of 5d. to 6d. to the shipper from the market.

Confidence here has consequently been restored, and with sales of 7000 bales, prices are ½d. to ¾d. over the depressed sales over the last few days. Fair Dhollerah and Omrawuttee worth 15½d., and Middling Orleans 22½d.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, February 10, 1863.

The amount of business done in yarn and cloth during the past week, has been on the most limited scale, owing in a great measure to the drooping tendency of the Liverpool market from day to day.

Yarns whether for export, or home consumption, have been in little demand, and in cases where parties were inclined to buy, a considerable concession would have been submitted to on the part of the seller.

Cloth has been equally neglected, although there is not the same disposition shown by holders of this staple, to give way at all, on the quotations of last week.

To day we have had an exceedingly flat market, notwithstanding the receipt of further telegrams from Calcutta and Bombay, of dates 26th and 27th January respectively, advising an advance on shirting of from two to four annas per piece, and a further advance in price of yarns.

Home trade yarns from No. 32s to 40s twist and pineops, were sold at from 1d. to 1½d. per lb. under last week's prices, and the reduction in price of 60s twist may be set down at 2d. per lb. below last Tuesday's quotations.

Cloth remains nominally firm, although there is no business doing by which to test prices.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

The hon. Mr. Seddon, of Virginia, has been appointed Confederate Secretary of War, in the place of General Randolph, who resigned the office and reported himself for service in the field.

The Honourable R. W. Johnson has been re-elected Confederate States' Senator from Arkansas. Mr. Johnson has represented his State in Congress for many years. The Hon. W. A. Graham has been elected Confederate States' Senator for North Carolina, in place of the Hon. George Davis, whose term expires on the 4th of March. Mr. Graham was the Conservative nominee.

STATE GOVERNORS.—The following is a list of the Governors of the "Confederate States of America":—Alabama, J. G. Shorter; Arkansas, H. Flanagan; Florida, John Milton; Georgia, Joseph E. Brown; Kentucky, Richard Hawes; Louisiana, Thomas O. Moore; Mississippi, John J. Pettus; Missouri, C. F. Jackson; North Carolina, Zeb. B. Vance; South Carolina, F. W. Pickens; Tennessee, Isham G. Harris; Texas, F. R. Lubbock; Virginia John Letcher.

Amongst the deaths in the army we notice that of General Heiman, of Nashville, who died at Jackson, Mississippi; and of Major Moore, of General Tilghman's Staff, who died suddenly at Abbeville, Mississippi.

General Toombs having declined the position of Senator for Georgia, to which he was chosen, and which has been filled temporarily by the Hon. John W. Lewis, the Legislature of Georgia has filled the vacancy thus created by the election of the Hon. Herschel V. Johnson.

CONFEDERATE FINANCES.—An important movement is being made in reference to the Confederate debt. It is proposed that it shall be guaranteed by the several States in proportion to their representation, so that each State will definitely assume a fixed amount of responsibility. The following resolutions have been lately adopted by the Legislature of Alabama:—

Whereas, The Government of the Confederate States is involved in war for the independence of each of the States of the Confederacy as well as for its own existence; And, whereas, the destiny of each State of the Confederacy is indissolubly connected with that of the Confederate Government: And, whereas, the Confederate Government cannot successfully prosecute the war to a speedy and honourable peace without ample means of credit; be it therefore—

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Alabama, in General Assembly convened, That, in the opinion of this General Assembly, it is the duty of each State of the Confederate Government to guarantee the debt of that Government in proportion to its representation in the Congress of that Government.

Resolved further, That the State of Alabama hereby proposes to her sister States of the Confederacy, to guarantee said debts on said basis, provided that each of said States shall accept the proposition, and adopt suitable legislation to carry it into effect, in which event these resolutions shall stand as the guaranty of this State for the aforesaid proportion of the debt of said Confederate Government.

Resolved further, That His Excellency the Governor be and he is hereby requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the Governor of each State of the Confederacy, and to the President of the Confederate States.

Passed 28th of November, 1862.

As early as the 19th of May, 1862, the Legislature of Virginia adopted the following resolution:—

Resolved, That the Confederate stock should be guaranteed by the several States of the Confederacy, according to their respective Confederate proportions, and that Congress be requested to bring the subject to the attention of the Legislatures of the several States.

Judge L. W. Crook died at Dalton, Georgia, on the 27th of November. Early in the war Judge Crook entered the military service as captain of a company in the 39th Georgia Volunteers, and had recently been promoted to the rank of Major in that regiment.

THE RETRIEUTION.—Captain John Parker is first officer of the ship, and C. Carroll Hicks second officer.

A new daily paper is announced at Jackson, Mississippi, to be called the Southern Crisis, by Judge J. W. Tucker, late editor of the St. Louis State Journal, and who was one of the first victims of Lincolnite despotism in that city.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOIZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

Agency for the Continent: G. FOWLER, 279, Rue St. Honore, Paris.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1863.

The Military Situation.

The black frost has come and gone; early spring, with its rain and mud, its swollen torrents and inundated plains, is close at hand, and the Federals have accomplished nothing. The grand Army of the Potomac, its ranks thinned by desertion, disease, and exposure, lies motionless along the north bank of the Rappahannock. The great armada that was to sweep the Mississippi from Cairo to New Orleans has met with signal defeat. Rosecrans in Tennessee barely holds his own; and on the sea coast, Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile are still only threatened. The solitary success that has fallen to the Federal commanders is the surprise of an isolated post on the White River in Arkansas, which has about as much influence on the issue of the war as the capture of Scarborough Castle would have upon an invasion of Cornwall. But if the Federals have hitherto reaped only a crop of disasters in the winter campaign, they are not yet disposed to abate one jot of the magnificence of their original programme. The latest accounts show that the Anaconda scheme is still the grand idea of the Washington Government. Everything is changed but the hardihood of conception which has distinguished the Federal war administration from the beginning. The notable project of General Scott has not only survived the military reputation of its author, but is to this day destroying army after army, and ruining general after general; although the most casual observer, outside Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, must perceive that what might have been achieved eighteen months ago, when Scott was Commander-in-Chief, is utterly impracticable now; and that the first failure of his plans for the subjugation of the South was equivalent to a demonstration that they never would succeed; for the hope of the North lay in the first twelve months of the war. General Scott had good reason to believe that the enormous forces the North could bring to bear, both by land and sea, would literally sweep away all opposition from men unorganized, surprised, without the materiel of war, and without hope of obtaining it. The North saw a great army, magnificently accoutred and equipped, spring from the soil, like the offspring of the dragon's teeth of old. It beheld great fleets of steamers in its ports, a powerful navy scouring the coast, an inexhaustible mine of wealth in the profuse eagerness of its impressible population. What wonder that General Scott, too, saw only one side, and believed that he had only to set these great armaments in motion, to encircle "rebellion" East, South, and West, with a chain of fire and sword, to march with overwhelming numbers upon Richmond, the life and centre of the "rebellion," in order to ensure a swift and complete success. But General Scott's scheme, barely practicable in 1861-62, is impossible now. The conditions of its success no longer exist. The South is prepared; its assailable points secure; its lines contracted; its internal communications guarded; its manhood properly trained and armed; its whole society organized for defence.

It is not with armies beaten in almost every encounter in the field, demoralized by frequent change of commanders, distracted by diverse policies, and led by inefficient officers, that so vast and intricate a programme can be carried out with a hope of success.

From first to last the Federals have aimed at accomplishing too much, and this cardinal error in military operations is still ruining their cause. At this moment they are conducting half-a-dozen campaigns, and yet the Army of the Potomac has not advanced seventy miles from Washington. Richmond is probably more secure than she has ever been during the war; and an army of some 100,000 men is cooped up at Falmouth, by six feet of snow, leaving General Lee comparatively free to reinforce the Confederate troops in Tennessee, North or South Carolina, as occasion may require. A little further South, we find another great Federal army concentrated at Newbern in North Carolina territory, on the direct line of communication between Richmond, and Wilmington, and Charleston, and destined, it is said, to operate immediately upon Wilmington, in conjunction with a powerful force of gunboats and iron clads. Wilmington is strongly fortified, and its defences are entrusted to Gustavus Smith, who has the reputation of being an able and resolute general. Fort Caswell, commanding Wilmington Harbour, has already repulsed one attack of the Federal squadron. Charleston in South Carolina, and Savannah in Georgia, are threatened in their turn, and fighting is already reported at the latter place. Both towns are prepared for a determined defence. Beauregard, who has personally superintended the coast fortifications, is in command at Charleston. Every available means for opposing a lengthened resistance to the enemy has been employed. In either case a strong army will be required to co-operate with the sea attack. No doubt the capture of all these posts would inflict great injury on the Confederates. Independently of its moral effect, it would effectually shut them out from intercourse with the world, and place three of the most important States of the Confederacy at the mercy of the North. But here, again, the multiplicity of the objects of attack is safety to the South. There is railroad communication between Savannah and Charleston, and between Charleston and Wilmington. The North has not three squadrons and three armies sufficiently strong to attack simultaneously; whilst the Confederates can readily succour the point which may be most pressed. Charleston alone would, we believe, give ample employment to all the available Federal strength on the eastern sea coast. When we add Mobile, Alabama, to the list of towns already marked out for destruction this spring, we have said more than enough to prove that the North is doomed to new disappointments, probably to new disasters.

But the attack on the fortified towns of the eastern coast is only a small portion of the Northern programme. The Mississippi has yet to be cleared, and the Confederacy riven asunder by gunboats and armies from Memphis and New Orleans. Long ago President Davis pointed out Vicksburg and Port Hudson as the keys of the Mississippi. On these two fortresses, naturally strong, the Confederates have bestowed all their abundance of labour, and all their engineering skill. General Joe Johnston, than whom there is no more daring or accomplished officer in the Southern army, has the supreme command. The issue of the war in the South-West depends upon their powers of resistance. General Banks' force, with Commander Farragut's flotilla, is at Baton Rouge and New Orleans, waiting for the rise of the river to attack Port Hudson. General McClelland, who superseded General Sherman, has returned from his raid in Arkansas, but, more prudent than his predecessor, has settled down to digging his way past Vicksburg. The Mississippi at this point takes a sudden wind, leaving a narrow neck of land on the western bank, immediately opposite Vicksburg. If this neck of land can be cut through, it is hoped that portion of the river will change its course, and the batteries of Vicksburg be left high and dry. The experiment is not a new one. It was tried last year, and failed. We shall see whether McClelland and Grant succeed better. At Port Hudson there is no such chance for the Federals. What they do there must be done by hard fighting. And as the Confederate works extend some distance along high bluffs, the gunboats, exposed as they will be to a plunging fire, must suffer considerably. But until Port Hudson is reduced, Banks cannot assist at the capture of Vicksburg, and if the Confederates have anything like the strength attributed to them at these two points, with their power of rapid intercommunication, we may expect that they will not only successfully resist attack, but severely cripple the enemy.

In the meantime considerable anxiety is felt in the North for the safety of Rosecrans. By the last accounts that general was in command of some 40,000 or 50,000 men at Shelbyville, a few miles south of Murfreesboro', in Tennessee. There seems no reason to doubt that Longstreet, with a considerable force detached from the army of Richmond, has taken Bragg's place, and that another battle, on which the fate of Tennessee depends, is imminent. Both sides have received reinforcements. Both armies are composed of the same stuff—sturdy backwoodsmen, accustomed to the use of axe and rifle, probably about the best material for soldiers that could be found in the States. General Rosecrans has displayed more ability than any of his predecessors in the South-West: and he possesses to a greater degree than any Northern commander, except McClelland, the confidence of his soldiers. General Longstreet's reputation has been won in half-a-dozen hard-fought battles in Virginia and Maryland. If Rosecrans is defeated, the whole of Tennessee will be lost to the Federals, and the war will be once more transferred on a grand scale to Kentucky. If the Federals are victorious, they will secure a strong position in Eastern Tennessee on the Tennessee River, and obtain the command of the Richmond and Memphis railroad. Such a success could not fail to be of serious disadvantage to the Confederates. We are, however, more inclined to believe in a retrograde movement of the Federal army upon Nashville, than an advance, in which defeat would be destruction. On the whole, there is nothing in the military aspect to betoken a want of vigour on either side. In one quarter or another great battles must be fought before another month is passed, but everywhere the advantage of position is with the Confederates, who, with secured communications and concentrated forces, are acting against an enemy frittering away his strength in desultory and unconnected efforts. Moreover, in another month or two the term of service of the nine months men in the Federal army will have expired. There are upwards of 200,000 of these men in the ranks at the present moment. How they will be replaced it is impossible to see. Only a series of successes, which will reinspire the North, or a change in the Administration at Washington, will fill up the gap caused by their retirement. The North, then, must strike at once. But we should be ignoring all military experience; we should have lost our recollection of the struggle of the last eighteen months, if we could doubt for an instant that victory will once more be with the good generalship, the discipline, and the daring enterprise which have illustrated the Confederate cause from the commencement of the contest.

The Party Leaders on the American Question.

Among the slanderous tales told of extra-Metropolitan and Welch juries, is one of twelve honest men refusing to give a verdict, though the case was proved. "Can I assist you on the points in which you have a difficulty in coming to a decision?" inquired the judge. "Oh no, my lord," replied the foreman, we are all agreed that the plaintiff has proved his case, and we say so frankly, but we do not think he ought to have a verdict." This story illustrates the treatment of the Confederate States in Parliament on Thursday last.

We never remember such unanimity on any important subject. On the American question the Ministers and the Opposition leaders are agreed. They admit the independence of the Confederate States is a fact, and not a theory, but they also think that it becomes England to officially ignore a fact that is too palpable to be veiled from observation. There was some difference of opinion as to the refusal of the French offer of a joint mediation, but so mildly did Mr. Disraeli touch upon this point, that if his observations had fallen from an influential supporter of the Government, they would not have disturbed the confidence and happy composure of the occupants of the Treasury Benches. The most singular part of the business is, that among Lord Palmerston's and Lord Derby's followers are a majority of members who would gladly vote for recognition; but so perfect is our parliamentary system of party warfare—a system which may sometimes result in a gross injustice, but which is one of the causes of the good-working of our Constitution—that when party leaders refuse to give the word of command the pleas of justice and expediency are disregarded by their supporters. Happily these differences are not of any long continuance, and generally the leaders take the earliest opportunity of making a graceful concession; but in the present instance we do not look for an early solution of the difficulty, for though recognition of the Confederate States cannot be adjourned sine die, it may be postponed until that more convenient season, when the North is further impoverished and destroyed by fruitless efforts to subdue the South, when the manhood of the South is further decimated in the defence of home and country, and when the English cotton trade is permanently crippled.

Lord Derby, as usual, was frank and explicit. He said: "I declare my firm conviction that there is no possibility of re-establishing the union between the North and the South." That is to say, it is his lordship's firm conviction, not only that the independence of the Confederate States is accomplished, but that there is no question as to its stability—that there is no possibility of reunion. Lord Derby is firmly convinced that this bloody war is utterly in vain; that the North is fighting to conquer the Southern nationality, which is impossible. His lordship very sensibly and emphatically repudiates the idea of a mediation or negotiation that is not based upon the fundamental principle of the recognition of Southern independence. Yet, regretting to differ from his personal and political friends, he had "no fault to find with, no objection to raise to, the course which her Majesty's Government has pursued with respect to what is justly called the 'desolating warfare' now raging." He was sorry the proposal of the French Emperor to make an attempt—however hopeless it might be—to bring about an armistice was not entertained; but even on this point he assumes the Ministers to be much better informed than he is. We know not why they should be. Our Minister at Washington may be better acquainted with the sentiments of the Lincoln Government, but it is not a question what the Government, but what the people, of the United States would think of the offer, and her Majesty's Government have no exclusive means of ascertaining the views of the Northern people. It must be confessed that Lord Derby was remarkably inconsistent, for he approves the conduct of the Government in not recognizing the Confederate States, yet he regrets they did not join in an offer of mediation, which he shows conclusively could only be based on recognition. We will not review the precedents for recognition recited by Lord Derby; but we presume no one will dispute that the principle to be deduced from them is, that a de facto nationality is to be recognized—that is, a nationality so firmly established that in the opinion of foreign nations there is no hope of its being conquered. The petty wars going on in Italy did not prevent our recognition of the kingdom of Italy. And why? for no other reason than that the struggle on the part of the dethroned Princes of Italy was considered hopeless. So, too, when the revolted colonies of Spain were recognized. No one supposed that Spain was incapable of further effort; no one denied that she had more blood and treasure to expend in the vain contest. Spain protested that she had the power to continue the contest; but in spite of that protest the great Powers recognized the colonies, upon the plea that the attempt to subjugate them was hopeless. Now, as far as the American belligerents are concerned, these precedents are all-sufficient. From the proximity of the hostile nations, no matter how long the war lasts, great armies can be kept in the field, and great, and bloody, but indecisive battles fought. Well, when are we to recognize Southern independence? Are we to wait until the North is utterly exhausted? Are we to wait until the ravages of war have destroyed the manhood of the North and of the South? No; such is not the law of nations, such is not the rule taught us by precedents. We are not speaking of intervention, but of recognition. We are not saying, whatever may be our opinion, that the moment has arrived when it behoves Christian Europe to declare that they will no longer permit the prosecution of a useless war. But we contend that when Europe believes that the independence of the Confederate States is established, it is bound to recognize that independence. Lord Derby emphatically declared that he was firmly convinced that reunion is impossible, or, in other words, that the independence of the South is established on an enduring basis. Yet his lordship thinks we have a right to deny to the Confederates their hard and nobly-won title to independence. We confess we are unable to understand how the noble lord arrives at such a conclusion.

Lord Malmesbury also approved of the action, or rather inaction, of the British Ministry; but he hoped that Lord Russell had remonstrated with the Washington Government upon the barbarous conduct of the war. We do not deny that such a remonstrance has been called for by Federal atrocities, but to have so remonstrated would have been to intervene to a far greater extent than is implied in simple recognition, and would be much more likely to cause ill-will in the North.

Lord Russell was not to be outdone by the Conservative leader, and he went as far as to declare that the worst disaster that could happen would be the success of the North. He said: "If the old feelings of affection and attachment towards the Union could be revived in the South, I for one would be glad to see the Union again formed." Thus, the Foreign Secretary admits that the Union is dissolved; and, of course, he knows that the revival of affection and attachment is utterly impossible. His lordship is very accommodating; if the Union cannot be restored on those terms, he would be glad to see peace established on the basis of a separation. He then goes on to discuss another alternative.

But there might be, I say, one end of the war that would prove a calamity to the United States and to the world, and especially to the negro race in those countries, and that would be the subjugation of the South by the North. One of the first consequences of such a subjugation would be that the North must keep up a large army, must renounce all its former policy, and must put down by force free discussion and a free press in the South. That would be a dangerous thing. Would not anarchy prevail in the South? Would not the whole state of society, and of labour be disorganized, perhaps for a century to come?

This language is indeed plain. It tells us that the subjugation of the South means, not only the degradation of the white race, but the oppression of the negro. His lordship is right. A direr curse could not fall upon the negroes than that they should come under the dominion of Northern Abolitionists. But the noble lord does not fear such a catastrophe; he does not imagine that the North can subdue the South. He knows that between the two sections this wicked war has put a sea of blood that would keep them asunder for ever, even if they were not eternally parted, as they are, by national differences. Nothing remains, then, but peace at some time or other, upon the basis of separation; but Lord Russell will not yet recognize the accomplished and inevitably lasting independence of the Confederate States, and by placing the true issue before the people of the United States, hasten the advent of peace.

In the House of Commons, Lord Palmerston did not vouchsafe to say a word on the subject, and we appreciate the reason of his reticence. His Cabinet is notoriously divided, and he could not speak without offending some members of it. But as he followed the leader of the Opposition without questioning his views on the war in America, we may assume that, so far as the right honourable gentleman's observations had reference to the question of recognition, they met with the approval of the Premier.

Except that Mr. Disraeli uttered a few brilliant and telling sarcasms about the Ministers delivering themselves each of his individual speech on the American question, he said ditto to the opinions of his noble chief. He acknowledged that the Southern States were struggling for some of the greatest objects of existence, but he completely endorsed the policy of the Government. He said it had taken up a position "of politic and dignified reserve," and that the course of her Majesty's Government was "honourable and beneficial." Mr. Disraeli sympathizes with and respects the Southern people, but he thinks it right to withhold an official acknowledgment of their existence.

There is no doubt that the refusal to recognize the South arises from the fear of offending the North. We are convinced that the fear is groundless, and by the refusal to do this simple act of justice we are laying up for ourselves bitter and lasting enmity. When the war does end—when the North wakes from her fevered dream and finds herself ruined, she will reproach us that we stood anxiously yet idly looking on, and not only refused to stretch forth a hand to snatch her from her peril, but even encouraged her to persevere in her disastrous course by refusing to officially warn her of the hopelessness of the struggle. We cannot agree with Mr. Disraeli that it is politic or dignified for this, the mother country of the Anglo-Saxon race, not to make some effort, at all events the moral effort of recognition, to stop the war. At present the United States could not resent such a measure; hereafter they would thank us for it. Now, if they desired to do so, although it is the eleventh hour, recognition would make the South our ally against any future aggression of the North; but if the war goes on to the bitter end we shall be without a friend on the continent of America. It seems to us that the policy of inaction is cruel, unjust, and impolitic.

A Word for the Negro.

The emancipation scheme of the North is condemned in advance by the insincerity of its motive, since its authors scarcely care to deny that they regard it purely as a military measure to "crush the rebellion"; and Mr. Lincoln has himself publicly declared, that if he could restore the Union by freeing none of the slaves, or by freeing some, and leaving the others in slavery, he would do so. It is condemned by the interests of mankind and of civilization, since it aims at converting into a barren waste one of the most fertile and productive regions of the inhabited globe. It is condemned by the laws of God and man, since it is in open violation of that Constitution for which the North professes to wage war, and since it incites and employs servile insurrection, with the attendant horrors of rapine and murder, which are crimes alike against the laws of God and man. For these reasons the unanimous voice of the virtue and intelligence of this country has denounced the scheme, and the most active efforts to enlist or entrap respectable sympathies in its behalf have signally failed. But if men are found with whom these reasons are not sufficient, who would disregard divine and human laws in the blindness of fanaticism which does evil that good may come from it, and who would set the interests of four million blacks above those of eight million whites, of humanity at large, and of civilization; then, even in the views of such men—even in the interest of the four million of negro slaves—must the Northern scheme of emancipation be condemned.

Within less than fifty years, unaided by immigration or importation from abroad, the African race in the slaveholding States of North America has grown from half a million souls to nearly four millions,

This unprecedented natural increase argues, according to the ascertained laws of population, not merely a high degree of physical well-being, but a much better moral status than is in this country usually assigned to the negro slaves. It is impossible to suppose, unless at the same time we suppose the Divine ordinances to be suspended in this especial case, that a race sunk in gross vices, and living in habitual violation of natural and moral laws, could thus grow and multiply. Facts accessible to every painstaking inquirer leave us in no doubt or perplexity on this head. The religious statistics of the Confederate States inform us that the number of negro communicants of the various Christian denominations is largely over four hundred thousand, or considerably more than 10 per cent. of the entire slave population—religious statistics which compare favourably with those of the labouring classes in any other country, and can probably not be equalled in any other which has no established church. Another important point regarding the moral condition of the slaves deserves attention. The precepts and terrors of religion—the imitative instincts of the negro race—the influence, nay, the self interest, of the masters—all combine to ensure not only the universal outward observance, but the sanctity of the marriage tie among the negroes. If men will reason on this subject as they do on others, they cannot fail to see how powerful is each of the agencies we have mentioned, and more particularly one which we have not mentioned—the intuition, as we shall term it, since there are those who will not admit that holier motives can actuate slaveholders—which makes the white women of the South the natural and most efficient protectors of the chastity of the female slaves. The hand can surely not have been an unfriendly one which has thus raised the negro from the turpitudes of the African savage, and which, in his upward progress, screens him from the temptations to which the wants and cares of a precarious existence expose all men, and his race particularly. The criminal statistics of the negro are equally satisfactory, and prove him remarkably free as well from the greater crimes as from the lesser offences against law and order. Thus, in half a century, has the fierce sanguinary African become a Christian labourer, contented with his lot, industrious, under a moral guidance, rather than a system of rigorous coercion, and looking upon the white man as his friend, teacher, and protector. Well may the Southerners say, that all the heroism and self-sacrifice of missionary efforts in heathen lands have not borne one tithe of these fruits. Now, let the conscientious philanthropist lay his hand on his heart, and ask himself whether, during these fifty years of slavery, the negro has not made greater progress toward freedom than he can ever make under such liberty of license as the North offers him—license to plunder, to burn, and to murder? Is the lesson which he has yet to learn, before he can take his place as a free labourer to be read by the light of his master's burning dwelling? Will religion find him a more docile pupil when his natural affections have been poisoned in their founts, and he has embued his hands in the blood of those whom from childhood he had been wonted to honour and to love? Will the negro rise or fall in the scale of civilization by such a training? and is he the friend or the enemy of the black race who desires for it such a future?

But it is obvious that, were it possible thus to rekindle in the negro the savage instincts of his African descent, the white man, being numerically, as well as in every other respect, the stronger, must in very self-defence turn against and exterminate him as he would a dangerous wild beast. Assume, however, that, the fratricidal hand of the Northern white man assisting the negro in the cruel work, the white man of the South succumbs, will the condition of the negro be then improved? Suppose the intelligence of the South banished, its youth massacred, its lands divided among the Northern conquerors, what then? The new proprietor will soon learn that without the negro's toil, his cotton, and rice, and sugar fields, are of no value. Under one form of servitude or another he will compel the negro to toil. Universal experience proves that the stranger makes a far more exacting, more mercenary, and less considerate, and less patient master than the man who was born to that condition, between whom and the inferior race there is the lifelong acquaintance of each other's virtues and faults, the natural confidence and the ties of natural affection which inevitably must grow from these. The negro, under the care of his former master, has given the most incontrovertible proofs of physical and moral well-being, by his marvellous natural increase from half a million of souls to four millions in fifty years, or at the rate of 16 per cent. per annum, an increase which has fully kept pace with the requirements for unskilled labour in the slaveholding States, and has precluded even the temptation for the re-opening of the African slave trade. In the North, as a free labourer, the negro, although recruited by fugitive and emancipated slaves, has remained stationary as an item of population during the same period. A similar phenomenon is noticed in regard to the negro population of the West Indies, where the insufficiency of labour is a constant subject of complaint. It may be fairly assumed that under his new Northern master the negro would not multiply so rapidly as he has heretofore done. The requirements for his labour would be the same. The deficiency must in that case be supplied from abroad, and since neither the German, nor the Irish, nor the native American, can withstand the semi-tropical sun in summer time, nor the miasmal exhalations of the cotton, rice, and sugar soils, this supply must come from Africa. It will then depend on circumstances alone whether this supply shall come under the old and proscribed name of the slave trade, or cloaked under the disguise of a more euphonious name.

AMERICAN POLITICAL CONTESTS.*

Among the many peculiarities which most forcibly strike the English student of American history and American politics, and remind him how wide is the difference between his own countrymen and the citizens of the United States, notwithstanding their common origin and common language, few are more notable than the characteristics of party warfare in the United States. In England, especially of late years, party conflicts have become more like those Italian battles of the Middle Ages in which two men killed and a dozen wounded were thought to constitute a loss severe enough to save the honour of the beaten party, than like the desperate and protracted contests of ancient or modern war. Since the days of Sir Robert Walpole there has been little of real and earnest hostility between the chiefs of the great political parties. Except Fox, whose character was in every respect exceptional amongst English statesmen, the leaders on either side have generally been disposed to treat their opponents with personal courtesy, and fairly acknowledge their individual honour, and their high claims to personal respect. And even Fox, when his great rival was dying, seems to have felt how unworthy and unjustifiable his behaviour towards him had been, when the Whig chiefs assembled at his house to discuss their proposed attack upon the Ministry, he told them that if they could enter upon a discussion of Mr. Pitt's policy at such a time, he could not; quoting the well-known line—

Sunt lacrymæ rerum, et mentem mortalium tangunt.

Since the Reform Bill, there has scarcely been one severe party battle, one contest in which the bitterness of party feeling has hurried the leading men on either side into language which they themselves would, in calmer years, regret and condemn, or provoked those lasting quarrels which no time and no subsequent change of circumstances can heal. The conflict on the repeal of the Corn Laws was not, in the proper sense of the word, a party conflict. The only struggle which took place on that occasion was within the camp of the Conservative party; and the personal bitterness which characterized it, and which has not to this day subsided, was provoked by what was thought an act of political treason; the betrayal of the Conservative cause by the chief whom the gentlemen of England—to use the words of his most vindictive enemy—"had been so proud to follow." And even Mr. Disraeli, before many years had passed, took an opportunity of doing justice to the memory of Sir Robert Peel in his admirable biography of the man who undertook the leadership of the deserted Protectionists. The only bitter personal enmities which still subsist in the higher ranks of political life are those which grew out of that collision. Between Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli there is evidently a feeling which can only be described as actual and venomous hatred. Neither can do justice to the other; neither can let pass an opportunity of inflicting pain or offering such insult as the strictness of Parliamentary forms will permit. But no such feeling is manifested on the one side towards Lord Palmerston, or on the other towards Lord Derby. The former is almost as great a favourite with his opponents as with his supporters; the latter is held in high honour, even among the most determined Liberals, and his conduct during the Lancashire distress has received a due meed of praise from the Ministerial speakers. Excepting the present and the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, there are no two statesmen of Ministerial rank who might not, so far as personal feelings are concerned, sit in the same Cabinet, and work together, at least, as cordially and loyally as can Lord Palmerston and Lord Russell.

Another characteristic of English party warfare is the limitation imposed upon it by the extreme looseness of party allegiance in the majority of the electors, the facility with which they transfer their votes from one party to another, whenever that with which they are naturally or habitually connected displeases them by its action on any important question, and the existence of a very large class of voters who cannot be properly classed either as Liberals or Conservatives; but who support that party which for the time being carries out most effectively the views of the majority of the English people. It is impossible for a Minister having a strong Parliamentary majority to set public opinion at defiance, as Mr. Lincoln is now doing; for he could not rely on his staunchest supporters. They dare not stand by him in such a course; first, because they could not rely on their own party in the constituencies; and secondly, because they know that an unpopular vote would turn the waverers and the independent class against them, and thus give a majority to their opponents. Public opinion is in this country supreme over administration, as over legislation; it has put down scandalous official corruption, and enforced a generally liberal system of foreign policy; it is Lord Paramount, even by the confession of the staunchest devotees of party, over party chiefs and their adherents; and it is so, mainly because it is, on the whole, the opinion of those who are more or less independent of party.

Again, English parties are wonderfully tenacious of life. The Whigs survived two long periods of utter depression; the first of which extended from the accession of Mr. Pitt to office to his death, a term of nearly twenty years, while the second, commencing about a year or two after his death, extended to 1829. During the greater part of these terms, they were not merely too weak to have any chance of disturbing the Ministry, but too weak to be able to maintain a formidable Opposition; yet they held together, though without hope of vanquishing their opponents or rewarding their friends, until the growth of liberal opinion and the divisions in the Tory camp gave them in their turn a twelve years' lease of power. In 1846 the cause of the Conservatives seemed worse than that of the Whigs had ever been; they were not only beaten, but routed, broken up, and deserted by every man of official rank and experience in the Lower House, and by almost every such man in the Upper. Yet they held together; and within six years they ousted their adversaries. Again driven from power, they again recovered it in 1858; and at this moment they have a decided majority in the House of Lords, and are said to divide the House of Commons almost equally with the Liberals. During the period which has witnessed these alternations, not only have several minor American parties vanished from the political world, but the two that seemed for awhile likely to take the lead in the Federal Government—first the Federalists, and secondly the Whigs, have in turn sunk out of existence, and become mere historical names, to which no living importance can be attached.

The utter want of moderation, the absence of personal courtesy, the bitterness of personal hostility which distinguishes all parties and nearly all party leaders in America, has often attracted the notice and provoked the contemptuous censure of the English press. The universality of partisanship has been less observed, but those who have seen the Americans at home, and been among them long enough to understand them closely, have not failed to note that there scarcely existed in the United States a class of men taking part in politics without being the adherents of a party. The unscrupulous and thoroughgoing character of party allegiance in America has been remarked and condemned by Americans themselves; and stands in somewhat curious contrast with the want of vital strength which seems to render fatal to American parties lighter injuries than those which those of England have each in turn endured and survived.

The explanation of the marked distinctions between the conduct and the nature of political parties in England and in the late United States, respectively, must be sought partly no doubt, in those differences of character which are national rather than political; but chiefly, we think, in the different conditions of political life in the two countries. Often as these have been dwelt upon, we hardly think that their importance has been exaggerated, or that their various bearings and their influence on parties, men, measures, and political manners have been by any means exhaustively treated.

One of the most fortunate conditions of political life in England is altogether wanting in America—we refer to that universal feeling of loyalty towards the Sovereign which is as much the protection of the country as the bulwark of the throne. It is possible that there may be among Englishmen, even among English politicians, men who are disloyal at heart, to whom loyalty seems, like chivalry, a mediæval dream, unworthy of the enlightenment of the 19th century. But even the most daring of Radical orators, addressing the most excited of Radical audiences, dare not utter a word disrespectful to the Sovereign or hostile to the principles of monarchy. There is thus a fixed point in English politics, which serves to maintain the stability of the State amid the fiercest agitation; with which no one dreams of meddling, and which helps to keep before the minds of political combatants that most wholesome of lessons—the necessity of “bowing down before a law they have not made.” Something of the sacredness which attaches to the Crown is spread around the other institutions with which the Crown is most closely associated. He would be a bold man, he would not be considered a practical politician, who would propose to overthrow the power of the Upper House. There are men who have declared open war against the Church; but the declaration damaged their political character, and was seriously argued against one of them as an error which should have disqualified him for even a minor Cabinet office. The fierceness of political contests is much mitigated by the fact, that questions on which both the great parties agree are far more important, in the eyes of both, than those on which they differ. Few Conservatives believe that the country, or the Constitution is seriously endangered by the continuance of Lord Palmerston in power. No rational Liberal believes that England would suffer seriously by Lord Derby's advent to office. The case is very different in America. There was a time when the Union was revered almost as Englishmen revere the throne. There was a time when all seemed seriously to believe that the Constitution was really perfect, when to propose its overthrow or to violate its fundamental principles, would have been held not merely treason, but sacrilege. But a written document, whose plain words can be perverted by the ingenuity of contending factions, to mean anything or suit any purpose, whatever, is a poor substitute for an unwritten law, which has grown with the growth of the nation, and whose maxims are so familiar to every mind, that not one in a hundred ever dreams of doubting them. A political abstraction can never win that secure hold on the hearts of a people which belongs to a living sovereign. These deficiencies are not the fault, but the misfortune, of the American people. They are traceable to no want of foresight in those who formed the Constitution, but to the absolute necessities of their position. They had no choice but to frame a Federal compact, and no means of securing and defining that compact but by a written Constitution. It was not in their power, even had they desired it, to provide a visible idol for that political worship of the people which we call loyalty. In establishing their Government, they were forced to trust to its inherent goodness to ensure to it the affections of the governed. When it became—as all Governments at one time or another must become—a bad one, when it fell into dishonest hands, when its powers were used for selfish purposes, there was no longer anything to secure for it popular respect and attachment. In reviewing the history of American political contests for the last forty years, there is nothing which strikes an Englishman as more noteworthy or more lamentable than their utter want of restraint; the necessary consequence of the want of any object revered by both parties in common; of any body of principles which both held sacred.

Another and yet graver misfortune afflicted the creators of the Union, and has ever since beset with difficulties and dangers the path of American statesmanship. In creating a Government it was not possible to create a nation; and while there is no doubt that Washington and his contemporaries hoped that the system which they framed would gradually fuse into one country and one people the fragmentary nationalities of which their Confederacy was composed, it is certain that they were well aware that this had yet to be done; and equally certain that they and their less able successors never made any progress towards its accomplishment. When England is at war, all parties, and generally all Englishmen, give their energetic support to the Government in carrying on that war, however little they may have approved it in its origin. Those who refuse to do so, like Mr. Fox in past times, and Messrs. Bright and Cobden in our own day, not only find themselves utterly powerless to oppose the national will, but are taught that the only effect of attempting such opposition is to damage irretrievably their own character and influence. The Crimean War gave a death-blow to the political credit and authority of the Manchester school, not because they were wrong in their censures of that war, but because, by continuing those censures after England was actually at war, they seemed to lend their support to their country's enemy. But our readers have not forgotten the lessons taught by the war between England and the United States in 1814, or by that with Mexico in 1848 from both of which many of the States stood almost absolutely aloof, while in the former Massachusetts threatened to secede if peace were not speedily concluded. What more forcible proof could be given how thoroughly the composite peoples of the British Islands have become a single nation; and how very far the much less distinct races by which the various States of the late American Union were peopled have always been from attaining such a character? Except in the South and in New England there has been nothing like a real nationality in any part of the Union. And this absence of a national character has not only destroyed the powerful restraint imposed by patriotism on party, but of late years it has given to partisanship the character of patriotism, and converted political contests into international conflicts; until at last the distinct nations which had struggled with one another in Congress now stand face to face in the field, and appeal is formally made from the results of political discussion to the decision of the God of Battles.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Life and Times of the Right Hon. Sir James R. G. Graham, Bart., &c. By TORRENS M'CULLAGH TORRENS. (London: Saunders, Otley and Co.)

Sir James Graham was not an eminent statesman, and but for the accidents of wealth and fortune, he would not have made his mark. He was talented, active, and respectable; but the most that can be said of his career is, that he did not altogether neglect his excellent opportunities, and that he discharged his public duties in a manner that entitled him to the respect of his contemporaries, and which makes him worthy of biographical remembrance. Mr. Torrens has given us an intelligent narrative of the early life of Sir James Graham, but he has allowed his friendship to damage the reputation of the right hon. baronet. In the crowd of those who are somewhat higher than their fellow-citizens, Sir James was a great man, but to put him upon a pinnacle of fame as Mr. Torrens has done, is to caricature his real greatness, and to make him look puny. He was a giant among the pigmies of every-day life, but a pigmy among the giants. He was a useful and valuable mediocrity, and belonged to that class of politicians that, whatever may be their opinions, make public life in this country honoured and honourable.

The late baronet, descended from an ancient family, was born in 1792, his father being the first baronet, and his mother the Lady Catherine Stuart. He commenced his education at a private establishment in the neighbourhood of London, continued it at Westminster, and afterwards went to Oxford. He does not seem to have cared much for scholarly reputation, but to have greatly inclined to dandyism—a weakness that stuck to him in his maturer years. After leaving Oxford and passing a season in London, he went abroad, was introduced to the Duke of Wellington at Cadiz, and was the agent employed to negotiate with Murat the armistice that separated him from Napoleon; an important, but certainly not a difficult negotiation. If the affair had required any diplomatic tact, it would not have been entrusted to young Mr. Graham. In 1818 he got into Parliament for Hull at a cost of more than £6000, but the Whigs did not derive much immediate advantage from his accession to their ranks, as he was not for many years a parliamentary success, and not a particular favourite with his friends. He was addicted to saying smart things, and men are generally more ready to forgive an injury than a sarcasm. He was not re-elected for Hull, was returned for St. Ives, but being petitioned against, would not defend his seat, having probably made up his mind that he should not make a hit in Parliament.

In 1819 he married Miss Fanny Callander, who was then the belle at Almack's; and in 1824 he succeeded to his father's title. About this time he thought of selling his ancestral estate and going into business, and negotiated for a partnership in a banking house. He was fortunately dissuaded from doing this, for in less than a year the firm he was about to join failed. He again got into Parliament, began to be listened to, and was appointed First Lord of the Admiralty in Lord Grey's Ministry. A peerage was offered him, but he had the good sense to refuse the questionable honour of going to the House of Lords to pass the Reform Bill, by swamping the Opposition. The present volume of Mr. Torrens' narrative concludes with the retirement of Lord Grey in 1834; and the best part of Sir James Graham's political life remains to be told.

The Weather Book. A Manual of Practical Meteorology. By REAR ADMIRAL FITZROY. (London: Longman and Co.)

Most Englishmen pride themselves upon being weather-wise, and our climate is so charmingly variable, that any one may get a reputation for that species of knowledge. We act upon a theory of probabilities, which does not often lead us into any positive error. During the autumn, winter, and spring, any one who daily announces “a fall before night” will be so often right and so seldom wrong that he will be regarded as the veritable clerk of the weather. In the summer, after two or three wet days, we may—if the barometer marks “set fair,” and there is not a grand horticultural show, or an aristocratic fete at Cremorne—anticipate a fine day; after two or three fine July days, overcoats and umbrellas are prudent precautions, notwithstanding the most favourable indications of the barometer. But the bulk of our people do not pin their faith to the rising and falling of the mercury. In small farm-houses in the country, and likely enough in many town houses, both great and small, the almanack is looked upon as a reliable authority, and as almanack prophets take care to have plenty of wet days and “fine with showers,” they are frequently correct, much to the surprise and admiration of their superstitious readers. We do not suppose that Admiral Fitzroy will, at all events for many years, diminish the popularity and influence of “Francis Moore.” He endeavours to make people think for themselves, and at present the master has not settled the rudiments of the science he desires to teach. Admiral Fitzroy is proceeding upon a legitimate and philosophic method. He is not trying to make facts square with a pet theory, but he is industriously collecting and studying facts, so as to be able to elucidate the true theory. The peculiarity of the case is that Admiral Fitzroy, from necessity, is making his experiments and pursuing his studies in public, and thus giving little people ample opportunities for sneering at him. Already the Admiral has done much towards making Meteorology a practical science, but for all that, we believe that a few years hence his present manual will be completely superseded. Until such is the case those who wish to be weather-wise had better study “The Weather Book.”

“Les Confédérés.” (Cantata. Music by Mr. Alfred Godards, and words by M. Joachim Duflos), is a new piece of music just published in Paris, and sold for the benefit of the wounded in the Confederate armies. The title page is superbly illuminated with an excellent likeness of President Davis, to whom the music is dedicated. The medallion containing the portrait is draped with the banner and standard of the Confederate State. An English translation of the words by Madame * * *

LETTER FROM JOHN W. COWELL, ESQ. (To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

Sir,—You have done me the honour to notice in THE INDEX a letter which I lately addressed to the cotton Operatives, relative to the blockade of the States, from which they procure their supplies of cotton, instituted by the Washington Government, and recognized as legitimate by the British Government. With your permission I will say a few more words on the point to which you more particularly call the attention of your readers, for I confess that it seems to me of such paramount moral importance as to throw into the shade all consideration of conflicting interests and obligations, if any such there are—from whatever sources arising. What is the major duty of England in the fearful struggle between the North and South? This is the real question.

What is that duty? Whatever it may prove to be, how ever injurious it may be to English interests, I advocate a rigid adherence to it on the part of England. But what is it?

When I read the Treaty of 1783 and see that his Majesty George III. therein styling himself King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, solemnly declares to mankind at large, and to the remotest posterity, that he acknowledges the States of Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia, to be "Free, Sovereign, and Independent States, and that he treats with them as such," and then ask myself whether it is possible that the Ministers of his grand-daughter, our present beloved and gracious Sovereign, can have ignored this recognition, can have acted, and can be acting, as if George III. had never made it—I am lost in astonishment. What more authentic act of royal authority did George III. ever, in the course of his long reign, perform than this, or ever more solemnly ratify? What faith is ever to be placed in any treaty, if not in the Treaty of 1783?

In 1783 George III. declares, "I acknowledge you, Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia, to be Free, Sovereign, and Independent States, and I treat with you as such;" in 1861 his grand-daughter is made to declare, "I acknowledge the right of a Government styling itself that of 'The United States,' to make war and peace for you and on your behalf, Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia," against me, against the rest of the world, and against yourselves even."

It will be clearer to continue the discussion arising from this announcement as if conducted conversationally between the Sovereign State of Virginia, speaking for herself and her sister Sovereignities, on the one part, and the admirable political Chrichton who, Sydney Smith declared, is always ready, at five minutes notice, to take the command of the Channel Fleet, or to cut for the stone.

"How?" exclaims Virginia. "You acknowledge a right in a foreign Power to act in war and in peace for me, a Sovereign Power, how is such an act consistent with your acknowledgment of my freedom, my sovereignty, my independence, in 1783?"

"You were then confederated with some other States, and we acknowledged your sovereignty and theirs collectively."

"Explain.—Here is the treaty containing your acknowledgment; please to read the words and explain what you mean by 'collectively.'"

"I mean that we acknowledged your Sovereignty as being one of those States with whom you were then confederated."

"I do not understand what distinction you aim at drawing. You do two things in the first article of that treaty—you acknowledge me, by name, as being free, sovereign, and independent—that is one thing; and you acknowledge me, likewise, as confederated with certain other States, which you also acknowledge by their names to be in like manner free, sovereign, and independent—that is the other thing. How do you obtain from either one or the other of these two things, or from both of them conjoined, any justification for your acknowledgment of the right, in any of them, or in all of them put together, to act for me at this day in war and peace?"

"Why, you gave them collectively the right at that time, and they so acted for you at that time."

"Will you be so good as to show me the deed of my concession, for it will show the terms on which was made any concession that I did make?"

"Would it not save time if we were to pass at once to the year 1788, for in that year you became a member of a new Confederation called the Government of the United States of North America, and to the Ministers of that Government you certainly conceded the right of making war and peace for you, and they have since exercised it by making war and peace on your behalf; against England, among other instances, they made war in 1812, and peace in 1815."

"How do you know that I made this concession to this Government in 1788?"

"Here is your own Act dated June 26th 1788, in which it is read as follows: 'We, the Delegates of the people of Virginia, duly elected in pursuance of a recommendation from the General Assembly, and now met in Convention, &c, &c, do, in their name, and on behalf of the people of Virginia, declare and make known.'—'There—that is how I know it—what can be clearer?'"

"Please to read on."

"Well," declare and make known, that the powers granted under the Constitution, being derived from the people of the United States, may be resumed by them whenever the same shall be perverted to their injury or oppression, and that every power not granted thereby remains with them and at their will."

"Well, you now see, that I, a Sovereign Power, did in 1788 enter into a certain compact of union with twelve other similar and equally Sovereign Power with the provisions, that I may people, reserved the right of retiring from that compact 'at will,' and you see that I declared at the the same time that each and all of my twelve Sovereign co-partners in that union, possessed exactly the same reserved rights in this respect that I had made the condition of acceding to, and of becoming a member of, it myself. I exercised this right in 1861, and so did the Sovereign States of Georgia, and the Carolinas; and together with them, then resumed the fulness of my Sovereignty—that Sovereignty which you acknowledged in 1783—how then can you disavow, can you ignore, can you nullify, that Sovereignty, in the face of your own treaty, by now affirming that a Power, of which I am entirely independent, has the right of making war and peace, on my behalf?"

"We have been in continued uninterrupted connexion, both in war and in peace, with the Ministers, functionaries and authorities of that union ever since 1788; that connection continues without pause or interruption to the present moment, and we have no choice but to accept their acts as the acts of that union, for which they appear to us to be legitimately entitled to act. Having allowed their right ever since 1788, we cannot disallow it now."

"You were fully justified in allowing the right of agency in the ministers and authorities of that union as long as it existed, and was that Union; but you see by my sovereign act, passed on the 26th of June, 1788, coupled with my sovereign act of May, 1861, that the union exists no longer. You know that the union, whose act of blockade you now acknowledge as righteous, is not the same union that it was previous to my secession in 1861; you know that it is another union. The question that I ask you is, how your admission of the right of this other union to act on my behalf, is consistent with your acknowledgment of my sovereignty in 1783."

"I have not wished, nor intended, to violate the treaty of 1783, of which I acknowledged your sovereignty. I desire to be understood as acknowledging it still, to the full extent of my acknowledgment in 1783; but I cannot disallow the right of the Ministers and authorities of a Government to continue acting in the manner they have been accustomed to act ever since 1788."

"Your substitution of the phrase, 'a Government,' for that expression which describes the fact, as the fact is, covers a fallacy which I must lay bare. The Ministers of 'the Government,' to which you refer, go by the same titles as those employed by the Ministers of the union of the United States of North America, up to the year 1861, and they may—though I mean to be understood without prejudice—exercise similar functions to those of the Ministers of the Government of the Union up to 1861. You were fully warranted in allowing as legitimate, all the acts of the Ministers of the Government of the union of the United States up to the year 1861, and such, your allowance, did in no wise infringe my sovereignty, as acknowledged by you in the treaty of 1783; but what I ask you is, how your acknowledgment of the right of the Government now existing at Washington to act for me, a sovereign, is consistent with your acknowledgment of my sovereignty in the treaty of 1783? and it is certainly no answer to that question to say that the functionaries who claim to act for me, use the same titles as were used by those who did rightfully act for me up to the year 1861. If such Ministers ever, at any time, had any title to act for me, you are bound to know that they had it solely, in virtue of my sovereign act of the 26th of June, 1788, whereby your admission of such title in them was no infringement of my sovereignty; but you are equally bound to know that when, in May, 1861, I exercised my reserved right of sovereignty, and seceded from all connection with the union of the United States of North America as established in 1788, such Ministers had no longer either right or title to act for me, and what I ask you is how you can now admit and allow such title and right without derogating from my sovereignty, as acknowledged by you in 1783?"

"These Ministers claimed to be the same, they declared their Government, their Union, their constituting authority to be the same—it bore the same style, title, and denomination, and exhibited all outward and apparent signs of identity, and, I say that I was without any warrant for questioning all this cumulative evidence of identity, and was bound to accept it as identical."

"And as having the same rights as the Union of the United States of North America possessed up to 1861."

"Yes, I was bound to accept it as having the same rights, as the Union of the United States possessed up to 1861."

"What? bound to acknowledge it possessed the same rights, when you knew as a fact that it was no longer the same Union?"

"But I have said that I was not warranted in questioning its identity."

"I can go no further on this point. When Georgia, the Carolinas, and I, were members of the Union of the United States, that Union was one thing;—when Georgia, the Carolinas, and I, 'declared and made known' to the world that we had ceased to be members of the Union of the United States—that Union became thereby another thing, and I am unable to understand, even to conjecture, what warrant you could have for accepting it as the same thing. In the currency of conversation, or correspondence, it may be permissible to speak of the United States of 1862, as being the same United States as those of 1852, but when the point in question is of so serious a nature as to involve breaches of treaties, violations of Sovereign rights, acknowledgments of illegal claims, of unjust rights, false titles, &c., &c., the utmost precision of language, and the strictest verification of facts are required. It is humiliating to find any one in the position of a statesman resorting to such a defence as you have been making. Is there nothing more that you can say?"

"How was I to know that you had seceded from the Union? What official notification did you supply me with?"

"I supplied you with the same notification that I gave you of my accession to the Union in 1787. I passed an Act of Accession then, and in 1861 I passed an Act of Secession. If you knew one you knew the other. You are, by profession, a statesman—it was your duty to know both."

"But many of the other States continued united, and deny your right to secede from the Union. It was impossible for me to take cognizance of the complicated disputes about the interpretation of the Constitution of 1788."

"Neither were you called upon to take cognizance of them. You had a simple and straightforward course before you—to look at the treaty of 1783, and to avoid doing any act which involved, on your part, a breach of your acknowledgment of my sovereignty."

"Do you mean to say, then, that my acceptance of Mr. Adams, as Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary of the United States of North America in 1861, when he was so accredited to me, exactly in the same form as all his predecessors since 1783—his father among them—had been, was a breach of your sovereignty?"

"Your accepting him by that title was no breach of my sovereignty—at least, I do not impute it to you as such—but your allowing him to act on my behalf was, and is, a breach of my sovereignty. George III. made the treaty with me and my sister sovereignities in 1783, by the style and title of King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, and we treated with him by the title he chose to assume; but we did not mean thereby to allow that he possessed the faintest shadow of right to act for France, though he styled himself King of that country, and his plenipotentiaries were accredited to us as deriving authority from him as King of France as well as of Great Britain and Ireland. Your accepting Mr. Adams by whatever title his credentials gave him did me no wrong, but your allowing his claim to act on my behalf in 1861 was as clear a breach of my Sovereignty as would be my act, were I to conclude a treaty with the Emperor of Hindostan, be an infringement of the Sovereignty of England?"

"But, certainly, had I refused the claim of Mr. Adams to act in the manner he is acting, the President Lincoln would have declared war against England. Mr. Seward announced his intention of doing so. Do you mean to say that I was bound to carry out your interpretation of the Treaty of 1783, with the certainty before my eyes that it would be followed by a war with those over whom President Lincoln rules?"

"You were bound to observe all the engagements you made in the Treaty of 1783, and if President Lincoln had proved bad enough to declare war against you for so doing, you ought not to have shown yourself vile enough to have refrained from performing your obligation from the fear of any such a consequence. Do you admit my complaint of your faithlessness in respect of the Treaty of 1783 to be just and well-founded, or do you affirm it to be frivolous and unfounded? I have now waited a long while, and in vain, for a reply to this question. I disdain to discuss with you further. There is the Treaty of 1783;—you have broken it, and you know that you have broken it."

"Permit me to ask an explanation of one part of your Act of Accession to the new Union in 1788. You therein declare that the powers granted under the Constitution being derived from the people of the United States may be resumed by them whenever the same shall be perverted to their injury or oppression, and that every power not granted thereby remains with them and at their will.' Must not the phrase 'people of the United States,' be taken to mean all the people of all the United States, and if so, may I ask have all the people of all the United States now resumed the powers granted by the Constitution, for if only some have resumed those powers and not others; it would appear that a resumption by a part only would invalidate the very title by which that part claim the right of resumption at all, the prerequisite condition alone capable of calling that title into existence, not yet having come into existence itself."

"The powers granted were granted by the grantors, and as they were granted resumable, they were resumable by the same grantors, in the manner and form in which they, as grantors, had made them resumable. In the case of Virginia, you will see who were the grantors by looking at the first lines of the Act,—'We, the delegates of the people of Virginia do, in their name and on behalf of the people of Virginia, declare that the powers granted under the Constitution being derived from the people of the United States, &c., &c.' The question you put is twofold—1st, whether the word 'people,' which, in each of the two first cases of its occurrence, refers entirely to the people of one of the United States, viz., of Virginia, expand in the third case into an extension of meaning, embracing the people of all the other twelve States collectively, together with the people of Virginia; and, 2ndly, whether it was intended by the delegates of the people of Virginia that it should expand in such wise. That the delegates had no such intention, nor indeed any right or power to give it such an extension, is obvious enough from the object and tenor of the whole Act, the plain intent of which would have been wholly frustrated by such an extension. So much for the intention of the grantors. As to the extent of meaning which the mere word 'people' may be made to bear on the third occasion of its occurrence in the Act, this must be restricted within the limits which you know from the intention, aliunde ascertainable, of the party employing it, he meant to allude to it. That intention is clear enough in this case. There was no doubt about it in 1788, nor was the word 'people' in this place ever supposed, on my side of the Atlantic, to be susceptible of such an interpretation as you would insinuate it may bear. Each Sovereign State acted by itself—apart, independently—and for its own people alone. No Sovereign State imagined, much less did it pretend, that its right of action could extend beyond the pale of its own subject people. Each acceded to the new Constitution on whatever terms and conditions it was pleased to assign. Virginia attached the conditions of her accession in her Act of June 1788, and she means to record, in the sentence to which you advert, that the people of each of the other twelve Sovereign States had the same right of attaching, each to their own several accessions respectively, the same conditions as she attached to her own accession. The expression 'United States' had, in 1788, a different force from that which you in England attribute to it now; it was used to avoid the long and troublesome enumeration of their names and titles, as was at first the custom, as you may see in the Treaty of Peace of 1783, in which each is severally specified."

In the foregoing imaginary conversation I have faithfully endeavoured to give all the force in my power to the arguments and reasonings on the point in the question which I can conjecture that either party would employ.

JOHN W. COWELL.

Cannes, Alpes Maritimes, Feb. 2, 1863.

THE HON. J. M. MASON AT THE MANSION HOUSE.

On Wednesday evening Mr. Mason made a speech at a banquet at the Mansion-house, in reference to the existing relations between the Confederate States of America, and the English Government. He was a guest, with Lord Alfred Churchill, M.P., Lord Geo. Lennox, M.P., Lord Colville, General Sir Geo. Pollock, Mr. Halliburton, M.P., Mr. J. C. Ewart, M.P., the O'Connor Don, M.P., Colonel French, M.P., Alderman Salomons, M.P., and Mr. Kennard, M.P., among others, at a dinner at which the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress entertained the aldermen and the members of the Court of Common Council for the wards of Castle Baynard, Cheap, Coleman-street, Cordwainers, Corahill, Cripplegate (within and without), Dowgate, and Farringdon-within. The company, about 250 in number, included besides his Excellency Rear-Admiral Don Juan de Dios and Captain Blanco, of the Spanish navy, General Sir A. S. Waugh, Admiral Stopford, General Brooke Taylor, Colonel Sargent, C.B., Colonel Lindsay, Colonel Aldworth, Alderman Sir R. W. Carden, Alderman Carter, Alderman Phillips, Alderman Allen, Alderman Gibbons, Alderman and Sheriff Lawrence, Mr. Sheriff Jones, Mr. Pope, the Mayor of Quebec, and the clergy of the several wards. The banquet was served in the Egyptian-hall.

Towards the close of the entertainment the Lord Mayor proposed the toast of "The Visitors," referring particularly to the presence of the Mayor of Quebec and Mr. Mason. The mention of the latter gentleman's name elicited loud cheers. His Lordship proceeded to say, alluding to Mr. Mason, that although he could not greet that gentleman as a recognised plenipotentiary to this country he was perfectly justified, by virtue of his position as chief magistrate of the City of London, in offering to him, and to all gentlemen who came to this country on any important business, a hearty welcome in his official residence. They, as citizens of London, deeply deplored the disastrous war which was being waged on the American continent, and longed, in common with the rest of their countrymen and of the civilized world, to see it brought to some satisfactory termination. He gave "The Visitors," coupling with the toast the name of the Mayor of Quebec.

Mr. Pope, the Mayor, briefly, acknowledged the compliment in an animated speech, in which he dwelt on the strong attachment of the North American colonists to the mother country, adding that they regarded it as their highest privilege that they were fellow-subjects with the people of England of the same Sovereign.

Mr. Mason, responding to an urgent invitation of the company, presented himself to speak, and was received with enthusiastic cheers. He said,—My Lord Mayor, my Lady Mayoress, my lords, ladies and gentlemen, but that I feel deeply the obligations I am under to the honoured chief magistrate of this city for permission to be present to-night I should feel strongly disposed to pick a quarrel. His lordship has not chosen to remember that here, in England, I am not considered of full age; that I am yet in my minority. The Government of England—we all know, honoured from ages, and always a wise Government in its generation—has declared that the country which I represent beyond that broad water has not yet attained years of discretion, and is not capable of managing its own affairs. (A laugh.) I say, therefore, that but for really being overwhelmed by the kind and generous manner in which I have been received by this honoured company, and in the presence of your chief magistrate, I should have been disposed to say, in the language of a poet:—

You would scarce expect one of my age
To speak in public on the stage.

My Lord Mayor, I am a stranger in London—or, rather, I was a stranger; but I have learnt since I came to London that none of English blood from my own Southern land are strangers among you. (Cheers.) I speak this from my heart (cheers), for I have been by every circle in England and by every class of society a welcomed and an honoured guest, (Cheers.) I return my sincere thanks to you for the kindness with which you have listened to a stranger. The day will come (great cheering)—it is not far off—when the relationship between that Government which is now in its infant fortune and yours will be one of close and intimate alliance. (Renewed cheers.) I say this more especially as regards the city of London, which is the great market for the world. My country is the unrivalled producer of the great staples of the world, and I say the relations—commercial, doubtless political, certainly social—between my honoured countrymen and the people of London will before long be of the most intimate character. (Cheers.)

THE CONFEDERATE GENERALS.

The following sketches are extracted from the letters of the army correspondent of the Savannah Republican:—

GENERAL ROBERT E. LEE.

If the battles around Richmond elevated General Lee in the public estimation as a military leader, his conduct of affairs since his return from Maryland should stamp him as one of the greatest living masters of the art of war.

By the skillful disposition of his forces in front of Winchester, he rendered it impracticable for McClellan to invade the Valley of the Shenandoah, and forced him to adopt the route on the east side of the Blue Ridge. The Federal commander accepted this alternative the more readily since he hoped, by an ostentatious display of a part of his forces near Shepherdstown, to deceive General Lee and gain his flank and rear at Warrenton. On his arrival at this latter place, however, much to his surprise and dismay, he found our far-seeing General quietly awaiting him on the south bank of the Rappahannock.

This unexpected discovery rendered it necessary for the enemy to change the plan of the campaign, and to adopt a new base of operations and a different route to Richmond. Accordingly, McClellan having been superseded by Burnside, the latter officer, after consultation with Halleck, the General-in-Chief, who visited his headquarters at Warrenton, caused a series of imposing demonstrations to be made along our front, as if he intended to give battle at an early day. In the meantime, he put the main body of his army in motion, and marched it rapidly down the north bank of the Rappahannock, with the view of throwing it across that stream at Fredericksburg, gaining Lee's rear and descending by forced marches upon Richmond before our army could get into position to check his advance. But if McClellan was surprised to find Lee awaiting him at Warrenton, Burnside was amazed upon his arrival at Fredericksburg to learn that the sagacious Confederate commander had not only anticipated his movement, but had completely blocked the passage of the Rappahannock.

So confident were Burnside and his army of the successful issue of his clever stratagem, that the army correspondents undertook to furnish the Federal press with minute and glowing accounts of the triumphal march. Public expectation was raised to the highest pitch. The Government, the press, and even officers in the field, so far forgot the bitter disappointments of the past as to indulge the pleasant hallucination of the early downfall of the rebel capital. When Burnside reached the heights overlooking Fredericksburg, therefore, and cast his anxious eyes across the river, great must have been his astonishment when he discovered the Confederates, who he vainly supposed were still awaiting his attack near Warrenton, drawn up on the opposite hills, and the gateway to Richmond completely closed.

The Federal press, in its disappointment and mortification, indulges in charges of treason against its own people, and says some one in the confidence of Burnside must have communicated his plans to General Lee. But this is not true. General Lee, by his superior genius and penetration, was enabled to fathom his adversary's designs, and baffle his well-laid plans; and that, too, without the assistance of traitors from the Federal army.

As was remarked in a former letter, the Confederacy is fortunate in having such a man as General Lee in its service. He is still in the prime and vigour of physical and intellectual manhood, being about forty-five years of age. He is six feet in height, weighs about 190 lbs, is erect, well-formed and of imposing appearance, has clear, bright, benignant black eyes, dark gray hair, and a heavy gray beard. He is exceedingly plain in his dress, and one looks at his costume in vain for those insignia of rank for which most officers show such a weakness. He wears an unassuming black felt hat, with a narrow strip of gold lace around it, and a plain brigadier's coat with three stars on the collar, but without the usual braiding on the sleeves. He travels and sleeps in an ambulance when the army is in motion, and occupies a tent when it is stationary, and not the largest and best house in the neighbourhood, as is the custom of some officers. In a few words, he cares but little for appearances, though one of the handsomest men in the Confederacy, and is content to take the same fare his soldiers receive.

In character and personal deportment he is all that the most ardent patriot can desire. Grave and dignified, he is yet modest and painfully distrustful of his own abilities. The descendant of a gallant officer of the elder revolution, the husband of the grand-daughter (by adoption) of General Washington, the inheritor of a large estate, and the trusted leader of a great and victorious army, he is nevertheless accessible to the humblest and most rugged soldier in the ranks, courteous to his officers, just and kind to the citizen, and withal and above all, a meek and humble Christian.

During the time the army was in Maryland, an officer of high position in the country suggested a number of reasons to General Lee, in support of a grave measure then under discussion. Among others, he remarked to him that he was trusted by his Government, had the hearts of his soldiers, and possessed the entire confidence of his country, and that the army, the Government, and people relied implicitly upon his patriotism and genius. Tears rushed to his eyes, and he exclaimed—"Do not say that—do not say that. I am sensible of my weakness, and such a responsibility as your remark implies would crush me to the earth." He said, in the same conversation, that there was nothing he so much desired as peace and independence. All he had, and all he hoped for—all that ambition could suggest or glory give—he would freely surrender them all to stop the flow of blood and secure freedom to the country. He did not doubt that these blessings would come in due season; but he wanted them now, and would readily sacrifice every thought of personal aggrandizement to save the life of even one soldier.

General Lee is endowed with rare judgment and equanimity, unerring sagacity, great self-control, and extraordinary powers of combination. Like Washington, he is a wise man, and a good man, and possesses in an eminent degree those qualities which are indispensable in the great leader and champion upon whom the country rests its hopes of present success and future independence. In simple intellect there are other officers in the service who are his equals, and perhaps his superiors, and as a mere fighter there are some who may excel him. But in the qualities of a commander, entrusted with the duty of planning and executing a campaign upon a broad scale, and with the direction and government of a large army, whether scattered over a wide extent of territory, or massed together as at Richmond, he surpasses them all, and is the peer of any living chieftain in the New World or the Old.

GENERAL JOSEPH E. JOHNSTON.

General Johnston, as you are aware, is a native of the proud old Commonwealth of Virginia, and a little turned fifty years of age. He weighs about 160 lbs., is five feet ten inches in height—though he looks taller on account of his erect carriage—has a florid complexion, short gray hair and closely cut side whiskers, moustache, and goatee. His manners are rather quiet and dignified, and his general appearance and deportment highly military. Indeed, everything about him—his bearing, style of dress, and even his most careless attitudes—betoken the high-toned and spirited soldier, who loves his profession, and whose soul revels in the din and uproar of the battle-field. His short hair and beard, high colour, close fitting uniform, striking air and self-possession, remind one of the game cock, the most courageous of all "the fowls of the air," when clipped and trimmed and prepared for the ring.

Intellectually, General Johnston is the equal of any of the five generals in the army, and in the opinion of many, is superior to them all. His reports are written with great vigour, and a degree of elegance which shows that in the turmoil of the camp, he is not unmindful of the graces of literature.

As a strategist he enjoys a very high reputation among military men. In his operations he regards masses and general results, rather than isolated bodies and mere temporary effects. And hence the opinion prevails with some that he lacks energy and enterprise. This, however, is a great mistake. No man is more watchful of his adversary, or more ready to strike when the right time comes; and when he does strike he delivers the blow of a giant. He sees but little advantage in picking off a man here and there, or in precipitating small bodies of men against each other. Instead of fritting away his strength, he seeks rather to husband it until the auspicious moment arrives, and then he goes to work with an energy and resolution that is wonderful.

For the same reason he is considered one of the best fighters in the whole army. General Lee fights a good deal by manoeuvres. One step is made to lead another. The advantage gained here is the prelude to another on a different part of the field; until having attained certain positions and accomplished certain results, he presses forward against the vital point with a vigour and resolution that carry everything before them. Johnston orders the battle after the same fashion, and enters the field with the same purposes, but when he gets fully into the fight, and his blood is once up, he strikes out right and left, and with a rapidity and skill that are perfectly irresistible. He is not content with commanding on the field, but, like the deceased Irishman, when the bottle was passing around at his own funeral, he insists upon taking a hand himself.

When Jackson got into position, and the battle was fully joined in front of Richmond, certain victory was the assured result of Lee's masterly combinations. And at the second battle of Manassas, when Jackson was hard pressed on the left and asked for assistance, Lee, instead of sending it to him, and thus weakening his force elsewhere, pressed Longstreet forward on the right, threw the enemy's left wing into confusion, and thus relieved Jackson more effectually and in less time than if he had sent him reinforcements. Johnson, on the contrary, had a well-matured plan of battle at the Seven Pines, but it was simple and direct. He struck right at the centre of the enemy, intending to pierce his lines, capture the force on this side of the Chickahominy, and then drive the remainder on the east side into the York and Pamunkey Rivers.

When McClellan moved his army to the Peninsula last spring, it is said that Johnston, then in command of the Army of the Potomac, was in favour of taking up his position behind the Chickahominy, and not going to Yorktown at all. The President preferred the position at Yorktown, however, and accordingly the army was moved down to Magruder's lines. The night of his arrival there Johnston held a council of war, at which Toombs said, "We must fight to-morrow, or retreat to-night." All our forces had then come up, whilst McClellan's army, already enormous, was receiving fresh additions every day. Johnston agreed with Toombs, but kept his army there fourteen days, chiefly in deference to the President, until McClellan got ready to offer him battle, when he broke up his camp and marched back to Richmond. It was during this retreat that the battle of Williamsburg was fought by Longstreet, who brought up the rear.

In a previous letter in relation to the contest before Richmond, and the parts taken by Johnston and Lee, a mistake occurred, which it is proper to correct. Persons who participated in that contest, and who were in a position to be well informed, say Johnston did ask that Jackson might be sent to him from the Valley of the Shenandoah, and Holmes from the south side of James River. If this be true, then Johnston is entitled to the credit of having first suggested that master stroke of the campaign. To Lee, however, belongs all the honour and glory due to his brilliant plan of battle and the manner in which it was executed.

GENERAL LONGSTREET.

General Longstreet is, I believe, a native of South Carolina, and looks to be about forty years of age. He is at least six feet high, weighs about 220 lbs., wears a heavy brown beard, and is withal one of the finest looking men in the army. He is a man of simple habits and modest deportment; seems anxious to do his duty without stopping to consider what the public will think of him; and never does or says anything to catch the popular applause or cut a figure in the newspapers. Thus far he has never been entrusted with a separate command, as Jackson was in the Valley of the Shenandoah last spring, and, consequently, he has never had an opportunity to display his ability as a commander. It is only as a fighter that he is known, and even in this respect less is known of him by the people than of any other officer who has rendered the same important services. Whether this ignorance is justly ascribable to the singular reticence of the press towards so meritorious an officer, or to his own modest behaviour, I am unable to decide. This much, however, may be asserted with absolute certainty: he is satisfied, like General Lee, to discharge his duty, and leave the public to judge of his performances as they please, believing their final judgment will be just and truthful.

As a fighter, General Longstreet stands second to no man in the army. Indeed, I have heard that General Lee considers him "the best fighter in the world." The latter reposes the most unlimited confidence in his coolness, skill, and courage, and leans upon his broad shoulders and clear strong judgment with a sense of the utmost security. This feeling is shared by his entire corps, and by the whole army. It is but just to add, that Longstreet combines, in an eminent degree, the qualities of a great soldier, viz.: the spirit and dash to storm a formidable position; the stubborn courage and cool judgment to maintain his ground against superior numbers, and make the best disposition of his own forces; and the skill and ability to control and direct an army.

General Longstreet has been attached to the Army of the Potomac, or of Northern Virginia, as it is sometimes called, ever since the war commenced. He first commanded a brigade under Beauregard, was subsequently made a Major-General under Johnston, and now holds the position of Lieutenant-General under Lee—all of them masters of the art of war, though in different degrees. This admirable schooling has been of great advantage to him, and of equal importance to the country, since it has prepared and fitted him to take command of the army should anything occur to deprive it of its present unrivalled leader.

It is said that Longstreet was willing to cross the Potomac and march upon Baltimore with an army of 70,000 men. General Lee found it necessary, owing to the rapidity of his march, the intensity of the heat, and the unfavourable condition of the troops, to cross with a smaller number and to fight the battle of Sharpsburg with less than 40,000 men.

HONOUR TO WHOM HONOUR IS DUE.

Extracts from a sermon delivered at Christ Church, Savannah, on Thursday, September 18th, 1862, being Thanksgiving Day, by the Right Rev. Stephen Elliott, Bishop of Georgia:—

WOMAN'S HEROISM.

* * * The attitude of woman is sublime. Bearing all the sacrifices of which I have just spoken, she is moreover called upon to suffer in her affections, to be wounded and smitten where she feels deepest and most enduringly. Man goes to the battle-field, but woman tends him there, even though her heart-strings tremble while she gives the farewell kiss and the farewell blessing. Man is supported by the necessity of movement, by the excitement of action, by the hope of honour, by the glory of conquest. Woman remains at home to suffer, to bear the cruel torture of suspense, to tremble when the battle has been fought, and the news of the slaughter is flashing over the electric wire, to know that defeat will cover her with dishonour and her little one with ruin, to learn that the husband she devoted upon, the son whom she cherished in her bosom, and upon whom she never let the wind blow too rudely, the brother with whom she sported through all her happy days of childhood, the lover to whom her early vows were pledged, has died upon some distant battle-field, and lies there a mangled corpse, unknown and uncared for, never to be seen again even in death! Oh! those fearful lists of the wounded and the dead! How carelessly we pass them over, unless our own loved ones happen to be linked with them in military association, and yet each name in that roll of slaughter carries a fatal pang to some woman's heart—some noble, devoted, woman's heart. But she bears it all and bows submissive to the stroke. "He died for the cause. He perished for his country. I would not have it otherwise, but I should like to have given the dying boy my blessing, the expiring husband my last kiss of affection, the bleeding lover the comfort of knowing that I knelt beside him."

THE PRIVATE SOLDIER OF THE CONFEDERATE ARMY.

And when we turn to our armies, truly these victories are the victories of the privates. God forbid that I should take one atom of honour or of praise from those who led our hosts upon those days of glory—from the accomplished and skilful Lee, the admirable Crichton of our armies—from the God-fearing and indomitable Jackson, upon whose prayer-bedewed banner victory seems to wait—from the intrepid Stuart, whose cavalry charges imitate those of Murat; from that great host of Generals who swarm around our country's flag as Napoleon's Marshals did around the Imperial Eagle; but nevertheless our victories are the victories of the privates. It is the enthusiastic dash of their onsets, the fearless bravery with which they rush even to the cannon's mouth, the utter recklessness of life, if so be that its sacrifice may only lead to victory, the heartfelt impression that the cause is the cause of every man, and that success is a necessity. What intense honour do I feel for the private soldier! The officers may have motives other than the cause—the private soldier can have none. He knows that his valour must pass unnoticed, save in the narrow circle of his company; that his sacrifice can bring no honour to his name, no reputation to his family; that if he survives he lives only to enter upon new dangers with the same hopelessness of distinction; that if he dies he will receive nothing but an unmarked grave, and yet is he proud to do his duty and to maintain his part in the destructive conflict. His comrades fall around him thick and fast, but, with a sigh and tear, he closes his ranks and presses on to a like destiny. Truly, the first monument which our Confederacy rears, when our independence shall have been won, should be a lofty shaft, pure and spotless, bearing this inscription:

"TO THE UNKNOWN AND UNRECORDED DEAD."

THE "PILGRIM FATHERS" AND THEIR DESCENDANTS.

(From the Mobile Register.)

This is a Yankee war—a war compounded of equal parts of avarice and bigotry, and sprung from those two leading characteristics of the Yankee mind. The "Mayflower" bore its germs to Plymouth Rock. That "Mayflower," so celebrated in song and so eulogised in festive speeches, proved a Pandora's box to this unhappy continent. From it leaped into active life in America the spirit of intolerance and persecution, the spirit of meddling with other men's business, temporal and spiritual. It came with a race of men endowed with intense energies, who, fleeing from persecution in the Old World to find homes and peace among the savages and wilderness of the New, testified their thankfulness to God and the purity of their own faith by converting the asylum they found into a new field of intolerance, and themselves, from the victims of persecution, into a set of persecutors. Indians, witches, and Quakers, were the first objects of oppression and intermeddling by these God-fearing saints. Their own sufferings in the Old World had taught them nothing of the glories of Divine charity and Christian toleration. They burned and drowned, in God's name, with all the unktion of Inquisitors. They worked, and thrived, and colonized, and hived all over the continent where money was to be made and Puritanism preached. They made themselves "a nation"—"a universal Yankee nation." They drew wealth to their cold and inhospitable shores from every land and sea. They subordinated legislation and corrupted the Government for their selfish purposes. Not content with seizing the best seats of the Southern sadder, rendered fat to bursting by slave labour, and then damning to eternal perdition the owners and overseers of that labour, they carried their grasping temper into the halls of the General Congress, and in defiance of a written Constitution and eternal justice, they made its statute books groan with partial laws, with fishing bounties, navigation acts, tariff and internal improvement bills, and every sort of act to tax the South and spend the revenues at the North. And then, as if the wedge of separation was not being driven hard and fast enough between the sections, the work of destruction was aggravated and intensified by cataraacts of abuse and calumny of everything Southern, from pulpit, press, stump, the floor of Congress, lecture rooms, and the seething atmosphere of their everlasting, canting religious and benevolent societies. The wonder is, that the strong oaken fibres of the Union held out so long. It took thirty-five years of the hardest labour of these hard-working Yankees to rive the oak and make secession an accomplished fact.—And now they have deluged the land in blood, wasted their Southern gains of the best part of a century, bankrupted their Government, and destroyed liberty among themselves, in the insane effort to restore the Union, broken to pieces by their infernal selfishness, bigotry and meddlesomeness. Such is the history of the "Pilgrim Fathers" and their descendants.

RELIGION IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY.

The following is a copy of a letter from the Rev. Dr. Stiles, who is labouring as an Evangelist in the Southern army, to the Rev. Mr. Price, Secretary of the United Synod's Board of Missions:—

My dear Brother,—My diminutive sheet and pressing cares forbid the attempt at even a general sketch of the scenes of interest—social and spiritual—which it has been mine to witness and take part in since I left you. My only object in addressing you a note at this time is to apprise you and all sympathizing Christian brethren and sisters in Richmond, of the happy, religious condition of that part of the Army of the Potomac which lies within the range of my present observation.

At his earnest request, I preached to General Pryor's brigade last Sabbath. Upon one hour's notice he marched up 1200 or 1500 men, who listened with so much interest to a long sermon that I was not surprised to hear of such a beginning of religious interest in various regiments of the brigade, as issued in a half-way promise on my part to fall in with the proposal of the general to preach very early to his soldiers for a succession of nights. In General Lawton's brigade there is a more decided state of religious excitement. The great body of the soldiers in some of the regiments meet for prayers and exhortation every night, exhibit the deepest solemnity, and present themselves numerous for the prayers of the chaplain and the Church. Quite a pleasant number express hope in Christ. In all other portions of General Early's division (formerly General Ewell's) a similar religious sensibility prevails.

In General Trimble's, and the immediately neighbouring brigades, there is a progress, at this hour of one of the most glorious revivals I ever witnessed. Some days ago a young chaplain of the Baptist Church—as a representative of three others of the same denomination—took a long ride to solicit my co-operation, stating that a promising seriousness had sprung up within their diocese. I have now been with him three days and nights, preaching and labouring constantly with the soldiers when not on drill. The audiences and the interest have grown to glorious dimensions. It would rejoice you over deeply to glance for one instant on our night meeting in the wild woods, under a full moon, aided by the light of our side-stands. You would behold a mass of men seated on the earth all around you (I was going to say for the space of half an acre), fringed in all its circumference by a line of standing officers and soldiers—two or three deep—all exhibiting the most solemn and respectful earnestness that a Christian assembly ever displayed. An officer said to me, last night, on returning from worship, he never had witnessed such a scene, though a Presbyterian elder; especially such an abiding solemnity and delight in the services as prevented all whispering in the outskirts, leaving of the congregation, or restless change of position. I suppose, at the close of the services, we had some sixty or seventy men and officers come forward and publicly solicit an interest in our prayers, and there may have been as many more who, from the press, could not reach the stand. I have already conversed with quite a number who seem to give pleasant evidence of a return to God, and all things seem to be rapidly developing for the best.

The officers, especially Generals Jackson and Early, have modified military rules for our accommodation. I have just learned that General A. P. Hill's division enjoys as rich a dispensation of God's spirit as General Early's. Ask all the brethren and sisters to pray for us and the army at large. I would not be surprised to learn that the condition of things, above described, prevails extensively in portions of our soldiers at present out of our view. One thing more. We furnish for the want of tracts. Do write to our Petersburg brethren forthwith, and beg them to send to me, at Winchester, care of Dr. Boyd, as large a supply as they can spare. The chaplains are constantly inquiring of me on the subject, and I can see them promptly and judiciously distributed. They would be of vast assistance and consolation at present.

Have two preachings to-day. Must be done. Begging the kind remembrance of all.

P.S.—I have opened this letter the second time to inform you of the widespread of holy influence. In General Pickett's division, also, there are said to be revivals of religion.

EARL RUSSELL'S DESPATCH TO LORD COWLEY ON MEDIATION.

The following was published on Saturday last:—

EARL RUSSELL TO LORD COWLEY.

Foreign-office, Nov. 13, 1862.

My Lord,—The Count de Flahault came to the Foreign-office by appointment on Monday the 10th inst., and read to me a despatch from M. Drouyn de Lhuys relative to the civil war in North America.

In this despatch the Minister for Foreign Affairs states that Europe has followed with painful interest the struggle which has now been going on for more than a year on the American continent. He does justice to the energy and perseverance which have been displayed on both sides, but he observes that these proofs of their courage have been given at the expense of innumerable calamities and immense bloodshed.

To these accompaniments of civil conflict it is to be added the apprehension of a servile war, which would be the climax of so many irreparable misfortunes.

If these calamities affected America only, these sufferings of a friendly nation would be enough to excite the anxiety and sympathy of the Emperor. But Europe also has suffered in one of the principal branches of her industry, and her artisans have been subjected to the most cruel trials.

France and the maritime Powers have during this struggle maintained the strictest neutrality, but the sentiments by which they are animated, far from imposing on them anything like indifference, seem on the contrary to require that they should assist the two belligerent parties in an endeavour to escape from a position which appears to have no issue.

The forces of the two sides have hitherto fought with balanced success, and the latest accounts do not show any prospect of a speedy termination of the war.

These circumstances taken together would seem to favour the adoption of measures which might bring about a truce.

The Emperor of the French, therefore, is of opinion that there is now an opportunity of offering to the belligerents the good offices of the maritime Powers. He therefore proposes to her Majesty, as well as to the Emperor of Russia, that the three Courts should endeavour, both at Washington and in communication with the Confederate States, to bring about a suspension of arms for six months, during which every act of hostility, direct or indirect, should cease at sea as well as on land. This armistice might, if necessary, be renewed for a further period.

This proposal, M. Drouyn de Lhuys proceeds to say, would not imply, on the part of the three Powers, any judgment on the origin of the war, or any pressure on the negotiations or peace, which it is hoped would take place during the armistice. The three Powers would only interfere to smooth obstacles, and only within limits which the two interested parties would prescribe.

The French Government is of opinion that, even in the event of failure of immediate success, these overtures might be useful in turning the minds of men, now heated by passion, to consider the advantages of conciliation and of peace.

Such is, in substance, the proposal of the Government of the Emperor of the French, and I need hardly say that it has attracted the serious attention of her Majesty's Government.

Her Majesty is desirous of acting in concurrence with France upon the great questions now agitating the world, and upon none more than on the contingencies connected with the great struggle now going on in North America. Neither her Majesty the Queen nor the British nation will ever forget the noble and emphatic manner in which the Emperor of the French vindicated the law of nations, and assisted the cause of peace, in the instance of the seizure of the Confederate commissioners on board the Trent.

Her Majesty's Government recognize with pleasure, in the design of arresting the progress of war by friendly measures, the benevolent views and humane intentions of the Emperor.

They are also of opinion that if the steps proposed were to be taken, the concurrence of Russia would be extremely desirable.

Her Majesty's Government have, however, not been informed up to the present time that the Russian Government have agreed to co-operate with England and France on this occasion, although the Government may support the endeavours of England and France to attain the end proposed.

But is the end proposed attainable at the present moment by the course suggested by the Government of France?

Such is the question which has been anxiously and carefully examined by her Majesty's Government.

After weighing all the information which has been received from America, her Majesty's Government are led to the conclusion that there is no ground at the present moment to hope that the Federal Government would accept the proposal suggested, and a refusal from Washington at present would prevent any speedy renewal of the offer.

Her Majesty's Government think, therefore, that it would be better to watch carefully the progress of opinion in America; and if, as there appears reason to hope, it may be found to have undergone, or may undergo hereafter, any change, the three Courts might then avail themselves of such change to offer their friendly counsel, with a greater prospect than now exists of its being accepted by the two contending parties.

Her Majesty's Government will communicate to that of France any intelligence they may receive from Washington or Richmond bearing on this important subject.

Your Excellency may read this despatch to M. Drouyn de Lhuys, and give him a copy of it.—I am, &c.,

(Signed)

RUSSELL.

THE CONSERVATIVE LEADERS AND RECOGNITION.

(From the Morning Herald of Feb. 3rd.)

The Ministry is, as usual, much indebted to the generous and ill-requited forbearance of its opponents. Never was a political party more guiltless or factious or vexatious hostility than that which has constituted for the last four years her Majesty's opposition. Ejected from office by a purely and avowedly factious vote, obtained by intrigue and bargain among a variety of conflicting sections, which could agree in nothing but a wish to turn them out, they have scrupulously forbore to harass their opponents by any similar stratagem; nay, they have been singularly forbearing in their use of the most perfect legitimate weapons of party warfare. The Ministry has committed endless mistakes and given incessant provocation. It has contrived, in its endeavours to conciliate the support of discontented allies, to exasperate against it, one after another, several powerful interests, any one of them strong enough, under the skilful guidance of the chiefs of opposition, to turn the scale in the House of Commons, and deprive the Ministers of further opportunities of mischief. The Conservative leaders have taken no advantage of these occasions; they have been satisfied to amend the error instead of using it; and have cared rather to defend the interests of the country than to obtain their own restoration to office. How they have been rewarded we all know. Unable to assail the principles of their adversaries with any chance of credit, and having no principles of their own to uphold, the ministerial press and the ministerial speakers in the House have directed their attacks solely against the persons of their antagonists. "Men, not measures—confidence in Lord Palmerston and hatred of Mr. Disraeli." Such has been the watchword of their parliamentary battles and the burden of all their speeches. Whatever bitterness might be shown to them in return; whatever use might be made of the innumerable blunders which have distinguished their recent policy; whatever advantage might be taken of the hostility excited by their policy of isolation in regard to America and of restless intermeddling throughout the rest of the world, they could not complain. They have deserved it thoroughly—they have done their utmost to provoke it. We cannot hope that they will appreciate the generous lenity now shown them, for they have met with it before and requited it after their kind. But the country, though perhaps a little disappointed, will understand the motives which have induced Lord Derby to treat with so much moderation and tenderness the errors of the Government, and especially that error, most disastrous in its consequences, which they committed in refusing the proposal of France for a joint interposition to stay the progress of the fratricidal war in America. Both Lord Derby and Lord Malmesbury see that a splendid opportunity was there thrown away by a mixture of perversity and pusillanimity most repugnant to the feelings of Englishmen and the judgment of statesmen. But Lord Derby is willing to suppose it possible that the Ministers may have had special information not accessible to others, enabling them to discern in the French proposal a hidden danger of which the Opposition and the country are not cognisant. We should like to see that special information produced. It is tolerably certain that we know all that is known to the Ministers of the feeling and disposition of the people of the Northern States, and of the folly and feebleness of their Government; and yet no one outside the Cabinet has been able to point any real mischief that could in any case arise from a joint endeavour by England and France to persuade them to abandon untenable pretensions and terminate a useless struggle. It is for the Ministry, as Mr. F. Peel said at Bury, to prove that their refusal was well grounded, and we shall be glad to see their defence. In the meantime, the moderation of Lord Derby—who speaks of foreign affairs with the reserve and delicacy of a statesman who may ere long be answerable for their conduct, and who is careful not to embarrass himself or his country by any hasty declarations or peremptory censures—must not be construed as involving the acquittal of the culprits, or even as conveying a recommendation to mercy.

His lordship's language on the subject of recognition is distinct, precise, and severely logical; affording a striking contrast to the half-formed views and halting expressions of the Government. He considers that we have a right to recognize the Southern Confederacy, while the war continues, and is vigorously maintained by the North, only on the same footing on which we recognized the Governments of Greece and Belgium while Turkey and Holland were still able to maintain their claims, and in fact seemed likely to enforce them with only too much success. Recognition durante bello is, he says, legitimate "where other nations, having, in the interests of humanity, determined that a desolating warfare shall no longer be continued, agree to recognize the revolving party." So far we conceive that no one who has read history can differ from him. There is a further point, however, for consideration. "In that case," said Lord Derby, "recognition means nothing unless the powers who join it are ready to support by force of arms the claims of the state which they recognize." No one is prepared to go to war in order to set the Confederate States free from their invaders; therefore it would not be right as yet to recognize them. We are reluctantly compelled to maintain, even against Lord Derby, the opinion we have always held on this question. It is true that the recognition of Greece or Belgium would have had no effect; it would have been simply and speedily nullified by their subjugation. But no one—least of all Lord Derby—believes that the North can subdue the Confederate States. And however the fact may be, the belief of both belligerents evidently is that the mere recognition of those States by England and France would mean a great deal; that it would convey the moral verdict of the world upon the struggle now desolating America, and would produce such an effect upon the Northern people, already divided and hesitating, as probably to induce them to desist from their fruitless enterprise. Therefore we think that, on Lord Derby's own principle, recognition in this case would be legitimate. It would need no recourse to arms, for it would probably accomplish its work without any such appeal. And though the speech of the Conservative leader makes it useless at present to urge a measure which the Ministry dare not, and which he will not undertake, we do not believe that many months will pass before whoever is then Minister of the Queen will be forced to reconsider the matter. Public opinion is in England omnipotent, and public opinion has for the last year been every day turning more and more strongly in favour of recognition.

The only defence of their American policy which the Ministers can make is, that they desire, at any cost, to avoid irritating the North. This is a poor and cowardly argument; but, what is worse, it is also an untrue one. As Mr. Disraeli said, though the Ministers have stuck to their policy of non-intervention and non-recognition, their language has not been in accordance with that policy. They have been constantly contradicting one another; but they have contrived individually to say very little to soothe and very much to exasperate the insane hatred of the Northern people, and of the Republican party especially, towards England. One of them has told us that the North is fighting for empire and the South for independence. Another, that the leaders of the Confederacy have made an army, are making a navy, and, what is more, have made a nation. A subordinate declares that the Lord of Hosts is on the side of the South. It is to be thought that speeches like these are not quite as exasperating to the North as the recognition of the Confederate States would be; or that their effect is to be done away by the legal doubts of Sir G. Lewis or the warm sympathy of poor Mr. Milner Gibson? The only impression which can be produced abroad by the language and the conduct of our Ministers is that their hostility to the North is only held in check by their fear of her vengeance. And if we are to have a policy of strict inaction, in the name of national dignity let the Government also learn the policy of decorous reticence.

THE VIRGINIA STATE LINE.

The following is an official account of the operations of the Virginia State troops:—

Headquarters Virginia State Line, Camp Clarkson, Tazewell County, December 17, 1862.

Sir,—After my last communication to you I prepared an expedition consisting of a strong force of cavalry under Colonel John Clarkson, to operate against the enemy in the counties of Wayne, Cabell, &c. He set out from Chapmansville on the 14th of November, in the direction of Cabell down the Guyandotte River, over a rough and difficult road. The following day he fell in with a detachment of the enemy, which he quickly routed and dispersed. He continued the march until within a few miles of the Ohio River, breaking up the "Home Guard" organization of the enemy, which are very numerous in all that country, and taking prisoners every day.

A strong guard of Yankee troops, acting as a guard for the Pierpont Assessor for the county of Wayne, were attacked and dispersed after a short skirmish, in which was killed and wounded some of the enemy, and took a few prisoners. Colonel Clarkson proceeded then, according to the previous directions given him, to the Sandy River, to attack a large and formidable organization of the enemy composed mainly of the native population, and very strongly posted amidst the cliffs and forests upon the precipitous banks of that river. He succeeded in taking them by surprise completely, and after killing and wounding a number of them took a large number of prisoners, and surprised entirely the rest of the force. This force and organization were formidable and extremely dangerous to the peace and quiet of all the country round about for many miles, the loyal people were nearly all driven from their country, and all were robbed. After that, Colonel Clarkson, according to previous understanding, made a junction with me at the mouth of Pigeon Creek, in Logan County, on the Kentucky border, whither I had gone with the infantry and a section of the mounted howitzer battery.

I learned from Colonel Clarkson that the enemy had started a number of boats, with valuable supplies, from the mouth of Sandy to a post recently established at Pikeville, a point at the head of navigation on the Louisa fork of Sandy. These boats were in charge of a strong guard, and were intended to furnish a complete outfit for a force deemed sufficient for them, by their commander, to march upon and destroy the salt works in Smyth and Washington counties.

I determined at once to attack this train, and from its distance, being more than forty miles off, it became necessary to send mounted men. Besides this reason, I found it inconvenient to move the infantry in that direction, on account of the number of prisoners with which we were encumbered. The cavalry and mounted men were put in motion within an hour, and proceeded upon the march, which was uninterrupted, day or night, until the enemy were overtaken, attacked and routed.

Our people captured ten of the enemy's transport boats, laden with valuable supplies. A great deal of these supplies was distributed amongst the men, and much of them was brought off; but a very large amount of most valuable supplies was necessarily destroyed for want of transportation to bring them away. A train of 100 pack mules would have brought away a very large amount of extremely valuable stores, which were committed to the fire and the river.

The night following the capture of these boats (indeed, just twelve hours after the attack upon the boats), our forces engaged that of Colonel Dilts, posted in an extremely strong position on the summit of a mountain on the road leading from Prestonsburg to Pikeville. This position was taken and held without any knowledge on our part, and as the attack was made after the night, and entirely unexpected, we were taken at a great disadvantage. But our men behaved with great steadiness and resolution, received the attack and charged the enemy, driving him from his position, and dispersing them entirely. The rout was complete, and the post at Pikeville, consisting of a thousand men, was entirely broken up. The prisoners and the Union people in that neighbourhood reported Colonel Dilts as killed in the fight that night.

For more detailed statements of this expedition I refer you to the report of Colonel Clarkson. In our operations through the country, we made a number of recruits in the counties of Cabell, Wayne, Logan, &c.

My object in this campaign was, as far as possible, to prevent the occupation by the Yankee forces, of the country between Kanawha Valley and Kentucky border, as well as to destroy the military organization of the country under the traitor Government at Wheeling. Both objects were fully attained, as long as I was able to remain in the country. The military organizations, very numerous and well appointed in every particular, were almost entirely destroyed and the attempts to set up the spurious Government were entirely foiled.

I was compelled to leave the country, held by me for more than three months alone, for the want of Quartermaster's supplies. We were without tents, or clothing, or cooking utensils, or axes, and after the inclement weather of winter set in, we could no longer remain in the field. With these stores supplied, I would have remained in that country throughout the winter months. We were able to procure food (meat and bread, in the country, nearly all of it taken from the enemy.

The campaign, from first to last, was one of hardship and privations, but they were borne without complaint by the men, who are unsurpassed in hardship, activity, and capability to endure privations. They deserve great praise for their constancy and general good conduct.

The officers generally deserve commendation, but to Colonel Clarkson too much credit cannot be given for his energy, activity, and courage. The obstacles he encountered, of every sort, throughout these expeditions, were of the most formidable character, but they were also most gallantly surmounted.

I have the honour to be, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

JOHN B. FLOYD,

Major-General Commanding Virginia State Line.

GENERAL STUART AS A TELEGRAPHER.

From the Richmond Whig,

We saw at the office of the Southern Telegraphic Company, in this city, the superior telegraphic operating instrument which General Stuart used in his late expedition to communicate with Quartermaster-General Meigs, at Washington. Since the Yankee papers have had a good deal to say about this achievement of our Virginian cavalier, we append his letter to Dr. Morris, giving a correct statement of the capture:

Dr. W. S. Morris, President Southern Telegraph Company, Richmond:

Sir,—I have the honour to send, through the courtesy of Major John Pelham, my chief of artillery, an instrument captured at Burke's Station, Ohio and Alexandria Railroad, during my late expedition. I beg that you will accept it as a token of regard appropriate to your position. We surprised the operator, and my operator, Shepperd, took his place. I sat in the office some time while Shepperd read the wild alarms flashing over the wires about our operations, and ascertained the steps taken and means at hand of resisting me, and then shaped my course accordingly. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. E. B. STUART,
Major-General of Cavalry.

THE FEDERAL GENERALS AND UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE.

(From the Richmond Enquirer, December 20.)

It is almost impossible to form any opinion as to the probability of Yankee action under the mortification of defeat. But if the past is to form any criticism for the future, Burnside will not only be decapitated, like his predecessors, McDowell, Scott, McClellan, Pope, and Buell, but "drawn and quartered," if political butchery can invent the means.

The present war, so far as the Yankees are concerned, has witnessed more sudden changes of commanding officers than any other war of the world.

A Government like that of the United States, based upon the universal suffrage of a vacillating and inconstant people, is ever under the strain to avert popular feeling and disappointment from itself to some one else; as long as success attends its efforts, all goes "as merry as a marriage bell," but whenever disaster and defeat has overtaken its army, the inconstant rabble, thoughtless and incapable of reflection, immediately growl complaints, and the Government seeks to shift the responsibility from itself to the head of the unfortunate commander. Such weakness on the part of the rulers, and such inconstancy on the part of the people, and such unfairness and dishonesty on the part of both, argues a national instability that foreign Governments cannot fail to observe, and upon which, in due time, they will have to act.

The defeat of the United States' army at Bull Run was not chargeable to Scott and McDowell; they had shown military capacity in no ordinary degree, and the future history of that campaign will do justice to the ability and generalship of these commanders; and yet a weak and frightened Administration sacrificed those officers to appease a restless and unreasoning country. McClellan, who had risen into notice by reason of the battle of Rich Mountain, was made to supersede McDowell and Scott. The battles of Yorktown, Williamsburg, Seven Pines, Mechanicsville, Gaines Mill, Savage Station, Malvern Hill, and Sharpsburg, all fought under his command, and all claimed as victories, nevertheless resulted in his decapitation, and Pope was invested with supreme command. Cedar Mountain, Rappahannock, Thoroughfare, Manassas, and Chantilly—all victories—resulted in superseding of the hero whose "headquarters was in the saddle."

Buell, whose advance from the Ohio was attended with the victories of Forts Henry, Donaldson, Columbus, Island No. 10, Shiloh, and Sperryville, has also fallen, and, like McDowell, is now before a court martial.

With such a retrospect, what standard shall measure the humiliation in store for Burnside? Will he be sent to New Jersey, the Botany Bay for Federal commanders, or to Minnesota, the Siberia of the United States, or will he be brought before a court martial, like McDowell, Porter, and Buell?

We make these inquiries not from any particular interest in the fate of Burnside, but calling attention to the instability and vacillation of the United States and congratulating the people of the Confederate States upon their escape from association with a people whom adversity throws into such paroxysms of excitement as to compel their Government to act with insensate animosity against officers who have done as well with the troops furnished them, as a real Napoleon or Wellington could have done. "A nation of Sovereigns" cannot be expected to stand killing at the command of one of their temporary commanders. They vote themselves out whenever the fire of the enemy becomes "more than human nature can stand," and their soldiers are both the judges to determine upon, and the sovereigns to execute the backward movement.

Universal suffrage exercised on the battle-field, under the fire of an enemy, will always, like a council of war, end in "falling back." No efforts of company, field or brigade-officers can stay the movement or countermand the orders of the "Sovereigns;" they have voted themselves out, and out they go, McClellan or Burnside to the contrary notwithstanding.

To cover up and conceal a defect of national character, resulting from universal suffrage exercised by aliens and foreigners just from Europe, fighting for pay, and feeling no interest in the war nor pride in the country, the Administration at Washington have unhesitatingly disgraced every commander who has evinced any ability, until the command of their army devolved upon Burnside. To judge of his ability as a commander, it is only necessary to state that from the balcony of the "Phillip's House," in Stafford County, he sent his troops to the fight in columns of attack "doubled on the centre," thus furnishing ready food for every musket ball, cannon ball, slug, schrapnel, canister and fragment of shell, discharged by the Confederate army. Universal suffrage has nearly brought about the universal destruction of the Yankee army.

WHEN THE STATES SECEDED.—Frequent inquiries are made as to when the Acts of Secession were passed by the several States. South Carolina Seceded December 20, 1860; Mississippi, January 9, 1861; Alabama and Florida, January 11, 1861; Georgia, January 19, 1861; Louisiana, January 26, 1861; Texas, February 1, 1861; Virginia, April 17, 1861; Arkansas, May 6, 1861; North Carolina, May 20, 1861. Tennessee passed the Ordinance of Secession May 6, and it was ratified by the people June 8, 1861.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The smallest success is thankfully received by the Federals. If they occupy an undefended village, or seize a few negroes from an unprotected plantation, or capture a merchant vessel, they are in ecstasies. But their joy is short-lived. Before the news is a day old, comes the report of some considerable disaster from the same quarter. On the 29th of January the British steamer Princess Royal was captured by the Federals whilst attempting to run the blockade into Charleston. There was on board a valuable cargo, including warlike stores. The despatches were saved by the pilot and some of the crew, who escaped in boats to Charleston. The Northern papers manifested what we must consider rather immoderate joy, seeing that the blockade of Charleston has been evaded with great regularity, and that, in the very nature of things, vessels engaged in the enterprise must now and then fall into the hands of the Federal fleet. The capture of the merchantman was rather more than avenged the next day. On the 30th of January, one Federal gunboat was captured at Stono River, and another crippled. The following is the telegraphic report of the affair which appeared in the Richmond Examiner of the 31st of January:—

Charleston, Jan. 30, 1863.

The Federal gunboat I. P. Smith, carrying eleven guns and 230 men, surrendered unconditionally to our forces this afternoon, after a sharp engagement, at Stono River. The enemy's loss is heavy. Only one man was wounded on our side. Another gunboat escaped in a crippled condition. Our forces were under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Bates.

The I. P. Smith, with her heavy armament stores, and crew, is a considerable capture. No particulars are given of the gunboat which was damaged. But for the numerous Federal naval disasters that have lately occurred, this affair on the Stono River would have created some impression on either side of the Atlantic. It seems as if the Confederate navy, as well as the Confederate army, is to be recruited from the enemy. The Federal capture of the British merchantman Princess Royal became a mere foil to show off the next day's capture of the gunboat I. P. Smith; but this achievement of the 30th of January is thrown into the shade by the naval battle off Charleston on the 31st of January, and which resulted in legally raising the blockade of that port. Although until this moment no details of the engagement have reached us, the telegraphic summary is sufficiently explicit to acquaint us with the main incidents.

At 1 o'clock, a.m., on 31st of January, two Confederate iron-clad gunboats, accompanied by three steamers, left the port of Charleston for the purpose of attacking the blockading squadron. The engagement did not commence till 4 o'clock, and probably was as short as it was incontestably decisive. Of the blockading squadron, consisting of thirteen vessels, including two first-class frigates—the gunboat Mercedita, carrying eleven guns, and another gunboat, were sunk; four Federal vessels were burnt; the steamer Quaker City was partially disabled, but managed to escape with the rest of the squadron. As soon as the battle was over, the Confederate fleet returned to Charleston, and Commander Ingraham officially reported that the blockading fleet had gone out of sight. Upon this General Beauregard issued a proclamation that the Confederate fleet had attacked the blockading squadron off Charleston, and sunk, dispersed, or driven off and out of sight for the time the entire hostile fleet. He, therefore, formally declared that the blockade of Charleston by the United States was raised by the superior force of the Confederates from and after the 31st of January. He placed steamers at the disposal of the foreign Consuls to see for themselves that no blockade existed, and the British Consul went on board the steamer Petrel five miles beyond the usual anchorage of the blockaders, but could see nothing of them with glasses.

Late on the evening of the 31st of January four vessels of the blockading squadron reappeared off Charleston; on the 1st of February there were (according to Northern reports) twenty vessels off Charleston bar, and this force appears subsequently to have been increased by the Federal steamer New Ironsides. To use a familiar proverb, the Federals were trying to lock the stable door when it was too late. A new blockade may be commenced, but the old blockade existing at Charleston on the 30th of January was broken and destroyed on the 31st of January. For the law on this point we refer our readers to our leader columns.

It is stated that the foreign Consuls at Charleston have had a meeting, at which they expressed an unanimous opinion that the blockade had been legally raised. It is difficult to conceive how they could have arrived at any other conclusion. The Confederate Secretary of State has notified the raising of the Charleston blockade to the English and French Consuls at Richmond.

The New York papers appear to be stunned by the blow, and are making all kinds of shifts to get out of the difficulty. They talk of a fog, but they will not blind any, but those who went sec, by their foggy excuse.

The threats to retake Galveston were not fulfilled at the latest dates. So far from the Federals recovering the position so gallantly taken from them, they were not able to prevent the Harriet Lane from going to sea. A correspondent of the New York Herald says: "Galveston is a doomed town. The disgrace attending the capture of the Harriet Lane must be wiped out, and the revenge upon the butchers and captors will be awful." Big and awful words, we admit; but then, big and awful words never break bones or capture forts. There is evidently no lack of John Popes in the Federal service.

The most important news from Galveston is that General Magruder has declared the port open. The following is his proclamation:—

Galveston, Jan. 4, 1863.

Whereas, the undersigned has succeeded in capturing and destroying a part of the enemy's fleet, and in driving the remainder out of the harbour of Galveston and beyond the neighbouring waters, and the blockade having been thus effectually raised, he therefore proclaims to all concerned that the harbour of Galveston is open for trade to all friendly nations, and their merchants are invited to resume their usual commercial intercourse with this port.

Done at Galveston, this, the 4th day of January, 1863.

J. B. MAGRUDER, Major-General Commanding

Was there a fog at Galveston as well as Charleston? It is apparent that the Federals could only make "a show" of blockading the whole of the Southern ports so long as the Confederates had not a navy.

The West India mail brings us interesting details of the sinking of the Hatteras. On the 20th of January, the Alabama, with the officers and crew of the Hatteras arrived at Jamaica. Captain Semmes landed his prisoners (118, including officers) and paroled them. According to the report of the Jamaica Guardian, gleaned from the accounts given by the officers of the Alabama, the Confederate steamer, when between twenty and thirty miles of Galveston, discovered a fleet of seven Federal gunboats, one of which, the Hatteras, immediately directed its course to her. Captain Semmes forthwith put to sea, and managed to draw his pursuer away from the fleet. When this had been accomplished, it was in the power of the swift Alabama to choose her time for action. At 6 o'clock in the evening the vessels were about 150 yards distant from each other. The Hatteras hailed the Alabama, and being then told that she was a British man-of-war, sent off a boat to board her. This was a signal for a broadside from the Alabama, to which the Hatteras replied without loss of time. The engagement lasted thirteen minutes, when it was found that the Hatteras was fast sinking. Upon this the Alabama lowered her boats and took off the crew, and two minutes after the last man (the captain) had left her the Federal vessel sank. The Hatteras was 300 tons larger than the Alabama, and carried nine rifled guns. The Alabama received seven shots, and her damages, which were slight, were being repaired at Port Royal, Jamaica.

On the 27th of January, Fort M'Allister, at Genesis Point—the mouth of the Ogeechee River, fifteen miles south of the Savannah River—was bombarded by the Federal iron-clad Montawk. The engagement lasted for upwards of five hours, when the Montawk had to retire with her turret damaged. The Northern papers assert that the Montawk was uninjured; but we presume she had had "enough" before beating a retreat. The Federal accounts of this transaction are pretty specimens of mystification. The funniest part of the story is that the Federal commander "lay under the enemy's fire for four hours to try his vessel." We may not have a very exalted opinion of the capacity of Yankee naval commanders; but we do not believe them such arrant fools as to put themselves under fire for four hours as an experiment, or such arrant cowards as to retreat uninjured. Northerners should for decency's sake abstain from so slandering their officers.

It has been reported, but the report cannot be traced to any reliable source, that the Florida has been destroyed. The Northern papers have called attention to the rumour by sensational headings, but they evidently do not credit it.

General Hooker, for all we know, may be an able commander; but what can he do if he has not efficient troops? If we are to credit the Republicans, when McClellan led the Army of the Potomac, the Confederates had to fight an army without a general; now they represent that the Confederates have to contend with a general without an army. The Army of the Potomac is melting away with wonderful rapidity. The desertions are on the grand scale that is the glory of Yankeedom. One corps, which ought to be 15,000 strong, could only muster 5000. Probably the rations are drawn for the full complement; but then, drawing rations does not win battles. Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that as yet General Hooker has not started for Richmond, or that "no movement is anticipated for some weeks."

There has been a battle, or rather a skirmish, near Blackwater River, Virginia. The Confederate force was under the command of General Pryor; the Federals were under the command of General Corcoran. The North claims a victory, but not in very decided terms. The correspondent of the New York Herald says the affair "should be remembered as a Union victory." He also says, "some of the new regiments straggled badly"; and that "our victory has been dearly bought, considering the result obtained." The Federals admit 100 killed and wounded, and that the loss of the enemy is not known, but that they "left fifty killed and wounded on the field."

The Confederates crossed the Blackwater. One notable incident is, that the 167th Pennsylvania Regiment, composed of drafted men, refused to fight, and lay down upon the ground during the entire engagement. Northern conscripts are hard to obtain, and when obtained are not particularly reliable. The Northern soldiers do not seem to have much stomach for a hopeless contest, especially as their pay is not prompt, and there is no chance of plunder.

Confederate accounts report the recapture of Holly Springs, Mississippi, by General Van Dorn, with 700 prisoners, and a large quantity of stores. A Michigan cavalry regiment is said to have been cut to pieces in the charge. In another part of our impression will be found a narrative of the Confederate incursion into this place on the 20th of December.

The Federals are working at the canal before Vicksburg; but though the water is running through it two to four feet deep, there is no sign of the canal succeeding. The nature of the ground may render it impossible, under any circumstances, to divert the course of the river, and this would seem to be the case. The Confederates have planted a battery on the Mississippi shore, in such a position as to command the outlet of the proposed canal or cut.

The clamour for the restoration of General McClellan to the command of the Army of the Potomac is increasing. Wherever he goes he is received with the greatest enthusiasm.

Mr. Simon Cameron's attempt to bribe a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature to vote for him as United States' Senator, has been fully exposed. Mr. Pryor, thinking such an effort would be made, put himself in the way, arranged to receive $25,000 for his vote, voted against Cameron, and then published the whole affair in a letter addressed to the Patriot newspaper. At the final interview, Mr. Pryor relates that:—

After the bargain was concluded, Simon straightened up on his chair, rubbing his legs with his hands, saying, "Well, this ends it. I will be senator, and you shall never regret it." (Addressing himself to me)—"I will be the most powerful man in that Senate; the entire state of affairs of this Government will be changed; nothing is more certain than that the South will gain her independence (this sounded like treason), and then we will hold the control of the Government, and I will be able to serve my friends."

We do not admire the conduct of Mr. Pryor, which is nearly as bad as that of his victim. Mr. Cameron may not be worse than some of his countrymen who are held in esteem, but he has been guilty of the crime of being found out, and may possibly find it injure his political prospects. We are not sure that it will, because we have frequently seen Mr. Lincoln reward persons found guilty of breaches of public trust—as, indeed, was the case with Mr. Cameron.

Mr. Boileau has eaten humble pie, and been released from confinement. He has greatly disgusted his fellow-citizens. Never did any man give up a chance of being a hero upon such cheap terms. With a little patience and at the cost of a few days' imprisonment, Mr. Boileau would have been released, and become the favourite of his party. However, he chose to spurn the favours of Dame Fortune.

The Republicans are doing their best to induce Mr. Lincoln to send General Butler back to New Orleans.

As a specimen of the proceedings of the Reverend Abolitionists, we quote the following from a sermon delivered by the Rev. D. Bellows:—

"It is no longer a war in defence of the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws. It is a war to be carried on no longer with the aim of re-establishing the Union and the Constitution with all their old compromises. God means not to let us off with any half-way work. I am now convinced, and I consider it the most humane, the most economical, and the most statesmanlike policy, now to take the most radical ground possible; to assume that this is a war for the subjugation, or the extermination, of all persons who wish to maintain the Slave Power—a war to get rid of slavery and of slaveholders, whether it be constitutional or not."

The Bill for arming negroes has passed the Federal House of Representatives, after an animated debate, by a vote of 85 to 55. As a specimen of the opposition, we may quote from the speech of the representative for Maryland:—

Mr. May (Maryland) spoke against what he characterized as an attempt to elevate the negro to an equality with the white man. Considered as a national policy, it was eminently disgraceful. The united judgment of mankind would pronounce upon it its emphatic condemnation. The example of the King of Dahomey had been presented for their imitation. That despot had an army of blacks, it was said, tremendous and invincible; but it was ferocious and merciless. The people of Maryland would recoil with abhorrence from the pending proposition, and the civilized world condemn it to unmitigated scorn.

The following is the text of the Bill:—

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to enroll, arm, equip, and receive into the land and naval service of the United States, such a number of volunteers of African descent as he may deem equal to suppress the present rebellion, for such term of service as he may prescribe, not exceeding five years; the said volunteers to be organized according to the regulations of the branch of the service into which they may be enlisted, to receive the same rations, clothing, and equipments as other volunteers, and a monthly pay not to exceed that of the volunteers; to be officered by white or black persons, appointed and commissioned by the President, and to be governed by the rules and articles of war, and such other rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the President: Provided that nothing herein contained, or in the rules or articles of war, shall be so construed as to authorize or permit any officer of African descent to be appointed to rank, or exercise military or naval authority over white officers, soldiers, or men, in the military or naval service of the United States; nor shall any greater pay than ten dollars per month, with their usual allowance of clothing and rations, be allowed or paid to privates or laborers of African descent, who are, or may be, in the military or naval service of the United States.

Provided further, That the slaves of the loyal citizens in the States, exempt by the President's proclamation of January 1, 1863, shall not be received into the armed service of the United States, nor shall there be recruiting offices opened in either of the States of Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, or Missouri, without the consent of the Governors of said States having been first obtained.

In New York there has been a fall in the price of gold, it being quoted at 57, and a reaction in stocks, in consequence of the belief that the Senate will not authorize the issue of $300,000,000 of Treasury notes, though the Bill to that effect has passed the House of Representatives. We do not see clearly how the Government is to be carried on without credit—that is, paper—seeing that it has no available funds or adequate taxes.

We elsewhere give the report of the Confederate Secretary of the Treasury, of the income and expenditure since the formation of the permanent Government, until the 31st of December, 1862.

ENGLAND.

The number of paupers in the manufacturing districts has, according to the last weekly returns, been again reduced by 5700. The total diminution since the tide first turned amounts to over 47,000. We have already explained the nature of those arrangements between Poor-Law Guardians and Relief Committees, which account for a part of this change. A town has, let us say, 30,000 persons in receipt of relief. Of these 10,000 depend solely on the Relief Committee, 4000 solely on the Guardians; 16,000 are aided by both. In some few cases a division has been arranged, the Guardians undertaking the sole relief of say 10,000, while the Committee provides entirely for the remainder. This reduces the muster-roll of paupers, but indicates no revival of trade, and no improvement in the condition of the people. We believe, however, that the bona fide reduction of pauperism, by the re-opening of mills, and by migration, has really exceeded 30,000. This is well; but it affords no ground to hope that, while the American war lasts, Lancashire can ever become prosperous, or her manufacturing population find even half their former employment. The Economist, which is by no means favourable to any kind of intervention in the American dispute, but which looks at all political matters from the point of view of the higher classes of commercial men, fully recognizes this fact, and treats the continuance of distress in Lancashire as the inevitable accompaniment of a continuance. If the distress should become chronic—that is, if the war should last for another year or two—it will, in the opinion of our contemporary, be requisite that strong and general measures should be taken by Parliament to provide for the maintenance of Lancashire pauperism by Lancashire property. The occupiers cannot bear the burden; legislation must throw that burden on the owners. The Economist points out that the occupiers are, first, the manufacturers, the value of whose property is not merely deteriorating but absolutely held in abeyance during the continuance of the cotton-famine; and secondly, the shopkeepers and other men of the middle class dependent on the cotton trade, directly or indirectly. By the loss of wages alone, the shopkeepers lose at least the profit on the difference between the present and former annual expenditure of the working classes. That difference is at least £6,000,000; the loss of the shopkeepers is therefore £600,000 or more—a loss perfectly ruinous to most of them. On the debate of Thursday, it says:—

The third matter that appeared pretty clear to all the speakers in the debate on Thursday, was that, if the American war was once over, the crisis might be considered as past, and that trade would ere long resume its old position, but that if on the contrary, the war should unhappily continue, it was quite impossible to foresee either the form or the dimensions which the distress might assume, or the mode in which it might be desirable and necessary to meet it. On the one side it may be argued that at all events there will be cotton enough for half-time or for half the mills and half the people; that even at the high prices that must then prevail, the markets of the world would be able to consume that reduced amount of production; that the improvements in the woollen and linen trades will absorb some of the surplus population, and that the remainder would become comparatively manageable, though doubtless, still a grievous burden. On the other hand it must be remembered that much of our estimate as to what quantity of cotton the world will buy, and what number of our workpeople will be drafted off into other trades, is purely conjectural; while it is utterly impossible to say how far the present numbers dependent on parochial assistance may be swelled when the vast number of lower middle classes of whom we have spoken shall have come upon the rates, as they are fast doing now, and must continue to do; and while the only one certain point is, that every week the crisis is prolonged, must increase both the range and the severity of the distress.

This journal formerly took a more sanguine view of Lancashire prospects than any other well-informed newspaper; and its deservedly high authority will probably have weight both with Parliament and with the public.

At a meeting of the Central Committee on Monday, Mr. Farnall read a long report, showing in detail the number of persons in each district relieved by the Poor Law Guardians and by the Committees; the usual and the actual Poor Law expenditure, and other important facts. The general result was announced to be that the Guardians were spending £16,000 per week on the relief of 222,000 persons, while 238,000 not receiving relief from the Guardians were maintained by the Committees; which, as they had also to supplement in many cases the aid given from the poor rates, were expending £23,000 a week. Mr. Platt, a large manufacturer at Oldham, took an opportunity of recommending the use of Surat. It appeared to him, he said, that a great deal might be done by millowners for the employment of the workpeople if they would only be at a little extra trouble and, perhaps, a little more expense in manufacturing Indian cotton in preference to shutting up their mills and relying so exclusively upon the reappearance of American cotton in the market. The general result of the statistics which he had collected from a number of mills that had been working Indian cotton for six months past was as follows:—The loss in working that kind of cotton had been from 15 to 25 per cent., according to the quality used; the loss upon the working of middling Orleans being from 10 to 15 per cent. The last shipments of American cotton received in this country were no better than Indian cotton. In one mill which he inspected they were spinning 32s, and the loss from working Indian cotton over a period of six months did not exceed 15 per cent., which was the allowance usually made for American. Taking the average of 100 mills spinning Indian cotton, over the same period of six months, and working full time, the loss in quantity was 9 per cent., the weekly wages paid being the same; or, in other words, the master was paying really 9 per cent. more for his work, although the operatives received no more than they would if he paid no such excess.

Several members of the Committee dissented from the conclusions arrived at by Mr. Platt.

The Parliamentary debates have been dull this week. Neither party is prepared for a political battle; and since the Address, no favourable opportunity has presented itself for even a party skirmish. On one or two unimportant divisions the Government have been beaten; but this has been principally through the defection of their Radical allies. Nothing can be done on the American question, for Lord Derby is hopelessly committed. Lord Russell will be sneered at and worried for months to come about his impertinence to Denmark; but nobody will venture to provoke a debate on the Schleswig-Holstein question, which, as Mr. Disraeli remarked, scarcely any man can understand. He will not soon hear the last of his invitation to the Pope; but as nothing came of it, it would be useless to raise a formal debate on the subject. The Brazilian despatches are not yet published. Rumour states that Lord Russell is trying to heal the quarrel, and come to a final settlement with the Brazilian ambassador before producing them. Should he fail, it is probable that the production of the papers will be the signal for an angry discussion, if not for a great party contest.

Convocation—the Parliament of the Church—intends to take measures to condemn or punish the heretical work of the Bishop of Natal. A Committee to inquire into the character of that book, and the steps which should be taken in regard to it, has been appointed in the Lower House, by permission of the Upper. The press generally takes part with the offender, not sufficiently considering the position he has assumed. Any man has a right to think what he pleases, and to write what he pleases, so far as this world's judgment is concerned; and whatever be the moral guilt involved in the publication of a weak and silly book on a grave theological question, its punishment should be left to a higher tribunal than any which can try the sinner while he still lives. But no dignitary of the Church can honourably make use of his position to give effect to his attacks on Church doctrine; no man can, without wicked and wilful dishonesty, take the Church's pay to fight against her. This is what Bishop Colenso has done. And if his book did not show a degree of intellectual confusion which permits us to ascribe his moral error rather to obliquity of vision than to clear-sighted perversity, we should be compelled to condemn his conduct as that of a traitor and a man devoid of honour. As it is, we simply condemn him as a man muddle-headed, alike in moral and historical criticism. But we can have no sympathy with him until he resigns the trust he has so grossly abused. Neither he, nor the Essayists and Reviewers, have behaved with the honour and loyalty which we expect from all who bear the name of gentlemen, whether clergymen or mere men of the world. If Convocation have the legal power to censure their behaviour or drive them from the Church, it does no more than its duty in doing all it can to effect that end.

A rather interesting case has been tried in the Court of Chancery. The British ship Warbler was mortgaged in Liverpool. The mortgagors became bankrupt while the Warbler was in New Orleans. She was attached by creditors there, and claimed by the mortgagees. The District Court of Louisiana ignored their claim, declaring that the law of Louisiana did not take cognizance of mortgages of chattels. The ship was sold, and returned to Liverpool in the hands of her new owner. There she was claimed by the mortgagees. The purchaser asserted his absolute title under the Louisiana sale. The court decided in favour of the mortgagees, observing that the Louisiana court had confused the distribution of assets with the right of property; and had, in refusing to recognize a British mortgage of a British ship, and thus, ignoring the lex loci contractus, been guilty of a violation of that "international comity," which could alone entitle its decrees to any respect in England. It seems to us that the English decision is clearly right, both in justice and in law. The Louisiana court had no right to confiscate the mortgagees' property in the ship (a British one), on the ground that such a peculiar form of property was not known to the law of Louisiana.

The Prince of Wales was admitted a member of the Fishmongers' Company (one of the richest of the old guilds of the City of London), on Thursday last. He was received at Fishmongers' Hall by Lord Clyde and the Wardens of the Company, and subscribed the usual declaration; which was then placed in a casket of gold, along with the certificate constituting the Prince a Freeman of the Company. The casket, splendidly emblazoned, was presented to his Royal Highness by Mr. Cubitt. The Prince replied to the address of that gentleman in the following terms:—

Mr. Cubitt and Gentlemen,—It is with the greatest pleasure that I find myself called upon to return my sincere thanks to you, sir, as Prime Warden, and to you, gentlemen of the Court of Assistants, of this honourable and ancient Company of Fishmongers, for the complimentary and kind terms in which you have expressed yourselves towards me on the occasion of my taking up my freedom, and on your enrolling my name as a citizen with those illustrious personages and relatives who stand recorded in your annals. It cannot be otherwise than a source of pride, and of a still deeper feeling, that of affection, when I look on these walls and see the portraits of those whose son and grandson hopes to form one of your distinguished body; and to be thought worthy of occupying the place of that lamented parent whose loss the whole country has united in deploring would be in itself an object of my highest ambition. Gentlemen,—Let me also tender to you my warmest acknowledgments for the manner in which you have offered your congratulations to me on my approaching marriage, and to the young Princess who hopes so soon to adopt the proud title of an Englishwoman, and to prove herself a comfort to the Queen in her affliction.

A collation followed, at which the healths of the Queen and the Prince were drunk. His Royal Highness acknowledged the compliment only by a bow, and retired immediately afterwards.

The Home Office Circular on penal servitude, referred to last week in Parliament, has been published. It refers to a circular dated 27th June, 1857, and fixing the proportions of various terms of penal servitude to be undergone in solitary confinement and in "hard labour" on public works, and the proportion which may be remitted by a ticket of leave; and simply adds that such remission shall not henceforth be granted to convicts sentenced to penal servitude for a second time.

Sir William Armstrong, the inventor of the famous gun which bears his name, has resigned his situation under Government, and joined his friends of the Elswick Ordnance Company. The reason appears to be that the Government has withdrawn from that company its contract for the manufacture of ordnance. It is said that the step has no connection with the trials that have recently taken place between different forms of cannon, and was wholly unexpected by the War Office.

Mr. Bousfield Ferrand, Conservative, has been returned for Devonport, a dockyard borough, defeating the Ministerial candidate, who is a Lord of the Admiralty. This is considered a great triumph for the Opposition.

The place of the late Captain Gladstone, the brother of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Conservative member for Devizes, has been filled by the election of the Honourable Mr. Addington, another Conservative. The other candidates were Mr. Probyn (Whig) and a Jew named Israel Abrahams, who "went in" for very extreme Radical dogmas and received only six votes. Devizes is certainly behind the age.

On Wednesday evening a meeting of the "Emancipation Society," was held at St. James's Hall. A third part of the hall was set apart for those who were willing to pay a shilling admission, the rest of the place was free to those who were willing to agree to everything that was said. Some persons who were foolish enough to express dissent were "ignominiously" turned out. Mr. George Thompson moved a resolution condemning the Lord Mayor for inviting Mr. Mason to the Mansion House, and, according to the report of the Daily News, "denounced Mr. Mason, contending that the 'Newgate Calendar' did not contain the name of so black a felon, so dire an enemy of God and man, as he who was entertained at the Mansion House by the Lord Mayor. (Loud cheers.) A man stealer and a fugitive slave kidnapper, as Mr. Mason was, was unworthy to unloose the latchet of any gentlemanly highwayman in the land. (Immense cheering.)" The Times happily describes the persons who have arrogated to themselves the title of "The Emancipation Society" as "the very small dogs who have taken possession of the old lion's den."

EUROPE.

The area of the Polish insurrection is undoubtedly extending. The Russian Government has found it necessary to put the whole of the districts of Wilna and Grodno in a state of siege, and the Governors of Volhynia and Podolia have been empowered to take the same step with respect to those provinces. The insurrection is, therefore, eating its way into the Russian empire. The provinces we have named, although quite as much Polish as those aggregated under the name of the Kingdom of Poland, have always been treated by the Czars as integral portions of the empire, and it is only within the last two years that they have given the Government much trouble. That the force of the insurrection is augmenting with the extension of its area is not so clear. It is difficult to get at the truth from the very contradictory and confused accounts which reach us, but their general tenor leads to the conclusion that wherever the insurgents and the Russian troops have met in large numbers the victory has been on the side of the Russians. And whilst the larger detachments of insurgents have been defeated, it does not appear that the insurrection, although very widely extended, is general. The appearance of a few bands in every province is all that we can learn with certainty; the peasants do not seem to have joined the insurgents in any number. The principal fight which has yet taken place occurred in the Government of Grodno, at Siemiatyze, not far from the River Bug, which there forms the frontier between the Kingdom of Poland and the empire. The insurgents are said to have been 5000 strong, to have lost 1000 killed and wounded, and to have been entirely dispersed. Since the dispersion of this division the largest force seems to be that which is encamped on a mountain ridge near Slupia in the Palatinate of Sandomir, and numbers 5000 men, under the command of Langiewicz, the only insurgent leader whose identity is at all clearly established. A later telegram from Warsaw announces that the Russians have attacked and dispersed this body of insurgents. A hundred are said to have been killed, and eleven baggage waggons, together with three wooden caissons, are reported to have fallen into the hands of the victors.

It may turn out that the insurgents have only dispersed to unite again, and that the retirement of the Russians will be followed by the resumption of their old position. In this southern part of the kingdom, and again in the provinces bordering on Russia, the strength of the insurgents lies. We hear little or nothing of them in the provinces which border upon East and West Prussia and Posen. The Russian soldiers are said to act with the utmost brutality. They desolate the whole country, sparing neither age or sex. Of course these statements must be received with caution; it is the interest of the Poles and their friends to influence public opinion against Russia; on the other hand, such conduct is quite consistent with the character of the men and the system of the Russian Government. If true, it is important as evidence that however disaffected the officers of the Russian army may be, the men have no sympathy for the Poles and no disgust at the work of repression assigned them.

The attitude of Austria to the Polish insurrection appears to have occasioned great dissatisfaction at St. Petersburg. Prince Gortschakoff is said to have complained very strongly of the encouragement given to the outbreak by the connivance of the Austrian authorities at the exportation of arms over the Galician frontier. The charge is no doubt a groundless one; but, on the other hand, it must be admitted that the Austrian Government has not shown any great anxiety for the suppression of the insurrection. It entertains no apprehension of an outbreak in its own Polish possessions. As a Catholic Power, Austria has always had a better hold upon the Poles than her partners in the partition—she is sure of the clergy, and that counts for very much. The Pope is said to have sent instructions to the Bishops of Galicia to exert all their influence on behalf of Austrian authority.

Prussia has signed a convention with Russia, the exact terms of which have not been published. It would seem, however, to provide for the transport of Russian soldiers over Prussian territory, and assistance to those who may be driven over the frontier by the insurgents; probably it contains a stipulation for an active intervention in certain contingencies. The Prussian Government is forwarding troops as fast as it can to all points of the frontier, and Herr von Bismarck-Schonhausen has declared in reply to an interpellation in the House of Deputies, that the aim of the movement is the re-establishment of the Polish kingdom in its ancient limits, and that, according to official information, a precisely similar movement to that now going on in Russia is preparing in Prussian territory.

A great deal of invective has been lavished, in anticipation, upon the intervention of Prussia in the Polish insurrection. Now, it is all very well to sympathize with the Poles, and the King of Prussia is not a sovereign whose measures claim any very indulgent criticism, but it ought to be remembered that this insurrection threatens Prussia quite as much as it does Russia, and that success in Russian Poland would inevitably be followed by an attempt to liberate the Poles under Prussian yoke. The Poles allow no prescription; they claim every inch of territory which at any time formed part of the Polish kingdom. They have openly avowed that they mean to take, if they can, the parts of Silesia, which belonged to them, as well as Posen and West Prussia. Indeed, if they wish to be a nation, they can hardly do without Dantzic. Well, Prussia has no idea of giving up these conquests, and we cannot see that it is desirable she should; they are more than half German now; and with all sympathy for the Poles, we must allow that the industrious Germans are better stewards than they are. Prussia will not give up these provinces, and the avowed object of the Poles is to get them. Already West Prussia and the Silesian frontier are in a state of great agitation and excitement. It may well occur to the Prussian Government that self-preservation suggests its cordial action with Russia at this moment.

Nam tua res agitur paries dum proximus ardet.

A very absurd rumour has been spread by the Continental paper which is the chief hatcher of canards, to the effect that M. Drouyn de Lhuys has strongly remonstrated against the conclusion of the Prussian-Russian convention as a breach of non-intervention on the part of Prussia. M. Drouyn de Lhuys has certainly done no such thing; Prussia violates no neutrality, no international law, in aiding Russia to suppress a movement which threatens both States. Probably enough, the French Minister has expressed the regret of the Emperor at the horrors which have been enacted in Poland, and has urged upon Prussia, as well as Russia, justice and mercy to the Poles. That is all he can fairly do, unless he means to bring up the Treaties of 1815, which France assuredly is not inclined to treat as valid, and demands from the Emperor of Russia the fulfilment of the conditions which have long been broken; conditions, however, which, if granted, would not now satisfy the Poles. The insurrection must be suppressed in blood, for all the declarations of English and French newspapers that it must not, if it is to be suppressed at all, and Poland is to remain subject to the Czar. No conciliatory offers would now induce the insurgents to lay down their arms; they will conquer their independence of the foreigner, or they will die. England and France will certainly not declare war against Russia, and go to the help of the Poles, and any other intervention would only aggravate their miseries.

The Corps Legislatif has adopted the address proposed by its Commission. The Emperor replied to the deputation who presented it to him in a speech which, like all the utterances of this remarkable man, has been turned this way and that by the quidnuncs, to extract some indication of his policy. As there are men who will discover some profound thought in the most commonplace expression put by Shakspeare into the mouth of one of his smallest characters, so there are politicians who find a deep meaning in the ordinary courtesies and civil phrases of the Emperor of the French. We confess that we are unable to find, in the assurance of the Emperor that he receives the address as a new proof of the accord which subsists between the legislative body and the Government, and his statement that this accord is more indispensable than ever at a period when, in every part of the globe, truth is obscured by so many contending passions, any other meaning than the natural and obvious one.

It is reported in Paris that the Government of the United States has already returned an answer to the despatch of M. Drouyn de Lhuys, recommending direct negotiation for peace with the Confederate Government. Mr. Seward is said to have expressed his gratitude for the good intentions of the Emperor, and to have intimated that if the ensuing campaign should prove unsuccessful his suggestion may be taken into consideration. The report does not rest upon any very good authority.

Signor Minghetti the Italian Minister, of Finance, has asked the Parliament to authorise a loan of 700 millions of lire, or twenty-eight millions sterling. As the present price of Italian five per cents is only 69, it may be taken that such a loan will not realise for the Italian Exchequer more than nineteen millions sterling. By the aid of this sum, however, by the sale of crown lands, by an increase of the land tax, by the establishment of a number of new taxes, and by a reorganization of the existing banking system, Signor Minghetti considers it possible to establish an equilibrium between revenue and expenditure in four years. The sanguine anticipations of the Minister give a sorry picture enough of the state of Italian finance, but we fear that the reality is much worse. The deficit for last year was no less than 374 millions of lire, or about fifteen millions sterling; that for the current year is estimated at 350 millions of lire, and 1859, 1860, and 1861, presented deficits of the same magnitude. They were war years, and their deficits were covered by war loans. But 1862 and 1863 are years of peace, and the question is whether the Italian Government can either so reduce its expenditure or increase its income as to do away with these deficits in future years. The produce of the new loan, and the sale of crown lands, may possibly provide means for supplying the deficits of the four next years; but how will the account stand then? Italy will have used up her extraordinary resources, the enormous increase of her indebtedness will have sunk her credit to a point which will render loans absolutely ruinous, and there can be no assurance that the necessities which occasion her present enormous expenditure will have ceased. A considerable increase of taxation is hardly possible. Already the provinces which have been annexed complain that they cannot pay what is demanded of them, and any increase of the claims of the tax-gatherer would generate very serious discontent. At the same time the provinces clamour for public works upon an enormous scale.

The Prussian Government has laid before the Chamber of Deputies the long-promised bill for the reorganization of the army. The measure has not the slightest chance of passing, as it proposes to legalize precisely those changes—already illegally carried out—to which the House and the country have so intense an objection. Nominally it lessens the obligations of the Prussian citizen to military service; practically it greatly increases the burden. Under the old system, still legally in force, the Prussian was bound to the State for twenty years. His liability was first to serve three years under colours—in practice only two were served—then he remained for two years in the reserve, and could at any time during this period be called back to the ranks. He then passed for seven years into the Landwehr of the first summons, and for seven years more in the Landwehr of the second summons. The Government bill reduces the whole time of liability to seventeen years, but it increases that part of the term which is really onerous. Three years are to be passed under colours, i.e., in active service, the time in the reserve is increased from two to four years; so that, in all, the Prussian citizen would have seven years of his life taken up with active service, and the obligation to return to the ranks at any time or on any pretence the Government may determine. The term in the Landwehr of the first summons is reduced to four, and in that of the second to five years. The plan which the majority of the House of Deputies favour is two years under colours instead of three, and three years in the reserve instead of two, leaving the great obligation for five years, as by the existing law, but lessening the term of actual service. The bill will no doubt be amended by the House in this sense, and then fall to the ground.

The members of the Prussian House of Deputies are paid three thalers (nine shillings) per day compensation, during the session. The officials, who are members—and their name is legion; more than one-third of the House consisting of judges and other Government functionaries—are further entitled to the payment of a substitute to do their work, whilst they are attending to their parliamentary business. The Government has presented to the House a bill to abolish this last payment, but the House, as may be supposed, rejected it almost unanimously. It is evident, from the debate, that when the House wins its victory over the King, and Ministers have to fix the budget to suit the views of the majority, the compensation will increase. The Deputies complain that the three thalers do not pay the extra cost of living in Berlin.

The Swedish Chambers have been discussing the Schleswig-Holstein question, and expressing their sympathy with Denmark and their indignation with Earl Russell. The Holstein Assembly has been addressing the King of Denmark, and renewing its monstrous pretensions. The Greeks are still without a candidate for their throne. Earl Russell has been too much occupied in editing his collection of diplomatic correspondence, and the National Assembly has been discussing theories of government. The mysterious Ministerial crisis continues in Spain, and that stormy petrel, Narvaez, has appeared upon the scene; so the long supremacy of O'Donnell seems to totter to its fall. A revolutionary committee has been discovered at Venice, and the leaders have been arrested. The correspondence between Queen Victoria and the Tycoon of Japan has been published, in which the Queen assures the Tycoon that his ambassadors behaved very well whilst in England. And the King of the Belgians, who was reported to be dying, has been driving about the streets of Brussels.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 12.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Lord Ravensworth pressed upon the Government the necessity of constructing harbours of refuge on the most dangerous parts of the coast. Some people had said that such harbours would be speedily silted up and rendered useless, but he attached no weight to this objection. What was of more importance was that the owners of the ships engaged in the coasting trade were indifferent in the matter. He thought the seamen would not be so. The shipowners were accused of sending out unseaworthy vessels, but he thought that this charge had been exaggerated. He thought convict labour might be usefully employed in the construction of these harbours.—The Duke of Somerset (First Lord of the Admiralty) said that such harbours would cost an enormous sum of money, and would not prove so available as was supposed to save life and property. A conversation took place on the grants of tickets-of-leave to transports in Western Australia; after which the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 12.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Roebuck asked for papers relative to the expenses of the Herald's College, and the Royal Licenses granted for the change of surname.

Mr. Bentinck asked whether any legislation would be proposed by the Government for the prevention of railway accidents. Mr. Milner Gibson replied that the Government did not think any such legislation was necessary, as there had only been twenty-four persons killed and 500 injured last year. In answer to Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald, Mr. Layard promised that no time should be lost in laying on the table the correspondence relative to the Brazilian dispute.

Mr. Villiers moved for leave to introduce a Bill, continuing the Act of last session, for the relief of the unions of the cotton manufacturing districts. Legally, every parish is primarily liable for the relief of its own poor. The parishes are, for the purposes of Poor-Law administration, combined into Unions, but the liability of the parish to support its own destitute inhabitants is not thereby diminished. The Act of last session provided, first, that when in any parish the expenditure on the relief of the poor should exceed 5s. in the pound on the annual assessed value of the property within that parish, it might demand that the excess should be defrayed by the union; and that when in like manner the expenditure of the union exceeded 5s. in the pound, the excess should be borne by the county at large. To this was added, at the suggestion of the principal representatives of Lancashire in the House of Commons, a provision enabling the guardians of any union to borrow money whenever their expenditure on the relief of the poor exceeded 3s. in the pound. The operation of this Act was confined to the manufacturing counties; and it was to expire at Lady-day, 1863. This Act the President of the Poor Law Board now proposed to continue for another year. He entered into a statistical explanation of the condition of the manufacturing districts. He stated that four of the most distressed unions were in a position to call on the country for a rate in aid; and that eight more were in a condition entitling them to borrow money on security of the rates, which some of them had already done, at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The Act had not been called into operation more extensively, only because more than half of the people thrown out of work have been supported by voluntary contributions. But it was necessary to protect the ratepayers, whose property had become almost valueless, from being overwhelmed by the enormous demands upon them.

Colonel Wilson Patten (a moderate Conservative, who sits for North Lancashire, and who is a very much respected, if not a very active, member of the House) explained the difference between the condition of Lancashire at present and that of other districts, in which a 5s. rate is normal, and excites neither surprise nor complaint. In the latter case, the burden falls on the landlord; for tenants, in taking farms or houses, add rent and rates together, and consider whether the total is a fair price for the occupation. But when a normal rate of 6d. suddenly is raised to 6s., the additional burden is thrown entirely on the occupiers. Lancashire occupiers, whose wealth is now worthless for all practical use, whose trade is gone, whose industry is suspended, are in no condition to endure such a burden. He remarked, also, on the necessity of providing work, as well as bread, for the unemployed, and said that the Central Executive Committee were endeavouring to draw up a scheme for the purpose.

The Lord Mayor said that the stream of contributions which had hitherto flowed in from all quarters would ere long be dried up, and that some other means must be found of supporting the indigent of Lancashire.—Mr. Hibberd gave the history of a case in which, from the extreme poverty of the ratepayers, a levy of 8s. had proved inadequate to provide for an expenditure of 5s. in the pound.—Sir B. Lytton thought that the landlords, rather than the occupiers, or the surrounding unions, ought to bear the burden of rates in excess of 5s. in the pound.—Lord Stanley recommended that the operation of the Act should only be extended for six months more. It was impossible to tell what after that time might be the condition of Lancashire, and absurd to legislate on conjecture. Mr. Sidney said that there was distress elsewhere as great as that in the cotton districts.—Mr. Potter stated, as illustrating the position of Lancashire ratepayers, the case of Glossop, where, out of a rental of £65,000, £22,000 ordinarily came from cottage property, which was not now producing £2000 a year clear of interest on mortgages. Most of these cottages were owned by working-men.

Mr. Cobden, with reference to the suggestion of Lord Stanley, observed that, assuming the present state of things to continue, the condition of the cotton districts would be infinitely more serious and difficult next winter than in the present. He gave details of the large amount of the voluntary contributions which had come from the districts themselves, besides poor rates, loss of wages, depreciation of fixed capital, and other losses, making an aggregate of £12,445,000. He recommended the adoption of Lord Stanley's suggestion to continue the Act for six months, and that the House should come to the question again at Midsummer.

Leave was given to bring in the Bill, and the House adjourned at a quarter to 8.

FRIDAY FEBRUARY 13.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Lord Ellenborough (formerly Governor-General, and afterwards Secretary of State for India) in presenting petitions from Indian officers complaining of the loss of certain advantages guaranteed to them by Parliament, insisted upon the fulfilment of the engagements which Parliament had entered into with the officers of the old Indian army, as an act of simple justice. Having stated in detail many of the grievances complained of, he said that the greatest complaint of all was that made on account of the formation of the Staff Corps, which, in the opinion of the petitioners, unjustly interfered with general promotion, and, by allowing a Staff Corps officer to return to command a regiment after several years' absence from it, superseded the officer who had been doing the regimental duty in the meantime. If, however, the same advantages were offered to officers of infantry and cavalry, after a certain number of years' service, as had been conferred on the Staff Corps, he believed that but few complaints would in future be heard.

The Duke of Argyll considered there was no cause for the complaint that the guarantees of the Act of Parliament had been violated. Parliament had guaranteed that the position of the Indian officers should not be made worse, but had taken no engagement that it should be made better, yet notwithstanding this those officers had been treated in a liberal and generous spirit by the Government. He then explained the objects of the Staff Corps, showed that the fears entertained by the petitioners were groundless, and concluded his explanation by stating the numbers of the officers who had taken advantage of the Staff Corps, of those who had been promoted in their regiments, and also of those who had retired from the service.

After a few remarks from Lord Ellenborough,

The Duke of Cambridge explained the principles, in regard to the Indian officers, on which the Staff Corps had been organized, and stated that he believed no officer of the Indian local service had suffered by the recent changes.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 13.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Sir J. Palk (a most influential Conservative county member) gave notice that he would, on Friday next, on the motion for going into Committee of Supply, call the attention of the House to the distress existing in the manufacturing districts, and move that an address be presented to her Majesty praying that a Royal Commission might be appointed to inquire into the best means of obtaining a permanent supply of cotton. He would also call the attention of the House to the American struggle, and to the expediency, now that union between the Northern and Southern States seemed to be impracticable, of taking steps with a view to mediation between the contending parties.

Mr. Peacock proposed an address to the Crown, praying that no Crown lands within fifteen miles of London might be sold or enclosed, and alleged that in certain cases the Crown had parted with lands formerly open to the public, for a merely nominal price, and allowed them to be enclosed.—Mr. Frederic Peel (Secretary to the Treasury) explained that what the Crown had sold was not the ownership of the lands, which it never possessed, but its right of forest therein—rights which, if it had not sold, it must, he said, have soon lost by forbearing to use them.—Mr. Locke pointed out that this was a mistake. By English law, Nullum tempus occurrit regi, and Crown rights and Crown property can legally be reclaimed after any period of practical and peaceable dispossession.—Sir G. Grey and Mr. Gladstone both spoke against the proposition, which, however, received the support of several Liberal speakers, and also of Mr. Henley, one of the most respected of the Conservative party; and after a short debate, it was carried, on a division, by 113 to 73. The House then went into committee on the Post-office Savings-banks' Bill. It is necessary that all measures relating to religion, trade, or finance, should originate in Committee, where they can receive more detailed discussion than is possible, under the rules of the House, when the Speaker is in the chair. Mr. Gladstone explained the purpose of his measure, and moved resolutions in accordance therewith. His first object was to give to Savings-banks established by private agency the power of transferring their business to the Post-office Savings-banks; his next, to facilitate the transfer of accounts standing in the names of children, which is at present under some restriction; his third, to convert the stock held by the commissioners of Savings-banks on behalf of the depositors partly into terminable annuities, and partly into stock of a lower denomination, bearing interest only at 2½ per cent. Some objections were offered to the latter part of the scheme; but the resolutions were agreed to. The Speaker resumed the chair, and immediately quitted it again; the House going into Committee on the Customs' Duties. Mr. Gladstone explained his plan for reducing the duties on tobacco. At present the enormous duties levied on cigars and manufactured tobacco (9s. per pound) give a protection to the British manufacturer who obtains his raw material with a duty of only 3s. per lb. This protection makes it impossible to import the lower sorts of manufactured tobacco, and thereby impose a loss on the revenue. It is proposed that the duty on cigars shall henceforth be 5s., on snuff 3s. 9d., and on other manufactured tobacco 4s. The duty on unmanufactured tobacco is not to be altered. Permission is to be given to manufacture cavendish or negro head in bond.—Mr. Ayrton (a business-like, ambitious, and by no means incompetent Radical; perhaps one of the best of that much despised class the "Metropolitan Members") complained that Mr. Gladstone's measure would ruin the tobacco manufacturers at home. Another, and stronger objection was urged—namely: that already the duty on the rich man's cigars is less than 50 per cent. on their value, while that on the poor man's tobacco is 500 per cent, and that the proposed change would aggravate this injustice.—Mr. Roebuck (whose own temper might perhaps be improved by a judicious use of good tobacco) sneered at smoking, and thought that neither poor nor rich ought to have such an indulgence cheapened.—Mr. Gladstone said that any reduction of the duty on unmanufactured tobacco would entail a heavy loss to the revenue; and that his present measure was not intended to relieve cigar-smokers, but to benefit the Exchequer. Resolutions embodying the proposals were then agreed to. The House adjourned at ten minutes past 7.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 16.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Earl of Derby asked the President of the Council what bills would be brought before the House before Easter. He also said that if the Secretary for Foreign Affairs were in his place, he would have asked when the papers relating to the Brazilian difficulty would be produced. In Lord Russell's absence he would not ask the Government for any expression of opinion on the subject. The documents published in Brazil gave it to be understood that Mr. Christie had acted under peremptory instruction from the Government. He hoped the Government would be able to show that was not the case. More unjustifiable proceedings had never been taken against a friendly Power, and he hoped that the Government would be able to show they disapproved of Mr. Christie's course.—Lord Granville said that a Bill would be speedily introduced for the protection of rivers from the refuse of chemical works. The Brazilian papers were in course of preparation, and would be speedily laid on the table. The House adjourned at half-past 5.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 16.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to a question from Mr. Hankey, Sir George Grey said that it was his intention to bring in a Bill to strengthen and enlarge the existing system for the protection of life and property from fire in the metropolis. In reply to Mr. Hopwood, Sir George Grey said the Government did not intend to bring in any measure relative to Church Rates.—Mr. Layard endeavoured to quiet the apprehensions of Colonel Sykes with regard to French and Russian intrigues in China. A question was asked and answered concerning postal communication with New Zealand via Panama. Notice was given of a question regarding the blockade of Charleston. In Committee over a Government Bill, enabling boards of Guardians in Ireland to recover from the putative father the cost of the support of an illegitimate child, an amusing scene took place. Sir G. C. Lewis (usually one of the best informed and most accurate of Ministers) rose to support the Bill, and began to state what he supposed the present law in Ireland to be. He was met by cries of "No, no, no," from his own side of the House, and by shouts of laughter from the Opposition. He floundered on a little longer, making one blunder after another amid interruptions of the same kind; his colleagues vainly trying to prompt him, as good-natured boys will prompt a schoolfellow in difficulties, but prompting is useless when the blunderer does not know a word of his task. Sir George proceeded to expound the object of the Bill as he conceived it, and here, again, was met with laughter, and cries of "No, no," "That's not it." Sir Robert Peel (who, as Chief Secretary for Ireland, had charge of the Bill) twitched his colleague's coat tails, and tried in vain to explain the blunder he was making. Sir George could not take the hint, but he discovered at last that he had utterly missed his way, stopped short, and sat down amidst a chorus of laughter from all sides.

Mr. Cowper (Chief Commissioner of Public Works) asked leave to bring in a Bill to complete the thoroughfare which will be formed by the embankment of the northern side of the Thames. That embankment will extend only from Westminster Bridge to Blackfriars Bridge. The further street proposed will commence on the eastern side of the wide approach to Blackfriars Bridge from the north, and pass through the city as far as the Mansion-house. The great value of property in that quarter will make the undertaking an expensive one. It will cost about £600,000, besides compensation. To meet the expense, the Government intend to propose the continuance of the metropolitan coal tax, and to give power to the Metropolitan Board of Works to borrow money on that security.

Mr. Walpole rose to order. As the measure would involve the imposition of a tax, he thought it should be first discussed in committee. The Speaker ruled that Mr. Cowper was formally in order. The tax was mentioned in the present Bill. A short discussion took place, Lord Palmerston defending the course pursued by the Government, by showing the absolute necessity of a new thoroughfare through the city.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer asked leave to bring in a Bill permitting Government to grant three months' credit to malsters for the payment of the malt duty; those availing themselves of such credit to pay interest at the rate of 4 per cent. Mr. Fuller urged that further relief was required by the malsters.—Mr. Dobson thought that the duty ought to be levied not on malt, but on beer.—Mr. Gladstone replied that the alterations proposed by these gentlemen would involve a great sacrifice of revenue, and that it would be a very expensive thing, and involve great trouble and annoyance to levy a direct tax on brewing. Leave was given, and the House adjourned at 8 o'clock.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Lord Russell gave his version of the history of the Brazilian quarrel. He stated that a wreck had taken place near the Rio Grande do Sal at the beginning of 1861. The British Consul made inquiries, and found that ten bodies were said to have been washed ashore, of which only four were forthcoming. The Consul attempted to have an inquest held which was prevented by officials with an armed force. [We may remark that this statement is utterly contrary to facts, as given both in the despatches of Mr. Christie and those of the Brazilian Government. An inquest was held, and a verdict of "Found drowned" was returned.] Rumours had been rife, that the sailors had been murdered, and a demand was made on the Brazilian Government for reparation, which received only evasive answers. Another offence on the part of the Brazilian Government was given shortly afterwards by the arrest of three officers of H.M.S. Forte, who were arrested on their return from a walk in the country, near Rio, and were detained forty-eight hours. When reparation was demanded, the Brazilian Government alleged that the officers were drunk, and had assaulted the sentinels who arrested them. Under these circumstances her Majesty's Government could do nothing but enforce reparation.—Lord Derby said that Lord Russell had taken a very inconvenient course in making an ex-parte statement before the papers were published, but that statement was not only ex-parte, but it was not a statement of the whole case. He would not enter into the question of the Forte until the papers were laid on the table; but as to the wreck, he thought the demand of our Government altogether unwarrantable, and that those who made it would have been very much surprised if, under similar circumstances, a like demand had been made upon themselves.—Lord Russell was nettled, and retorted angrily. He said that Lord Derby had been the first to make an ex-parte statement, and he quoted the case of an Austrian ship wrecked, and plundered on the coast of Ireland; when Lord Palmerston, then Foreign Secretary, though he would not admit the liability of Government, recommended that some compensation should be made.—Lord Derby said that if the Austrian Government had demanded such compensation, and backed that demand by an armed force, Lord Palmerston would have given them nothing.

The Lord Chancellor read a message from the Queen, requesting the concurrence of the House in a suitable provision for the Prince and Princess of Wales. In accordance with the usual course, Lord Granville moved, and Lord Derby seconded, an address to Her Majesty, thanking her for the message, and promising that it should be forthwith taken into consideration. The motion was of course agreed to.—The Marquis of Normanby then rose to attack the Italian policy of the Government. This noble Lord is a personal friend of the dispossessed Princes and a diplomatist of the old school of the Holy Alliance. He said that Lord Russell had within one week, offered hospitality to the Pope, and told the French Government that its occupation of Rome ought to cease. He quoted certain despatches of Lord Palmerston's, which he had received when Minister at Florence, and which were in a very different sense.—Lord Grey called him to order. The despatches in question had not been published. Lord Normanby had received them as a servant of the Crown, and had no right to quote them without the Royal permission.—Lord Normanby went on to vindicate the temporal power of the Pope, and to censure severely the tyranny of the present Italian Government.—Lord Russell said it was not his business to defend that Government. He showed, by extracts from published despatches, that he and his colleagues, had always disapproved of the French occupation of Rome, and pointed out how exceedingly bad the Papal Government is, and how anxious the Romans are to be united to the rest of Italy.—Lord Ellenborough expressed his satisfaction with the policy the Italian Government in Parliament are now pursuing. Instead of talking about Rome, they were doing their best to establish a good Government throughout Italy, and to make her strong in arms. He looked forward to the day when the Pope, restored to real independence, might exercise his authority in the Vatican, while the Parliament of free Italy should conduct its deliberations in the Capitol. The House adjourned at half-past 7.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The Liverpool Licensing Bill came up for a second reading. As the law at present stands, public-house licenses are granted or withheld at the discretion of the local magistrates, who use their power sometimes for the protection of public morality, sometimes to preserve the peace of respectable neighbourhoods. The general rule is, to refuse to license more public-houses than are supposed to be necessary for the accommodation of the locality, and to prevent the intrusion of so objectionable a trade into the streets and squares inhabited by the wealthier classes. In Liverpool, a certain faction among the magistrates, at the head of whom is Mr. Robertson Gladstone, have insisted on granting licenses whenever and wherever demanded by responsible persons; the remainder of the magistrates adhering to the usual rule. According, therefore, as one party or the other predominates on the Bench, licenses are granted with or without discrimination. The object of the Bill was to terminate this contention, by a local Act carrying out the views of Mr. Robertson Gladstone. Such an Act would be a private Bill, and as such would be read a second time, and referred to a select committee; but several of the best informed members of both parties took exceptions on this occasion, to such a course. Though the Bill was in form a private one, it was in principle, they contended, of a public character. It was certain to be made a precedent for general legislation, and to such a precedent the House ought to be pledged by the decision of a select committee. Their views prevailed: though supported by Government and by both the members for Liverpool, the Bill was defeated by 16 votes in 232.—Mr. Hodgson moved a resolution to reduce, in certain cases, the fees on private bills, and gave some striking facts to prove the injustice of the present system.—The President of the Board of Trade, however, promised to move for a select committee on the whole subject, and the resolution was withdrawn.

In answer to a question, Lord Palmerston said that the Government would not bring in a Bill to postpone commercial engagements falling due on the Prince's wedding-day, as there was no precedent for such a course.

Mr. Bentinck rose to ask the noble lord at the head of the Government whether the Government are in possession of any official information on the subject of the reported defeat by the Confederates of the blockading squadron at the mouth of Charleston River; and, if so, whether that information is of a character to raise the question of the legality of the future blockade of that port.

Lord Palmerston: Her Majesty's Government have no information with regard to this transaction, other than that which has been conveyed by the telegrams which are known to everybody. They simply state that the blockade was raised on the morning of one day, and reimposed on the succeeding day. [An hon. member: "On the same day."] The same information states the raising of the blockade and its renewal.

With regard to the application of the general law of nations to a transaction of that kind, I shall abstain from giving my opinion, because the application of that law depends so much upon the circumstances of the case (hear, hear) that until it is well known what has really happened, it would be improper in her Majesty's Government to commit themselves to any opinion as to the effect which this occurrence may have. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Roebuck repeated a question he had previously put as to the despatches received from foreign Powers relative to the Ionian Islands.—Lord Palmerston replied that there were none. Lord Palmerston read a message from the Queen similar to that addressed to the House of Lords, and proposed a reply identical in its terms to that of the peers. The accounts of the Duchy of Cornwall, whose revenues belong to the Prince, were asked for and promised, and the motion was agreed to.

Lord Palmerston moved that the House, at its rising, should adjourn until 2 o'clock on Wednesday (Ash Wednesday). Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald took this opportunity of criticising the conduct of the Government in regard to commercial treaties. They always allowed the French Government to take the initiative, and then were satisfied to obtain for the English the same concessions made to France. This was absurd, because concessions of great value to France might be utterly useless to us. This was proved by the tariff agreed on between France and Belgium, which would actually increase the duties on some of our principal manufactures. At present France was engaged in trying to negotiate a commercial treaty with Austria, and the English Government was awaiting the conclusion of that treaty before commencing negotiations. In regard to Italy, they had done still worse. He now heard that a commercial treaty with that country was about to be signed, which would simply embody the tariff conceded by Italy to France, a tariff which would be of no use to us, and this after the Board of Trade had actually drawn up, on information received from various Chambers of Commerce, the draft of such a tariff as would suit our interests. But it was not of much use for the Government to attempt to negotiate treaties of commerce while it pursued its present policy of irritation and insult towards foreign Powers.—Mr. W. E. Forster thanked Mr. Fitzgerald for bringing forward the subject, and fully supported his views in regard to the insufficiency for English interests of treaties negotiated by France. Lord Russell would do more good to political freedom by upholding the principles of free trade, than by giving gratuitous advice to foreign Powers, and we ought not to allow France to take the lead of the free trade movement out of our hands.—Mr. Layard (Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs) sneered at Mr. Fitzgerald as a late convert to the doctrines of free trade. He said that in negotiating our treaty with France we had much to offer, but having made that treaty, and acceded to all foreign countries the privileges it involved, we had now nothing to give in return for the concessions we asked. We were, therefore, obliged to wait for the action of France and make concessions made to her the ground of asking concessions to ourselves. We had used that argument with Belgium, and obtained what we asked. Italy had said that she could not negotiate a treaty whilst the French treaty was pending, because if she gave us advantages without equivalents she would be unable to obtain the equivalents she desired of France. Prussia had given a similar answer to our applications. We had been prevented, however, from concluding a satisfactory treaty with Prussia or Austria by the political difficulties existing in regard to the Zollverein. Referring to some statements made in the newspapers by Mr. Hennessey, Mr. Layard stated what had been the increase of trade in Naples and Sicily under Piedmontese rule.—Mr. Hennessey controverted these assertions in a long but inconclusive speech.—Mr. Newdegate remarked that he had always warned the House that our French Treaty would prevent our obtaining commercial concessions from other countries. It was all Mr. Cobden's fault.—Mr. Beaumont defended the Government.—Mr. Liddell said that if Mr. Gladstone had not been in such a hurry to give up the last relics of protection, we should have been in a better position with regard to commercial negotiations.—Mr. Gower said that we must convince foreign nations of the advantages of free trade, and persuade them to adopt its principles.

Mr. Disraeli vindicated Mr. Fitzgerald against the sneers of Mr. Layard. Commercial treaties on liberal terms had always been favoured by the Tory party. He had himself been bitterly censured by Mr. Cobden, before that gentleman got into parliament, for advocating them. At that time Sir R. Peel had said, "Don't you think we have heard the last of commercial treaties?" Not we; we have seen a commercial treaty negotiated by Mr. Cobden. But having adopted the principle of unrestricted free trade, and abolished the last shreds of protection, we are no longer in a position to form such treaties.

Mr. Milner Gibson commented on a supposed difference between Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Fitzgerald, the latter censuring the slowness of Government in concluding commercial treaties, and the former declaring that the time for such treaties was past. He proved, in answer to Mr. Hennessey, how rapid had been the recent development of Italian commerce.

A debate then took place on the removal of an Irish pauper from Leeds to his native country. A medical report was called for and promised.

Sir George Grey introduced a Bill for the better religious instruction of prisoners. At present ministers of religion, not belonging to the Church, can only see prisoners at the special request of the latter. The Bill provides that the justices shall have power to admit such ministers, and to pay them, without such special request.—Mr. Whalley abused the Roman Catholic religion, and opposed the Bill. The Catholics, generally, supported and commended. Leave was given to bring it in. A select committee on Private Bills was moved for and agreed to; and the House adjourned at half-past twelve.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 18.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Hadfield, one of the members for Sheffield (a gentleman who never exactly understood the force of the verbal letter of his own name, and who has no more reverence for the institutions of the realm than for the laws of grammar), moved the second reading of a bill which requires the holders of certain offices to pledge themselves by oath or affirmation not to use their official influence for the overthrow of the National Church. Mr. Newdegate (Conservative) opposed the bill, and moved that it be read a second time that day six months. The second reading was carried 74 to 63.

Lord Raynham moved the second reading of a bill for the punishment of brutal assaults on women and children, inflicting flogging on the third conviction.—Mr. Sydney (Radical) thought that such a law would only embitter domestic quarrels.—The Attorney General said that the present law worked well, and the crime was decreasing.—Mr. Bentinck defended the bill. It was rejected by 153 to 43; and the House adjourned.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Feb. 18.

At the date of our last report the cotton market had recovered from the great depression of the previous week, and closed steady at 16½ for Fair Dhollerah.

On Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, in the absence of any important news, the trade and exporters bought to a moderate extent; the sales reaching daily from 5000 to 7000 bales, with a hardening tendency. For arrival, Middling Fair Dhollerah was sold at 16d., and Dhollerahs and Omrawuttees, of the new crop to be shipped from Bombay in March and April, at 15½d.

On Monday, however, the upward tendency was checked by the Arabia's news. At Charleston the Confederates had gained another brilliant naval victory, dispersing the blockading fleet, and claiming to have raised the blockade; and though it was generally believed by business-men that European nations would not acknowledge the brief interruption of the blockade, as a "raising" requiring sixty days' notice before its resumption could take place, and in this view they were borne out by the majority of the English press, yet the bare possibility of an opening of the Port of Charleston to the trade of the world, had a depressing effect here, and with sales of 4000 bales prices were rather easier.

The business yesterday and to-day has only reached 1000 and 1500 bales, with prices almost nominal, and a large concession in price in most classes of cotton would be necessary to tempt buyers. We quote Fair Dhollerah 16½d. and Middling Orleans 21½d.

Better accounts from Calcutta are to hand, reporting a further rise in twist of 2d. per lb., and in goods 6d. to 9d. per piece; and in Manchester, symptoms of a better demand are apparent, which would result in a good healthy business, were confidence restored regarding the course of American affairs. But both there and here business is crippled, and the commercial community kept in a state of constant uncertainty and anxiety through the wide-spread feeling that the North will soon be obliged to terminate the war, and till the result of the great battles now pending in the American continent is known, we do not look for any material improvement here.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, February 17.

Although the tone of our market improved in the early part of the week, after the receipt of intelligence from America, indicating a continuance of the war, business has since relapsed into the same state as characterised it during the previous week, notwithstanding further telegrams having been received from India reporting an active trade at a further considerable advance in prices.

Export yarns, especially those suitable for India, have been firmly held, but very little business has been done in them.

German yarns have been very quiet, still we do not hear of any change in their quotations.

Home trade yarns, suitable for the Blackburn market, have been very steady all the week, but only a moderate amount of transactions has taken place in them. Bolton spinnings have been very quiet, and where sales have been effected, rather lower prices have been submitted to.

Cloth has been much neglected, especially India shirtings, which may be bought at 2s. per lb., the same price as the yarn from which they are made.

To-day our market was much affected by the Arabia's news reporting the dashing repulse of the blockading squadron from before Charleston. This and the depressed state of the Liverpool market have brought business here almost to a stand.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

We have files of Mobile papers to the 3rd of January, Charleston and Richmond papers to the 14th, and Wilmington to the 17th of that month.

At the latest-named date no senator had been elected by the Virginia Legislature to fill the vacancy created by the death of the Hon. W. B. Preston. The last vote in the House of Delegates was divided among the various candidates as follows:—Rives, 30; Allen, 28; Russell, 22; Floyd, 22. The election was then postponed. The steamer Cornubia went safely to sea from Wililmington on the 14th of January. At the same date one of the blockading vessels at that port went ashore, and was likely to prove a total wreck. On the next day, the 15th, another blockading vessel, apparently in the effort to relieve the first, ran ashore, and would probably also prove a wreck.

On the 8th of January, in consequence no doubt of the great victories which inaugurated the new year, the premium on gold at Richmond declined in a single day 20 per cent. Previous to that day the buying price was 220, and the selling price 225.

On the 3rd of January, a British man-of-war entered the port of Mobile to communicate with the British Consul there, and to receive £40,000 in gold, the interest due to English holders on the State debt of Alabama; the gold was ready for shipment, and has no doubt ere this arrived in this country.

Private letters from Mobile of the 3rd of January, state that the Honourable Q. C. Lamar, late Member of Congress from Mississippi, has been appointed by President Davis Confederate Commissioner to Russia. Captain Walker Fearn, of Mobile, Secretary to the first Confederate Commission to London, and more recently Secretary of the Commission to Madrid, accompanies him as Secretary. These gentlemen are supposed to be now on their way to Europe, and may be expected shortly to arrive in this country.

The Confederate Congress assembled on the 13th. The proceedings are thus summarized in the telegraphic despatches to the Charleston papers:—

No quorum present in the Senate. M. J. L. M. Curry, of Alabama, was elected Speaker pro tem. Mr. Perkins, of Louisiana, introduced a resolution approving of the conduct of certain citizens of Louisiana within the enemy's lines. Mr. Foote, of Tennessee, offered a series of resolutions that the South would not consent to any plan of reconstruction of the former Union, nor any armistice so long as Lincoln's proclamation remained unrevoked, nor ever consent to negotiate except upon the basis of an unconditional recognition of the Southern Confederacy; that the latter would never consent to any alliance, commercial or otherwise, with the New England States, but would be willing to negotiate with the States bordering on the Mississippi, which may be willing to stipulate and enter into a treaty, offensive and defensive, whenever a party at the North shall overthrow Lincoln and his party now in power. A resolution also offers to guarantee the North-Western States the free navigation of the Mississippi, whenever they declare their intention to withdraw from the war, and present inducements to the States west of the Rocky Mountains to withdraw from the Federal Government, &c. The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The State of South Carolina has incorporated a company to be styled the "Importing and Exporting Company of South Carolina," the purposes of which are thus described in the charter:—

Section 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, now met and sitting in General Assembly, and by the authority of the same, That William C. Bee, J. Clough Farrar, Benjamin Mordecai, E. L. Kerrison, Otis Mills, William Ravenel, D. H. Sileox, and their associates and successors, be and are hereby made a body corporate and politic in law, by the name of "The Importing and Exporting Company of South Carolina," and the said Company shall have power to export produce from this State to neutral ports, and import into this State from neutral ports, arms, munitions of war, and other commodities, and also to bring and carry mails and passengers in their vessels.

Sec. 2. The capital stock of said Company shall be $250,000 with the privilege of increasing the same to $1,000,000; provided such increase shall be agreed to by a majority in number of the stockholders.

Sec. 3. The capital stock shall be raised by subscription, in shares of $1000 each, but the said Company shall not go into operation until the said stock, to the amount of at least $200,000, has been paid in cash, and an oath or affirmation thereof shall have been made and subscribed by the President of the Company, the Treasurer, and majority of the Board of Directors, which shall be lodged and recorded in the office of the Secretary of State, and be published in two newspapers of the City of Charleston.

Sec. 4. The affairs of the Company shall be managed by a board consisting of a president and four directors, who shall be elected in such manner and for such periods as the stockholders may prescribe.

Sec. 5. The said capital stock shall be deemed personal estate, and the company may hold such personal property as may be necessary for the purposes of their business, and may, from time to time, sell and transfer the same, or any part thereof.

Sec. 6. The said company may, by its corporate name, be plaintiff or defendant in any Court of Law or Equity in this State, and may have and use a common seal, and may make such by-laws and regulations as they shall see fit, with full power to enforce the due observance thereof, upon their members; provided, said laws are not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of this State or of the Confederate States.

Sec. 7. No part of the capital stock shall, at any time, be withdrawn by, or divided among, the stockholders until all the debts and liabilities of the said corporation shall have been fully paid off and discharged.

In the Senate House, the eighteenth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, and in the eighty-seventh year of the sovereignty and independence of the State of South Carolina.

W. D. PORTER, President of the Senate.

A. P. ALDRICH, Speaker, House of Representatives.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

Lieutenant-Colonel Harry Maury, of the 32nd Alabama, was severely wounded in the late battle of Murfreesboro'. He commanded a brigade, and fell with his regimental flag in his hand.

Colonel William R. Boggs, of Augusta, Georgia, has been promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General.

Colonel George Walton, a son of one of the signers of the old Declaration of Independence, died in Petersburg, Virginia, on the 10th of June, aged 73 years. He was formerly Territorial Governor of Florida, and later in life the Mayor of Mobile. He was the father of the well known Madame Octavia Walton Levery.

Ex-Governor Branch, of North Carolina, died at Enfield, N.C., on the 4th ult., in the 88th year of his age. He was Secretary of the Navy under General Jackson's Administration.

The late Governor Jackson, of Missouri, will be succeeded in his office by Lieutenant-Governor Reynolds, a well-known and uncompromising Secessionist.

Captain George H. Shorter, of the Montgomery Advertiser, participated in the battle of Murfreesboro', and was wounded painfully, but not dangerously, in the arm.

It is reported that Captain Benjamin C. Yancey, son of Hon. W. L. Yancey, fell in the late battle at Murfreesboro', while gallantly leading his company. It was feared that he was mortally wounded.

Major General Simon B. Buckner, the accomplished gentleman and chivalric soldier, has been assigned to the command at Mobile, and while we write is hourly expected to arrive. His history gives him a passport to a most cordial reception by the community he is appointed to defend.—Mobile Register.

Brigadier General Wm. N. Pendleton, the Chief of Artillery in the armies of General Lee in Virginia, is an Episcopal minister. He, like General Polk, was a graduate at West Point, and became a minister, but divested himself of the surplice in the beginning of this war, and, as captain of artillery, distinguished himself at the first battle of Manassas. Step by step he has risen to the highest position in the artillery service of the Confederacy.

Private letters state that Colonel Lithgoc, of the 19th South Carolina Volunteers, and Captain Nettles of the 10th South Carolina Regiment, were killed at the battle of Murfreesboro'; Captain A. H. Ford, Lieut. C. T. Ford, and Lieut. Easterling, 10th South Carolina Regiment, were wounded.

Foreign Correspondence.

PARIS, February 17th.

The news of the last during exploit of the Confederates, beating the Federals on their own element, has produced a great sensation here, it has greatly discouraged the friends of the North, who in the teeth of such constant defeats on land, at sea, and even in political contests, have much to do to show contre fortune bon cœur.

There is no contending against facts, and the conviction is forcing itself upon their reluctant minds, that the North is growing daily less and less able to hold its own. The discouragement of the Northerners in Paris is obvious. They are gradually withdrawing from all the places of public resort they used to frequent. That favourite haunt of theirs, the coffee and billiard room of the grand hotel, they have deserted en masse—and the loud boastful talk of the ability of the Unionists to "whip" their gallant opponents, has given place to chagrined looks, subdued whispers, and a general disinclination to converse on American affairs with foreigners' but especially with Englishmen. These last victories have, I need hardly tell you, been joyfully received by English society in Paris, and the gallantry and heroism of Semmes, and the daring sally, out of Charleston Harbour, have, if possible, increased the feeling which Englishmen have, with a few exceptions, from the first entertained, in favour of the Southerners, and against their opponents. In the French official world the effect has been very great—M. Drouyn de Lhuys's despatches, published in the yellow book, have already told us the view entertained by the French Government of the hopeless attempt of the North to subdue those whom, being unable to cope with by flood or field, they find some consolation in describing as "rebels." Since these despatches were published, Confederate gallantry has afforded the Cabinet of the Tuileries additional proofs of the validity of their claim to be considered independent; and it would indeed be difficult to adduce stronger arguments of the ability of the South to keep its soil clear of the invaders than the battles of Fredericksburg, Vicksburg, Galveston, and Charleston. The naval power of any country too, cannot be reckoned merely by the number of ships it may commission. One might as well take hackney-coach and post-horses into account in giving an estimate of any country's cavalry; the power of injuring an enemy is the real test of the efficiency of a naval armament—and judged by such a standard, such ships as the Alabama, the Oreto, the gunboat flotillas that have done such good service at Galveston and Charleston, are surely a match for the numerous fleets which the North keeps up apparently to show the world that there are no odds that can withstand the dash and skill of the Southern Confederacy.

There is every reason to believe that these considerations will be duly weighed and appreciated by M. Drouyn de Lhuys, and cannot, at all events, fail to hasten the decision which it is currently believed the French Government have long since arrived at.

According to a very generally prevalent report, an important communication, in relation to American affairs, will shortly appear in the Moniteur.

The past week in Paris has been singularly brilliant. Fancy balls at the Tuileries, at the various ministries at the Austrian Embassy, have kept the gay world in a perfect whirl of excitement, and the ingenuity of newspaper readers has been rather severely taxed to realize the appearance of the ladies in the costumes which the feuilletonistes of the Paris papers describe, with great enthusiasm, but not much clearness. The lady of one of the ministers, for instance, is thus described:—

Here is the costume worn at Court by Madame de —. The lower part of the skirt represented coal not yet inflamed. About the waist, on the contrary, the conflagration is represented by a mass of glowing embers; and flames rising from the shoulders seem to rise heavenwards in columns of fire. The head-dress represented a funeral pile; amidst the flames you might distinguish the wing of a half-consumed bird, and a snake in ruby and diamonds writhing amid the glowing coal.

This is a fine specimen of the sublime applied to the ridiculous. Another lady is described in the same style as representing the "bois de Boulogne," trees, fields, birds, rivers, lakes, and a fashionable promenade, all being represented in her dress. The most successful costume, however, appears to have been that of the Countess Castiglione, which was got up on strictly classical principles, and represented that agreeable deshabille which was considered full dress under the Cæsars.

In addition we have had the yearly procession of the "Bœuf Gras," which, though favoured by delightful weather, appears to have lost its attraction for the great unwashed; and a great gambling scandal, which has led to the resignation of the manager of the Italian Opera, and is likely to terminate in an unpleasant exposure before the correctional police. Marked cards are talked of, huge sums lost and won, and several demi monde celebrities are mixed up in the affair.

SOUTHERN RELIEF FUND OF EUROPE.

AN APPEAL TO SOUTHERNERS IN BEHALF OF THE SOUTHERN PRISONERS OF WAR NOW IN NORTHERN PRISONS.

(From a Committee of the Southern Club at Liverpool.)
Citizens of the Southern States' Confederacy, now resident in Great Britain.—

We appeal in behalf of our fellow-countrymen now languishing in the fortresses, gaols, and dungeons of the Northern States.

We ask your sympathy for the unfortunate prisoners of war—sick and suffering—perhaps wounded, or dying—with no wife, mother, sister, or loving friend to respond to his feeble call, to whisper words of hope, and consolation in his ear, to wipe the sweat from his fevered brow, to lift the cooling draught to his parched lips, to anticipate the numberless gentle attentions which the hands and hearts of those whom we love are every ready and eager to tender when sickness or sorrow overtake us among our kindred, or in our own homes.

We appeal in behalf of men guilty of no crime—of no fault, unless it be a fault to love one's country too well, and in her hour of peril, when her liberties are threatened and her cherished soil ruthlessly invaded, to rush with eager and emulous zeal to her defence; to forsake everything—home, wife, children, friends, all that man holds most dear, and to face hardships and danger, to risk liberty, wounds, and death itself, for one's country's sake.

Citizens of the South in Great Britain! Every mail from America that reaches these shores brings us tidings that thousands of our hapless countrymen are thus suffering. Words of kindness and encouragement, messages of tender sympathy, or the material aid they so sorely need, they can rarely receive from their sorrowing, and scarcely less suffering friends in the South. They know that they have the heartfelt prayers, the best and kindest wishes, of these loving and beloved friends. Alas! they can have nothing more. An impassable barrier lies between them and the land they love so well. Fire and sword have made the pathway desolate, and the border-land of our beloved, and once happy, prosperous, smiling, sunny South is soaked with the life-blood of thousands of her gallant defenders.

But we, fellow-Southerners, we, exiles, as we may truly call ourselves, whose hearts are still with the South, in whose fortunes for good or for ill we rejoice or lament; for whom every pulse throbs as warmly, and, oh! far more keenly, than in the days of her prosperity: we, thank God! have it in our power to do that which is unfortunately denied to our countrymen at home. We can whisper to the captives words of hope and encouragement; we can assure them that though absent in body, our hearts are with them, and with the cause for which they are suffering; we can bid them not to give way to despair, for we truly, earnestly, from our very hearts and souls, believe that a bright day will yet dawn for them and for our country, and that, purified by the furnace of affliction through which she is passing, she will come forth brighter, more resplendent, than ever.

And more than this; we can send them the material aid they so bitterly need, not, perhaps, to the extent we would most gladly do; but at least to an extent sufficient to relieve their more urgent necessities.

And this we may do without subterfuge; there is no need of concealment. The Federal Government at Washington has, through the Secretary of State, given permission for all sums transmitted through the Southern Fund in Great Britain to be distributed among Southern prisoners of war. And competent and most willing friends in the North will visit the prisons, and, in the name of the donors, bestow the free gifts of generous sympathy to those of our suffering brothers who stand most in need of such aid.

We ask no dole of charity. The donations will neither be given nor received as such. They are but the dues from us to those of our countrymen who, by the fortune of war, are situated as we might have been situated, as some of our best and dearest friends may be; and we feel assured that when the facts we have stated are fully known there will be no lack of sympathy from warm Southern hearts, nor from those who can sympathize with all unmerited suffering, who or whatever the sufferers may be.

There are many among us who have already done much. There are many—who happily can afford it—who could do much more, were they satisfied, as they may be now, that their donations will be promptly applied to the intended purpose, without any opposition from the Northern Government.

Numerous letters have been received from the North, written by those who sympathize with, and have visited, the prisoners of war in their dungeons, and have experienced the pleasure of bestowing these brothers' gifts to suffering brothers.

These letters it is painfully affecting to read. The writers speak sometimes of the despondency, sometimes of the hope which still lingers and cheers the heart of the captive. They speak of the delight with which the news is received of the still firm and defiant attitude of their beloved South, and of its strong abiding faith in the midst of all its sore trials; for the poor captive, shut up in his prison, knows little of what is going on in the outer world, or, at least, hears only the story his gaolers choose to tell. They tell how the dim eye brightened, how the compressed lips parted with a hopeful smile, how the pale face flushed, and the despairing voice took a more cheerful tone, as the weary captive listened to the cheering messages sent him from across the broad Atlantic, and how his heart leaped with joy, and his worn, attenuated frame seemed to gather fresh strength, when the material aid—in many instances so sorely needed that, if the truth were told, it would seem scarcely credible—satisfied him that the sympathy of his countrymen, so warmly expressed, did not evaporate in mere words.

We have all read in the newspapers the heartrending accounts of the destitute condition of many of the Southern captives in Northern gaols. We have seen them, pictured in our mind's eye, wan and attenuated with protracted hardship and fatigue, pale and suffering from sickness, or from wounds received on the battle-field, sorrowful and dejected through that "hope deferred which maketh the heart sick;" their clothing worn and threadbare, often in rags—the result of long and hard service—and frequently quite insufficient to protect the wearer from the inclemency of the cold Northern winter; yet, amid all, bearing themselves, to outward appearance, with a manly fortitude which has commanded respect and admiration, even from the foe. But none, save those who have been eye-witnesses of the sad scene of a troop of Southern prisoners of war being conducted to gaol by a Northern guard, can form any correct idea of their often destitute condition, or of the hardship and sufferings which have brought such men to such a state of destitution, their pallid faces and bandaged limbs too frequently bearing sad testimony of their valour in the fight, and of the sufferings they have endured.

One who joins in this appeal has been an eye-witness of such scenes as this, and has stood side by side with the Southern soldier in the battle's front, and he can therefore speak from what he has seen.

Who and what are these men in whose behalf this appeal is made?

Many of them are of the noblest, the best, and bravest of the land!

It adds nor detracts nothing to or from the courage and patriotism of the soldier whether he be of gentle, or plebeian birth, rich or poor, educated or illiterate; but it proves beyond cavil, the generous self-sacrifice which has dictated the common feeling of devotion to their country, that has actuated the entire Southern people, when we find in her army men of birth, wealth, position, and influence, doing duty as privates; submitting patiently and cheerfully to discipline, fighting fearlessly in the ranks, willingly bearing their full share of the privations and hardships of a soldier's life—privations and hardships they might have avoided, had they been recreant to their duty in the day of trial—and sharing with their more humble fellow-citizens, so long as they last, the little comforts and luxuries they might retain for their own exclusive use.

Many of this class are to be found among the prisoners of war in whose behalf this appeal is made. Men who, heretofore, have known neither hardship nor want, whose social position, but a short time since, seemed to place them beyond the possibility of such reverses, are now, through the cruel fortune of war, suffering from the lack of proper food and clothing. Gentlemen of fortune and education, who lately had hosts of servants at command, and a superabundance of this world's goods, are now—as we know for a fact—without a change of clothing, except that which is supplied by the cold hand of charity, without any of those mental and social requirements of refined life which to them are absolute necessities, and without the means of procuring them, and, perhaps harder to bear than all, without any means, except by rare chance, of hearing of the welfare of their wives and families and all they hold dear. These latter may be living or dead, suffering from sickness, perhaps from poverty, in such localities of the South as are held by Northern troops; and captive husbands and fathers cannot hear from them, or write to them—cannot help them! They rarely see the face, or hear the voice of a friend; never but with the sad consciousness, to embitter the joy of meeting, that that friend has come to join them in their dreary captivity!

Shall such things be, while it is in our power to alleviate, however slightly, the sufferings of our gallant, but unfortunate, compatriots? We cannot do all we would; we cannot release them from bondage; we cannot reunite them to their families; but we can do something towards rendering their bondage lighter and more easy to endure. We can relieve the care and anxiety of their families and friends by letting these latter know that their fathers, and husbands, and sons, and friends, are the objects of our sympathy. We can transmit to them, from their countrymen in Great Britain, assurances of our brotherly feeling and affection—of our devoted attachment—exiles though we be at present—to our suffering country's cause; and we feel assured that an unanimous response to our appeal will come from every Southern heart, in the form of such pecuniary aid as each can afford to bestow.

Bis dat qui cito dat—"He gives twice who gives quickly"—is an adage which especially applies to the present case.

Let us not only do our utmost to relieve the sufferings of our countrymen in bondage in the Northern States, but let us do this promptly. We hope and trust that the dawn of a happier day is at hand. The South longs for peace as "the hart thirsteth for the living waters." War was unhappily forced upon her. Her people would willingly submit to anything but dishonour. That they can never submit to. An united South simply demands the independence it claims as a right, according to the Constitution of the several States of the Confederacy, guaranteed to them by their fathers.

Forced into a war to defend their native soil, their natural liberties, and their institutions, they are now resolved—let the cost be what it may—to govern themselves in the future.

They may yet have to pass through many bitter trials before the shrill clarion of war shall give place to the gentle voice of peace; but a silver lining already appears on the edges of the dark cloud which has so long overshadowed our beloved country. Let us hope it is the harbinger of that peace—with unsullied honour—we all sigh for so ardently. Then the exile may return to his native land; the captive to his home in the bosom of his family; and then in those happy days to come, when friend meets friend, and brother grasps the hand of brother, each on his native soil, let there be not one among us who shall be unable to say that, in the hour of his country's need, he, though an exile in a stranger land, did all that lay in his power to aid her, with a cheerful heart and liberal hand.

Bis dat qui cito dat. Let us adopt this motto, and the giver and the receiver will alike be blessed.

THE SOUTHERN CLUB.

55, Brown's Buildings, Liverpool.—February, 1863.

[We are authorized to state, that all donations to the "Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund" will be received and distributed by the Southern Club at Liverpool, which has already in operation a well organized system for the distribution of the relief among the Southern prisoners in the various Northern cities. Communications on this subject should be addressed to the Treasurer, J. H. Ashbridge, Esq., Southern Club, 55, Brown's Buildings, Liverpool.]

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

OUR friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Boulevard-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

Agency at Liverpool: WM. KNOX, Secretary Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings.

The Blockade Raised.

(Phillimore on "International Law," Vol. iii., p. 386.)

CCXCIV.—4. What maintains or continues a Blockade.

A Blockade is to be considered as legally existing, although the winds occasionally blow off the invading squadron. It effects an incidental change to which every Blockade is incident; but it does not suspend, much less break, the Blockade. It is most satisfactory to be able to state, that upon this, as indeed upon every other point of Blockade, the decisions of the Courts of the North American United States are in perfect harmony.

But this principle is not extended to the case of a blockading squadron driven off by a superior force; under such circumstances, a neutral Power is not obliged to presume the continuance of a Blockade, nor to act upon a supposition that the Blockade would be resumed by any other competent force.*

The Neutral is not bound to foresee or to conjecture that the Blockade will be resumed; and therefore if it is to be renewed, it must proceed de novo by the usual course, and without reference to the former state of facts by which it has been so effectually interrupted†; and the presumption, if the fact be dubious as to the resumption of such blockade, is in favour of the Neutral.‡

‡ The Triheten, 6 Rob., p. 67.

(The same, Vol. iii., p. 389.)

CCXCVI. 6. How a Blockade, having been discontinued or abandoned, may be resumed.

When a Blockade has been raised by the appearance of a superior force, there is an entire defeasance of that Blockade and of its operation. It must be renewed by notification, before foreign nations can be affected with an obligation of observing it as a blockade of that species still existing. The mere appearance of another squadron is not sufficient for that purpose, but the same measures are necessary to constitute a recommencement as were required for the original imposition of the Blockade; foreign merchants are not bound to act upon any presumption that a Blockade of which there has been such a defeasance will be de facto resumed.*

* The Hoffnung, 6 Rob. p. 120.

(Wheaton on "International Law," p. 582.)

Where it was suggested that the blockading squadron had actually returned to its former station off the port, in order to renew the blockade, a question arose whether there had been that notoriety of the fact, arising from the operation of time, or other circumstances, which must be taken to have brought the existence of the blockade to the knowledge of the parties. Among other modes of resolving this question, a prevailing consideration would have been the length of time, in proportion to the distance of the country from which the vessel sailed. But as nothing more came out in evidence than that the squadron came off the port on a certain day, it was held that this would not restore a blockade which had been thus effectually raised, but that it must be renewed again by notification, before foreign nations could be affected with an obligation to observe it. The squadron might return off the port with different intentions. It might arrive there as a fleet of observation merely, or for the purpose of only a qualified blockade. On the other hand, the commander might attempt to connect the two blockades together; but this is what could not be done; and, in order to revive the former blockade, the same form of communication must have been observed de novo that is necessary to establish an original blockade.

(The same, p. 578.)

Where the country (from which the vessel sails) lies at such a distance that the inhabitants cannot have this constant information, (of the state of the blockade, whether it is continued or relaxed) they may lawfully send their vessels conjecturally, upon the expectation of finding the blockade broken up, after it has existed for a considerable time. In this case, the party has a right to make a fair inquiry whether the blockade be determined or not, and consequently cannot be involved in the penalties affixed to a violation of it, unless upon such inquiry, he receives notice of the existence of the blockade.

(Robinson's "Admiralty Reports," Vol. i., p. 332. The "Betsey.")

18th Article of the Treaty of 1794, between Great Britain and the United States.

Whereas, it frequently happens that vessels sail for a port or place belonging to an enemy, without knowing that the same is either besieged, blockaded, or invested, it is agreed that every vessel so circumstanced may be turned away from such port or place; but she shall not be detained, nor her cargo, if not contraband, be confiscated, unless, after notice, she shall attempt to enter; but she shall be permitted to go to any other port or place she may think proper.

The above citations from the highest authorities on international law in Great Britain and the United States clear up beyond all dispute, or the possibility of arbitrary construction, at least one point in the intricate and contested law of Blockades. When a blockading squadron is driven off by a superior force, the Blockade of the port from which it is so driven off is raised. The squadron may return and again blockade the same port, but the Blockade will be a new one which has no "reference to the former state of facts by which it has been so effectually interrupted." This "effectual interruption," viz., the driving off of the blockading squadron, is, in the theory and practice of the law, what writers on Metaphysics term "a solution of continuity." The new Blockade may be enforced a day or an hour afterwards—the authorities state no definite time—but if so enforced, it can only be as a de facto Blockade, warning off, not capturing, the vessels that may attempt to enter. The Neutral is not obliged, says Judge Phillimore expressly, "to presume the continuance of the Blockade, nor to act upon a supposition that the Blockade would be resumed." Again he says: "The presumption, if the fact be dubious, as to the resumption of the Blockade is in favour of the Neutral," and "the Neutral is not bound to foresee or to conjecture that the Blockade will be resumed." In absence, therefore, of any formal notification of the resumption of the Blockade, neutral vessels may rightfully sail for the port from which the blockading force had been driven off, and if they carry no contraband of war, are free to return or sail for any other port, should, on arrival, they find access prevented by the existence of a de facto Blockade. They would be liable to capture only in the case that having actually been refused access, the neutral vessels should renew the attempt, as the entering of the refusal upon the register would be conclusive evidence of that special notice having been given to which, in absence of any general and formal notification, all authorities concur that the Neutral is entitled.

It is the dictate of humanity and common sense, as well as a maxim of international law, that belligerent rights should always be construed, in any case of doubt, in favour of Neutrals, since it is not only desirable to mitigate so far as possible the unavoidable evils of war, but to protect more especially those who are innocent of the quarrel from unnecessarily suffering by those evils. The onus of proof for the lawful exercise of any belligerent right, vexatious and injurious to Neutrals, rests, therefore, always upon the belligerent who exercises it. The right of Blockade is of all the belligerent rights that which is most vexatious and injurious to Neutrals; and hence its exercise has been, by the common consent of nations, subjected to particularly rigid regulations and limitations. The reliance of this country upon the naval arm of defence and offence has ever inclined the policy of the British Government to a more lax construction of these regulations and limitation than most other Governments less secure in their maritime strength. But on this point of the "defeasance of a Blockade by the appearance of a superior force," the greatest living English authority speaks in terms, if possible, even more distinct and emphatic than any foreign writer on international law. His reiterated assertions leave no room for the quibbles of a special pleader, and we must either assume it to be the British exposition of international law and usage, or reject altogether the authority of the Crown's principal legal advisers on subjects of this nature.

Let us now apply these ascertained principles of the law of Blockades to the remarkable events which have recently transpired in America. On the 1st of January, an attack was made upon the Federal fleet in the harbour of Galveston, Texas, which resulted in the destruction of one vessel of war, the capture of another, as well as two transports, and the dispersion of the remainder of the fleet, which sought safety in flight, and is reported to have taken refuge at New Orleans. Thereupon the successful commander issued his proclamation declaring the Blockade of the port of Galveston raised, and inviting the commerce of Neutrals to the said port. On the 31st of January, an attack was made upon the blockading squadron before the port of Charleston, South Carolina, which resulted in the sinking of two vessels of war, the burning of four more, and the disabling of a seventh that managed to escape, though with serious injury. As in the former instance, the remainder of the blockading fleet sought safety in flight, and it is alleged that after the conclusion of the engagement, from a point five miles beyond the usual anchorage of the blockading fleet, no trace of the hostile vessels could be discovered. The naval and military commanders at the port of Charleston thereupon proclaimed that "the Confederate fleet had attacked the blockading squadron off Charleston, and sunk, dispersed, or driven off and out of sight for the time the entire hostile fleet, and declared the Blockade of Charleston by the United States raised by the superior force of the Confederates from and after the 31st of January." An official announcement to the same effect was issued and communicated to the foreign Consuls by the Confederate Government.

It is absurd to deny that a Blockade is "effectually interrupted," to use Judge Phillimore's expression, when the blockading force is driven out of sight, with the actual loss of one-half the vessels composing it. This effectual interruption of the Blockade of Galveston and Charleston respectively is, according to the highest English authority, "an entire defeasance of that Blockade and of its operation. It must be renewed by notification before foreign nations can be affected with an obligation of observing it as a Blockade of that species still existing." The newspapers inform us that another squadron has appeared before each of these ports; but Judge Phillimore distinctly says, that "the mere appearance of another squadron is not sufficient for this purpose (that of notification), but that the same measures are necessary to constitute a recommencement as were required for the original imposition of the Blockade." That squadron might have appeared, to use the words of the great American authority, Mr. Wheaton, "with different intentions. It might have arrived there as a fleet of observation merely, or for the purpose of only a qualified Blockade. On the other hand, the commander might attempt to connect the two blockades together; but this is what could not be done, and in order to revive the former Blockade, the same form of communication must have been observed de novo that is necessary to establish an original Blockade."

We shall be curious to hear how the inferences can be controverted which we deduce from these facts, and which are—1st, that any vessel not carrying contraband of war may sail from any neutral port to the ports of Charleston and Galveston, and cannot be lawfully interrupted on her voyage thither. 2nd, that finding a de facto Blockade established at either of the said ports, she may be warned off, and the warning entered on her register, making her liable to seizure upon a subsequent attempt at the same port; and 3rd, that if she succeed in entering either port without molestation, she cannot be prevented in her right of egress on her return voyage.

The Latest Aspect of the War.

It was said of Napoleon III. in the Italian war, Il fait la guerre en conspirateur. The remark was the involuntary homage paid to military success. The present ruler of France, like his uncle, knew the value of secrecy and rapidity in operations against an enemy: and it was to these two causes that he mainly owed his triumph over the Austrians. The South makes war in the same fashion. Its most successful actions have been the result of movements of which the Federals have known nothing until their outposts have been driven in. From the first the history of the American campaigns in the Southern war has been a series of brilliant enterprises, against which the superior numbers and matériel of Northern armies have availed nothing; and it seems that to the end the respective characteristics of the belligerent forces are likely to be maintained; that we shall continue to see on the Southern side all the dashing enterprise, rapid motion, and quick resolve which lead to victory; on the other, the caution, the tardiness, the irresolution which necessitate defeat. By this week's mail from New York we have the intelligence of another of those daring exploits which have done so much to win the sympathy of England for the Confederate cause. On the 31st ult. a Federal squadron of thirteen vessels, two of them first-class frigates, was blockading Charleston. Before daybreak a Confederate flotilla, consisting of two iron-clad and three small steamers, steamed boldly out to attack the blockading force. An engagement ensued, which seems to have lasted several hours, and at the close of which two Federal gunboats or corvettes were sunk, the Quaker City, a powerful paddle-wheel steamer, was disabled, and four other Federal vessels, probably transports, were set on fire, whilst the rest of the squadron found safety in flight. The Confederate flotilla returned to Charleston Harbour amidst the enthusiastic cheers of the population, and General Beauregard at once announced the blockade at an end, with the sanction, it is said, of the European Consuls. The detailed reports of this gallant enterprise can scarcely diminish its importance from a political point of view, and certainly, they cannot affect its character as a bold and successful operation; and although there has been no lack of similar acts on the Confederate side, it may be doubted if any event of the war has been more calculated to depress the North and convince it of the utter hopelessness of the struggle into which the recklessness of its leading men has plunged it. It is plain now, that a new phase of the contest is opening up, and that the Confederate navy, which has hitherto played so small a part, will shortly take its place in the line of battle. The brief but brilliant success of the Virginia and the Arkansas, showed what the sailors of the Confederacy were capable of. In the navy, as in the army of the United States, the gentlemen of the South were "to the fore." If ships can be provided, officers and crews will readily be found, and as it seems that the Federals are now doing their best to supply the deficiency of the South in the former respect, we may expect to see the Confederate navy in a month or two assuming very menacing proportions. Already the Confederacy has the Alabama, the Florida, the Harriet Lane, the Retribution, at sea. A Federal gunboat of eleven guns has been captured on the Stono River, in the vicinity of Charleston. The force at the latter port is already powerful and being increased. At Mobile and Savannah there are more iron-clads completed, or in course of construction. The Federal blockading squadrons are composed, for the most part, of notoriously ill constructed and weak vessels. It is quite within the range of probability that, whilst the attention of the North is concentrated upon the enormous force collected at Beaufort for the reduction of Charleston, the Alabama and her fellows may look up the blockading ships at Mobile or Galveston, and astonish the Yankees by another naval victory.

The action of Charleston seems to have decided the question of an immediate attack upon that "doomed City," as the New York Press has, for many months, designated the capital of South Carolina. The Federal iron clads, on which so much reliance has been placed, were off the port. The great fleet of transports which has for weeks crowded the waters of Beaufort and Port Royal was reported to be on its way thither. The strength of the Palmetto City, and the resolution of its inhabitants, were at length to be fairly tested. We have no fear of the result. Since the fall of Fort Sumter scarcely a day has passed but that the work of fortifying this important post has been proceeding under the personal direction of Generals Lee and Beauregard. Every available site has been covered with batteries mounted with heavy guns, and protected with a perfect network of redoubts and fosses. At the entrance to the harbour on the north, lies Fort Moultrie. Protecting this fort, and protected in its turn by the guns of Fort Moultrie, is Fort Sumter, strengthened with all the resources at the command of the Confederate engineers, and mounting guns of the largest calibre en barbette. Both these forts are covered by batteries on the adjacent islands, which can only be taken by an overwhelming military force; higher up, Castle Pinckney and Fort Johnson show new batteries to the attacking force: and all along the river, wherever a gun can be trained, the Federal flotilla will have to run the gauntlet of a concentrated fire from the heaviest artillery. The land defences of Charleston are even more formidable. Nature has given her a series of almost impenetrable lines in the sluggish and swollen rivers that envelope her in their sinuous folds, and the broad tracks of marsh and swamp which stretch away from river to river. The loss of the Federal gunboat on the Stono River shows the perils of this inland navigation, and the natural facilities afforded for resistance. When it is borne in mind, that these advantages have been improved to the utmost, and that Beauregard, an officer of acknowledged engineering skill, is in command, it becomes obvious that the Federals, in attacking Charleston, have entered upon an enterprise, to which the forces at present at their disposal are clearly inadequate. It is yet possible, however, that Charleston may not be the point of attack, and that Savannah or Wilmington may be selected as the first object of the expedition starting from Beaufort. But in this case, we must suppose a division of the Federal forces, which will materially reduce the chances of success, as well as a dangerous opportunity offered to the Confederate navy to make a new Charleston harbour coup. On the whole, we are inclined to believe that the North will strike at Charleston. The Northern mob is intensely bitter against the city which first hoisted the flag of secession; and the Northern war Administration is too apt to subordinate its operations to mob dictation. The Federal armies have so invariably met with disaster of late that, if the war is to continue, an immediate and decisive blow is necessary. The Cleons of New York must have their Sphacteria. In all probability Charleston will teach them the lesson which was taught to their swaggering Athenian prototype twenty centuries ago, without even the transient gleam of success which attended his earliest efforts.

In the South and South-west the combatants are on the eve of a new conflict for the mastery of the Mississippi. Grant and McClelland, with an army of 80,000 men, and Porter's flotilla of gunboats and transports, are waiting for the completion of the canal opposite Vicksburg, to renew the attack which has twice signally failed. Banks is concentrating his forces at Baton Rouge, preparatory to his attempt to force the passage at Port Hudson. At both points the Confederates are confident of repelling the enemy. What the numbers of the Confederate forces are on the Mississippi we cannot tell. The South knows the value of secrecy. But, as President Davis long ago declared that the fortunes of the Confederacy depended on the retention of this line, it is not likely such strong and important positions have been weakly garrisoned. The defences of Vicksburg, extending some miles inland, and along the river, require a considerable force. Port Hudson is more likely to fall to land attack than by bombardment. We may rely upon it that on the day of assault the Federals will be, if not outnumbered, fairly matched, the advantage of position being taken into consideration; and that unless the Father of Waters can be induced to change its course, the bisection of the Confederacy will not be effected this season. But pending the issue of the conflict on the Mississippi, the Confederates are by no means idle. A forward movement has already been made by the Southern forces in the State of Mississippi, and Generals Van Dorn and Price are reported to have once more captured Holly Springs. The Northern papers represent them as at the head of 50,000 men. This is probably an exaggeration, but it is evident that the transfer of Grant's forces to the neighbourhood of Vicksburg will leave Memphis at the mercy of the Confederates, if they are in sufficient force to risk another attack; and that the prospect of the recapture of Memphis, or even of its assault, will have the effect of greatly increasing the difficulties of General Grant's position at Vicksburg. Of General Longstreet's movements we have nothing new; nothing of General Rosecrans; but if reinforcements from Virginia have reached the Confederate army in Tennessee, there seems to be nothing left to Rosecrans but to strike a blow at once, or retire upon Nashville. The Confederates are swarming on his lines of communication with the Western States. Fort Donelson itself is attacked, Cumberland River is almost closed by Confederate batteries planted along the banks at every bend of the river; and as this is the sole channel by which he can obtain reinforcements and supplies, a retrograde movement seems inevitable. All this time the Army of the Potomac is lying idle, every day adding to its demoralization. The accounts of the latest Federal movement north of the Rappahannock show a feeling of discontent and a want of confidence, which, even if the country were in a better condition for active operations, would effectually bar General Hooker's fighting propensities. In fact, nothing could serve the Confederate cause better than another advance across the Rappahannock by this great army, which is far more formidable to the South by its mere vis inertiae than it would be on the field of battle. In another part of Virginia the same discontent which pervades the Army of the Potomac has exhibited itself in the very heat of an engagement. In a recent battle near Suffolk a whole Pennsylvania regiment, including officers, laid down its arms and refused to fight; the excuse being that they were "drafted." When such things happen, the issue of this war, unpopular from the first, but a thousand times more abhorred and censured now that its history is written in the sacrifice of half a million of lives, and in the lasting disgrace and humiliation of the United States, cannot be considered undecided.

The Confederate States' Commissioner and the "Times."

The Vicar of Bray was essentially a representative man. We all are acquainted with many highly respectable people who prate about their morality, and are perpetually returning thanks in public that they are so much better than their neighbours, yet who never permit qualms of conscience to jeopardize the retention of their snug places, or suffer principles to interfere with their pockets. But this policy of toadying to the powers that be is narrow and contemptible compared to the comprehensive strategy of the Times. Our contemporary is all things to all men. It not only shouts with the largest crowd, according to the Pickwickian philosophy, but with a skill and daring that command admiration, it shouts simultaneously with opposite and contending crowds. It is everybody's Times. It is blue, yellow, and every colour and shade of colour. Still, it is unfair to charge our contemporary with being inconsistent. It would be inconsistent if it so far belied its nature and history as not to represent the contradictory opinions of hostile parties. Even in religious questions it does this. At one time it is as fiercely Protestant as Dr. Cumming or Lord Russell's "Durham Letter," at another it gives Romanism a patronising pat on the back. To-day it comes out with an article that pleases the anti-Bible professors of Christianity and disgusts the Evangelicals; and tomorrow it publishes a leader that might have been dictated by the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, or Mr. Spurgeon. Actors sometimes, as in the "Corsican Brothers," play two parts in a piece, but the Times can play any number of parts in the same piece—it does, in fact, assume all the parts of the drama of social life and politics. Yet we do not mean to say that our contemporary is unreliable as an indicator of public opinion. Like the weather-cock, it is always shifting about, but nevertheless, if closely watched, shows from which quarter the wind blows. The American war is an example. When secession took place, the South, owing to Yankee misrepresentation, was a terra incognita to Europe, or, what was worse, the European idea of the South was thoroughly false. In this country more particularly, there was strong and general sympathy with the North, and the Times, guided by this, and implicitly relying on the promise of Mr. Seward to put down the “rebellion” in sixty days, was ultra-Northern. The war, though it blockaded the Southern ports, taught us the truth about the South by exposing the Federal shams, and the rottenness of the Federal cause; and by simultaneously revealing to Europe the strength, riches, patriotism, and moral grandeur of the Confederate States. English sympathy veered round, and so did the Times. In the columns of our contemporary have appeared, and still are appearing, the most withering denunciations of the North, and the most unstinted praises of the South. But there is in this country a heterogeneous clique, consisting of a few third-rate politicians and fourth-rate statesmen—we do not refer to the so-called “Emancipation Society,” with its infidel lecturers, and “reverends” who prostitute religion by using it as a cloak for their political partisanship, who call the Lincoln despotism a free Government, and repeat, with charming unctiousness, the tales of “the German Saven” about the Southerners burning their houses in order to roast the negroes, and some other equally veracious stories, invented to gratify the craving of female “emancipationists” for talk spiced with indecent innuendoes, or, as the fair creatures would designate it, sensational and suggestive naughtiness—but we refer to the respectable clique of pro-Northerners which the Times has to conciliate, and does so by an occasional smart Northern article; but it is careful not to do this so often as to deceive its readers as to which is the right side. The Times is, by duty and interest, thoroughly with the South, but it occasionally flings a bone to the lean, clamorous, and ravenous North.

It did so on Friday last, when it tried, and we submit signally failed, to sneer at Mr. Mason. Our clever contemporary made a twofold blunder. It did not select a fitting opportunity, and the article itself was not skilfully written—calling a gentleman bad names, and stating that which is false, savour more of Billingsgate than of Printing House Square.

Mr. Mason was invited by the Lord Mayor to dine at the Mansion House. It was in no sense a public or official reception. When the Mayor of Quebec had responded to the toast of “The Visitors,” the 250 noblemen and gentlemen who were present insisted upon Mr. Mason addressing them. He stood up, was greeted with hearty cheers, referred gracefully to the reception he had met with in this country, pointedly reminded the company that he was not officially recognized by the English Government, and expressed a confident hope that ere long there would be intimate relations between the Confederate States and England, and especially with London, the metropolis of commerce. His brief, self-denying, and non-political remarks were received with loud applause.

The Times knows as well as we know that Mr. Mason has studiously avoided courting public notice. The Times knows that the Confederate States’ Commissioner has refused his countenance and prevented any agitation in favour of the South; that he has maintained a dignified reserve befitting his high, irksome, and responsible position; and that he has altogether eschewed diplomatic demagogism, and the vulgar claptrap that has brought the President of the United States into communication with a few Manchester ranters. It is true that Mr. Mason has been cordially received in all respectable circles, not excluding his respectable political enemies; of course, he has been abused by the Reverend Tooley-street

Tailors, and their infidel allies, who are brought together by their mutual sympathy for servile war, and their pious greed for battles of which the only results are so many killed and so many wounded. As Mr. Mason would not, by taking the stump, give the Northerners a chance of attacking him, the Times comes to the rescue by pouncing upon an impromptu after-dinner speech, and which, as it happened, was wonderfully free from assailable points. Nothing remained but to distort the plain meaning of plain words.

We last week reprinted Mr. Mason’s speech from the Times’ report, and our readers will see that there is no pretence for accusing him of using a festive occasion for making political capital; on the contrary, Mr. Mason scrupulously and completely avoided sodoing. The Times says: “He tells the whole world—of course, without contradiction—that he has had such a welcome, and so much honour in every circle here and in every class of society, that he becomes thereby assured of ultimate recognition for the Confederate States, and a close and mutual alliance between them and this country.” Mr. Mason told the world no such thing. He never talked so illogically. He did acknowledge the kind reception he had met with, and he did anticipate the recognition of the Southern Confederacy; but he did not say that the one would be the cause of the other. Mr. Mason is perfectly aware that England will only recognize the Confederate States, because the South has, with her own right arm, and the favour of Heaven, vindicated her independence, and because it is the duty and interest of commercial England to recognize and form an intimate alliance with a nation which produces in unequalled abundance the greatest staple of commerce, and which consumes vast quantities of manufactured goods. But even more extraordinary than this misrepresentation is the insult offered to the English people. Referring to Mr. Mason’s reception, the Times says: “If General Butler, or Nana Sahib, or the King of Dahomey, were at large in this metropolis, he would be asked out every night.” We repudiate this slander. Mr. Mason’s hearty reception is due to the respect felt for his country, for his personal character, and honourable position; and society in England is not so demoralized as to seek the company of miscreants who have been denounced by the civilized world. If it were true, we must have sadly degenerated from the time when the draymen mobbed Haynan, who had not been guilty of a hundredth part of the crimes that have made the names of Butler, Nana Sahib, and the King of Dahomey, execrated and infamous. All the Times has done by throwing this mud is to dirty its own fingers.

It is amusing to notice how the Observer of Sunday last followed (at a long distance) the Times. The braying, evidently an attempt at imitating the Printing House Square thunder, is exceedingly comic. For instance—the Observer settles the Prussian difficulty by saying, “There is, in fact, no alternative now but to dispense with the King of Prussia altogether, and vacate his place for the occupation of a more enlightened successor.” No paper that has the slightest claim to be considered a political organ would ever indulge in such balderdash; but the Observer is not a political organ. It gives us the telegrams on Sunday and a part of Saturday’s news. The rest of the issue is made up from other papers, and all that is good in the Observer is copied, and all that is original is many fathoms below mediocrity. It has, too, a little importance from getting a few items of official intelligence from the present Government, through a kind of political Jeames Plushe influence. Thus, out of gratitude to the Liberal Ministry, it spoke of the “Tory Lord Mayor,” although the present, as well as the late Tory Lord Mayor, have never shown any evidence of political partisanship in their conduct as chief magistrates of the City of London. It is necessary to thus explain the position of the Observer that our readers may be able to enjoy a hearty laugh at the following:—

It is a singular fact that, with the exception of the persons executed by the local or State’s officer—McNeil—no one has ever been brought to trial for high treason by Mr. Lincoln.

The Czar of Russia shoots every Pole made prisoner, and the English generals in India did not spare the rebels taken in arms against our rule in the late rebellion. Has the Federal Government a less stake at issue?

We can assure the Observer that the Federals do not require any instigation to bloodshed, and that if the Observer will only point out how the people of the South can be exterminated, the clergy of New England, who have already set up John Brown, the midnight assassin, as “John the Baptist,” will probably adopt the Observer as the anti-slavery Bible, and the editor thereof as the anti-slavery God, for which they are clamouring. But as this cannot be done, as no number of proclamations or any other plan will induce the obstinate Confederates to let the Yankees butcher them and their wives and children, and then, having killed, to take possession of their estates, it will, perhaps, be wise for the Observer to feebly mimic and not to attempt to bray louder than the Times thunders, lest the fate of the little creature that envied the size of the bull should befall the Sunday news-sheet; a result we should regret, because it is useful in giving us the Sunday morning telegrams in readable type.

The Naval Defeats of the Federals.

Not the least useful lesson of the recent events at Charleston and Galveston, independently of the grave question of international law they suggest, is the fact which they teach, that the naval strength of the Federal Government is not more substantial or effective than their vaunted superiority on land. The boasts of the Northern Government and presses are the same in each case, and in each, it now appears, equally unfounded. The naval force investing the port of Galveston consisted of at least four armed vessels, two of them known to be of first-class. Of these latter one was captured and the other destroyed. The other two were driven to flight. This exploit was performed by a small fleet of river steamers, without cannon, and protected against shot not by iron armour, but by cotton bales. The blockading force off Charleston Harbour is said to have consisted of thirteen vessels, of which two were frigates of the first-class. Of these two were sunk, four burnt, a seventh disabled, and the rest driven out of sight. In each of these engagements the Federals suffered a loss of exactly one-half of their entire force. This last exploit was performed by a small fleet, not of men-of-war built in European dockyards, with all the resources and appliances of a vast and widely ramified system of manufacture, but such as could be improvised in a blockaded country which has been constantly taunted for its lack of industry and incapacity for manufactures.

On the very day before the memorable engagement, the 30th of January, a Federal gunboat, the I. P. Smith, carrying eleven guns, and with a crew of 230 men, surrendered to the Confederate forces in Charleston Harbour. A few days after the affair at Galveston, and almost in sight of that harbour, the Hatteras, carrying nine guns, went down at the first broadside of the Alabama. Nearly every mail now brings us the news of the repulse, the destruction, or the sinking at sea, of one or more of these floating forts, upon which the North has spent so much, and upon which it so confidently relied. Close upon the heels of each other came the foundering at sea of the famous Monitor and the explosion, by striking a torpedo, in the Yazoo River, of another supposed invulnerable iron-clad. The Monitor’s companion, the Montauk, has just been repulsed, with injury to her turret, by one of the secondary forts defending the approaches of Savannah.

Thus, while the Confederates, with their cramped resources, have been able to build a Virginia capable of destroying a whole fleet in Hampton Roads, and an Arkansas to run the gauntlet of the most formidable naval armament that had been collected during the war, the utmost efforts of the wealth and resources of the North, concentrated upon expeditions on the most magnificent and extensive scale, have failed before Fort Darling or Drury’s Bluff, before Port Hudson, and before Vicksburg. The time was when the South almost trembled for its safety before the innumerable flotillas which it was feared would soon swarm in all the inland waters, carrying destruction and desolation wherever a river flowed. Now, as President Davis truly remarked in his address to the Legislature of Mississippi, the gunboats of the enemy are stripped of their terrors. With every considerable town, except one, on the great river in their possession, the whole naval force of the North has not availed it to gain command of the Mississippi, and not even an iron-clad fleet is able to descend to the captured city of New Orleans.

In directing attention to these facts, it is not our purpose to extol the skill and valour of the Confederates, which are now as conspicuous by sea as by land, but to expose the senseless fallacies of those who sometimes attempt to play upon the apprehensions of timid people here by the spectre of a war with the Yankees. If this maritime strength can be so successfully defied by a nation excluded from the sea, what resistance could it offer to the navies of the Old World? The United States, when united, were, in regard to armed vessels, at most, scarcely a fourth-rate naval Power. Since the disruption, the North has displayed the same restless energy, the same obstinate perseverance, and the same recklessness of expenditure in its naval armaments, which have characterized its military preparations. Both have been on the same extravagant scale of magnitude. But there has apparently been the same want of solidity, the same external grandeur and internal hollowness, in its navies as in its armies. There has been the same shameless jobbery and corruption in the contracts, the same imbecility and alternate rashness and indecision in command. Many of the best vessels of the old United States' navy have been lost since the beginning of the war; few new ones, except the mortar-boats for river service, have been built since, and those few hastily and inefficiently. The portentous roll of the present naval force is filled up with a fleet of merchantmen, some of them scarcely seaworthy as such, and few of which could, with safety to themselves, discharge their own broadsides. Such a force may be competent to carry on war against unarmed vessels, to cruise against and insult the commerce of neutrals, and even for a time to blockade ports which are defended by land batteries alone; but at the mere contact with a real navy it must vanish, and could be swept away by the squadrons of Great Britain as easily as a housemaid's broom brushes off cobwebs.

AN APPEAL TO SOUTHERN PATRIOTISM.—We publish elsewhere a fervent appeal from a Committee of the Southern Club at Liverpool, to their compatriots residing in Europe, on behalf of the Confederate prisoners at the North. The sufferings and privations of those whom the chances of war has thrown into captivity, far from home, kindred, and friends—many of them of gentle birth and nurture—are described in earnest tones. The Club has organized, and, for some time past had in active operation, a machinery for distributing to the sufferers, chiefly through the agency of sympathizing ladies in the Northern cities, such relief in the shape of clothing, food, medicines, little luxuries, or small sums of money, as their necessities may require, and the means of the club permit of being granted. Very considerable sums have already been expended in this manner and with most gratifying results, but war on so unprecedented a scale entails corresponding suffering, and the demands upon patriotic charity are constant and great. The citizens of the Confederacy resident in Europe have heretofore responded to these demands in the most generous manner. To our knowledge, one gentleman alone contributed, as his share of the relief, £1000, and a few weeks since a correspondent in our columns chronicled the touching incident of a young lady, desiring to give something which it would really be a personal sacrifice to give, contributing a valuable ring, her father's first gift to her, to the same cause. No doubt the present appeal will be responded to in a like generous and patriotic manner. We learn from this appeal of the Southern Club Committee, somewhat to our surprise, that the Federal Government has formally permitted the open distribution of relief among the Southern prisoners. This act of humanity and justice, which immensely facilitates the Samaritan labours of the Club and its agents, might have been expected from any other civilized Government, but it is so strikingly in contrast with the things that have been done in the name, or at least with the consent, of the Washington authorities, that we take especial pleasure in recording the fact.

The Southern Club, as will be seen by announcement elsewhere, is located at 55, Brown's Buildings, Liverpool. The Treasurer of the Relief Fund is J. H. Ashbridge, Esq., of the firm of Messrs. Ashbridge and Co., of New Orleans, and who is assisted in the management and disposal of the funds by a Committee of the club.

Reviews.

The framers of the American Constitution do not seem to have contemplated the existence in the United States of what is known in Europe as government by party. It was hardly likely that they should do so; for the idea of party government was then in its infancy, even in England. It had scarcely become an established rule until the days of Chatham, that the members of the Cabinet must agree on political questions; it was not, even in his time, the rule that the possession of the Government was in the gift of the House of Commons, and that the leader of the party which had achieved the ascendancy there was entitled as of right to the rank of Prime Minister. The King could not, indeed, maintain a Minister in power for any length of time in opposition to the will of Parliament; but the right of Parliament to compel him to accept a Minister of its choice was not yet recognized, although it was strenuously asserted, on some occasions, by the Whig leaders. In a word, government by party was slowly becoming a fact, and had not been accepted as a theory in England when the independence of the American colonies was finally established; and it is therefore natural that we should find no trace of it in the Constitution of the United States. But party spirit is of very rapid growth in a free Government; and there were in the condition of the States and in their mutual relations circumstances which were certain to foster its development there. Nevertheless, it can hardly be thought that if the very able men who framed the Federal organization had contemplated a state of things in which the possession of the supreme power should be handed from one party to another as the rightful possession of that which commanded the most general support in the country or in Congress, they would ever have devised a system so extremely ill-adapted to that form of political life. It is quite clear to all who compare the written Constitution of America with that which has grown up—never written, and therefore subject to continual and almost unconscious modification and development—in England, that the machinery of the former was never intended to be worked by the motive power of party, while the latter has been moulded into its present shape for no other purpose.

In the first place, the special rules which obtain in America with regard to majorities are wholly inapplicable to a system of government by party; and, as we shall endeavour to show, work ill under that system. In the Senate, a majority of two-thirds is required for certain executive purposes. In both Houses, an absolute majority is required for the election of officers of the House. In the Electoral Colleges, an absolute majority is requisite to the election of the President. For any modification of the Constitution, large proportionate majorities both of the Houses of Congress, and of the States are required. This requirement is exactly adapted to that which was probably the intention of those who introduced it—the government of the country by a selection from among those men in whom the bulk of the nation had most confidence, and the prevention of any undue predominance of a single clique or section. But for that very reason it is unsuited to a system of party government, and when parties arose and resolved to govern, means were devised, wherever it was possible, to evade the effect of the rules requiring an absolute majority. This has been done in the case of the electors who chose the President, by conventions of delegates from the opposing parties, who severally meet and decide upon a candidate who is to receive the suffrages of the whole party, and thus secure that their whole strength shall be concentrated, and that the Electoral Colleges shall not divide their votes among several candidates, and shall not choose the best man in the country, but the most available candidate of the dominant party. When parties are closely balanced in the House of Representatives, the election of a Speaker becomes an exceedingly difficult matter; and public business has sometimes been delayed for weeks by the difficulty of uniting a majority of votes in favour of any one candidate. It may be observed, too, that by virtue of this system of requiring absolute majorities, it would be possible for such a third party as has for years existed in England, either to stop the whole machinery of Government, or to impose its own conditions on either of its two rivals. It is clear that when such a requirement was enacted, party organization and systematic party warfare were not contemplated.

Again, the irremovability of the Executive is utterly inconsistent with the idea of government by party. The English theory requires that the whole power of the Administration shall be in the hands of that party which for the time being possesses the confidence of the country, and that the moment that confidence is transferred, the power shall be transferred also. The American Constitution not only recognizes no such principle, but does its utmost to render its application impossible. In the light in which we are now regarding the matter, the Presidency is analogous not to the Crown but to the Premiership. The President is a party man, elected as a party man; he is, in a certain sense and for the term for which he holds office, the chief of a party. The theory of party government would require, therefore, that he should resign as soon as his party finds itself decidedly in a minority in Congress. But he does nothing of the kind; the American Constitution does not expect that he should do anything of the kind. He holds his office directly from the people, for a period of four years; and during that period neither Congress nor even the people have the right or the power to remove him. He is for that time practically as irremovable as the Queen of England. But inasmuch as he does not merely reign, but also governs, the acts of his Administration are his acts, and he is not therefore to be expected to dismiss his Ministers and change his measures at the bidding of Congress or of public opinion. The result is that the Government is virtually not merely irremovable but irresponsible. Either the President or his Ministers may indeed be got rid of by impeachment. But impeachment is not available, and never ought to be used, as a party weapon. It is not a sword which may be used in fair fight between honourable adversaries; it is the axe wherewith public justice may strike a great political criminal. Accordingly, the Federal Government is not, properly speaking, amenable to correction by the Opposition, however completely the former may have lost and the latter regained the confidence of the country. The Opposition cannot oust the Administration by a party vote; and where this is the case, the conditions of party warfare are widely different from those under which it is waged in England, in her colonies, or in those few European countries whose Constitutions are fashioned on the English model. The spectacle which is now presented at Washington is very strange to English eyes. President Lincoln has completely lost the confidence of the country. A House of Representatives has been elected in which his opponents have a decided majority. The dismissal of his Cabinet has been demanded by his own party. And yet President Lincoln, and Messrs. Seward, Stanton, and Chase remain in office; and if no revolutionary violence be used against them, it seems probable that they will remain in office till the 4th of March, 1865. Nay more, the Congress in which they are certain to meet with a preponderant opposition does not assemble until the 1st December, 1863. And if the Democratic reaction were ever so strong, no legal opposition could be offered to any legal act of the present Government until that period; no blunders, no disasters, no mal-administration, nothing but absolute political crime, could enable the States, even after that date, to rid themselves of a Government which they have long distrusted, and are learning to despise. The minority remains in power; the majority is doomed to the "cold shade of opposition."

The Executive powers bestowed upon the Senate are further inconsistent with the theory of government by party; inasmuch as they impose upon one of the branches of the Legislature, a co-ordinate responsibility for a great many of the acts of the Administration, and make those acts no longer the measures of the party in power, liable to party censure, and capable of being made the ground, in the event of their failure, of a vote of want of confidence in the Administration.

The position of public officials is also utterly inconsistent with the theory of government by party. That theory requires that those who are at the head of the Administration should have seats in the Legislature, there to defend and explain their measures; the more so as they must be the leaders of one of the parties which divide that body between them. But the American law expressly excludes from Congress all persons holding offices of trust and profit under the Federal Government. A Minister, therefore, cannot be the leader of a party, unless the party is content to absolve him from many of the chief functions of leadership. On the other hand, the English system maintains all minor officials in their places, nominally "during pleasure," but practically during good behaviour, whatever changes of Government may take place; because the permanence of the civil service is considered necessary for the public convenience. The American theory seems at first to have been similar to our own. Offices there were conferred during pleasure, but under the earlier Presidents they were really held during good behaviour. But when, in the time of Andrew Jackson, party warfare reached its height, and the idea of government by party, in its coarsest form, was enunciated in the phrase that "to the victors belong the spoils," the practice was changed. We are inclined to think that some undue censure has been cast on President Jackson on this account. No doubt the wholesale dismissal of officials is a fruitful source of mischief and demoralization. But if officials are allowed to take part in political warfare, they cannot expect to retain their offices when they are defeated. The English law disqualifies officers of the revenue departments from voting at elections; and English practice inhibits all government officials from taking an active part in party contests. We even remember to have heard one eminent English statesman give it as his opinion, that an official has no right to contribute to political journals. That no such rule obtained in America may serve to show that those who organized the American Government did not dream that it would have to be carried on by the machinery of party.

It is worth while to inquire, shortly, how, especially in regard to these points, the non-adaptation of the American Constitution to the system of government by party has affected the character of parties in the United States. We have spoken of the stringency of party discipline there; a discipline which goes so far that many American writers declare it to be impossible to expect an honest decision from an American jury when party feelings are involved. No Democrat will convict an active Democrat of any crime, and, least of all, of any crime committed in the service of the party; no Republican will find a Republican guilty of bribery, or of embezzlement of public money. We do not say that these charges are literally and fully true; but we find them so often reiterated as to leave no room to doubt that party spirit in the United States is so violent, and party discipline so strict, as to override too often, not merely the individual opinions, but even the moral sense of the citizen. It is easy to see how such intensity of partisanship, such closeness of party cohesion, is fostered by the laws which require in so many cases an absolute majority of votes. Nothing but the most vigorous system of party organization would make it possible to elect a President or to choose a Speaker; parties divided into sections and cursed with a number of those troublesome adherents who indulge in the luxury of a conscience, like the parties to which we are used in England, could never work under such a rule. The same cause is visible in a still worse result. No party can afford to disgust any of its adherents; therefore, no party can put forward its best men, for these have always enemies in their own camp, whose defection would be fatal. This majority rule is, perhaps, one of the chief reasons why, for the last thirty years, no party leader has ever been

President of the United States, and why very few have ever been proposed for that office. It obliges parties to "Sift out safe candidates that no one ain't afraid on," 'Cause they're so thunderin' eminent for bein' never heard on;"

and thereby lowers incalculably not only the character of the Government, but the tone of party contests. A "plurality" rule might have given America Clay, Webster, or Calhoun for Presidents, in lieu of Pierces, Van Burens, and Polks; but if it had done no more than make the former the candidates of their respective parties, it would have raised the tone of American politics far above the level of the last forty years.

The irremovability of the Government involves the irresponsibility of the Opposition, and gives free play to factious conduct and unscrupulous misrepresentation. Every party leader in England is restrained in his strictures on the policy of the Government by the knowledge that a Parliamentary success would oblige him to assume himself the practical responsibilities of office. He dare say nothing by which he will not be able to abide if called upon to carry out his own policy. An American Opposition knows that it has no chance, save at fixed intervals, of coming into power; and it can, therefore, afford to be far more violent and unscrupulous than the bitterest leader of the party on Mr. Speaker's left hand would venture to be, with the knowledge that he may, and the hope that he will, very soon take his seat on the Treasury Bench, and be compelled to defend his policy, and prove its accordance with his present declamations, in the teeth of vigilant antagonists.

The peculiar position which the President occupies towards Congress, which cannot remove him, but which can so thwart him as to bring the wheels of government to a dead-lock, has no doubt helped to foster that corruption which is the disgrace of American politics. Everything which makes the conciliation of wavering adherents and purchaseable opponents an absolute necessity of political success, and which makes it impossible for a Government to rely simply on its measures, and its ability to defend them, tends to corruption. The absence of the Ministers from Congress, and the consequent necessity of entrusting the defence of the Government to private members, who can receive no legitimate reward for their services, cannot but have a similar effect. But the chief cause of this scandal is to be sought, beyond a doubt, in the low moral standard which is inherent in the nature of a Democracy, and its second cause in the fatal system of dismissals, which ensures that at every election there shall be enlisted on either side tens of thousands of persons who are striving not for the good of their country, or the honour of their party, but for their own private advantage. There are always twenty or thirty thousand place-hunters on each side, whose services have in some way or other to be paid for after every party triumph; and where this is the case, political integrity is a dream. Of all the evils which have resulted in the attempt to work by party a Constitutional machinery intended for a very different guidance, none has done so much harm as this practice, which makes politics a trade, and perverts party principles to the service of electioneering agents, and the gain of office-seekers.

A SOUTHERN COMMENTARY ON MR. SPENCE'S WORK.

Mr. Spence's work, the "American Union," has received the compliment—no trifling one in a country where printing paper is so scarce—of being republished at Richmond. The republication is in as handsome a style as circumstances and the blockade will permit, and the work bids fair to meet with as extensive and general a success as in this country. It was not, however, to be expected that the Southern public, while justly admiring the great merits of the book, would accept, without qualification or reservation, all the positions assumed by Mr. Spence, and assent either to his views concerning their institutions, or to the errors into which, naturally enough, he has fallen, in common with so many other less able and less well-informed writers, on the subject of the "mean whites." The Southern edition of the "American Union" is, therefore, preceded by a "publisher's preface," which, as an interesting Southern commentary of this remarkable work, we reproduce in extenso. We may here remark that a German translation of the same book is at this moment going through the press, and will be published within a few weeks, at most. A French translation, our readers will remember, appeared several months since.

PUBLISHERS' PREFACE.

The great merit of Mr. Spence's book has induced us to offer a reprint to Southern readers. The work was published in London during November, 1861, and in a few months has gone through four editions. It is rumoured that the author has been called on in the highest quarters for further information in reference to the subject.

Mr. Spence thoroughly maintains the cause of the Southern States in their controversy with the North. His opinion is decided, his reasoning vigorous, his style easy, perspicuous, and forcible. He asserts broadly the right of secession as directly derived from the nature of the Government, and shows conclusively the adequacy of the causes that have induced the South to exercise the right. He is particularly happy in exposing, by a skilful analysis of the last Federal tariff, the iniquitous nature of the tariff system which Northern rapacity had imposed on Southern industry.

Without attempting to analyze Mr. Spence's book, we offer to the reader a few remarks on a passage or two of the work. One of these remarks refer to some additional facts respecting the right of secession; the rest we present rather as a protest than criticism on certain opinions expressed by Mr. Spence on slavery, and on the mode of recognition which European nations may adopt for the Southern Confederacy.

On the subject of secession Mr. Spence adverts to the language of the Virginia Convention as clearly asserting the right of a State to secede—to withdraw from the Federal Government its delegated powers. The language of New York and Rhode Island is still more explicit than that of Virginia. The Convention of New York declares that "the powers of Government may be reassumed by the people whenever it shall become necessary to their happiness; that every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not by the Constitution clearly delegated to Congress, or the departments of the Government, remain in the people of the several States, &c. Under these impressions, and declaring that these rights cannot be abridged or violated, and that the explanations aforesaid are consistent with the said Constitution, we, the delegates in convention * * * assent to and ratify the Constitution." It is by virtue of this ratification with these explanations and declarations of right that New York is a member of the Federal Union. The ratification broadly asserts that the right of the several States to "re-assume" the powers delegated to the Federal Government is "consistent with the Constitution." With this explanation the Constitution was adopted; without it the Constitution would have been rejected. The explanation and ratification constitute parts of one instrument. If one is denied, the other is at an end. They stand or fall together. The ratification with the condition was accepted by the Federal Government. The right of New York, therefore, to resume its delegated powers is undeniable, and the right of one State is the right of all. Can evidence be more complete or argument more conclusive?

If additional evidence were wanted, it would be found in the correspondence of Hamilton and Madison. The letters have been lately published at the North as conclusive against secession. The true inference from them is directly the reverse. Hamilton wrote to inquire if a conditional ratification by New York would be sufficient. Madison replies that it would not. The correspondence proves that Madison was opposed to a conditional ratification, and that Hamilton thought it a moot point. But the letters prove what is vastly more important. They show what were the temper and purpose of the Convention. Hamilton's letter is a key to the New York ratification, if a key be necessary. It is of little importance what two men, however distinguished, may have thought or said; what the Convention, a great public body, thought, and felt, and did, is what we desire to know. Hamilton's letter discloses all this. It shows that the Convention desired to attach a condition to its acceptance of the Constitution, and what the letter shows the Convention wished to do, the ratification proves was accordingly done. The condition which reconciled the Convention to the adoption of the Constitution was the assertion that the people had the right to resume all delegated powers whenever their happiness required it, and this condition was inserted in the ratification.

The ratification of Rhode Island, adopted many months subsequently, is word for word the same as that of New York, and was evidently copied from it.

Mr. Spence is very fair on the subject of slavery. Looking at it, however, through the spectacle of English sentiment, he could not be expected to hold opinions agreeing in all points with our own. He rejects the scandalous falsehoods of the Abolitionists, and declares that "the great mass of negroes are in the possession of more robust health, more plentiful food, and more exemption from care than many classes of the labourers of Europe." "The sufferings of a fireless winter are unknown to them." "In old age there is no fear of a workhouse." "Their children are never a burden or care to them, and their labour, although long, is neither difficult or unhealthy." How is it in Europe? "Take the life of a collier there as an example; can anything be more dismal? There are other pursuits in which men grow haggard and worn at middle age; some in which there goes on a stealthy poisoning of the system, yet in which recruits are never wanting." "A single fact shows that the condition of the negro in the Southern States is not one of suffering." The fact alluded to is the rapid increase of the negro race in the United States. It is impossible, indeed, for the most prejudiced observer to deny the physical advantages of the negro slave; they are too obvious to be overlooked. His intellectual improvement is not less certain, though less frequently admitted. It is acknowledged by Mr. Spence. He says intellectually "there has been a positive gain." It is in slavery only that the negro has acquired any knowledge of the mechanic arts, that he has become a useful and efficient agricultural labourer. His improvement in morals and religious knowledge is not less remarkable. Every clergyman will bear testimony to the sincere and simple faith of the Christian slave. More than one Onesimus may be found on every Southern plantation resembling St. Paul's runaway convert in all but unfaithfulness to his master. In all respects—physically, intellectually, morally, religiously—the four million slaves in North America are immeasurably superior to the negro race in their native country. When four years ago a prize slave-ship entered Charleston harbour, the civilized negro of the neighbourhood could not bear to be told that he had descended from such half-human barbarians as he saw in the vessel. Yet with all this Mr. Spence tells his readers that slavery is a "wrong, an outrage on humanity." "After all the argument," he says, "that can be poured into the ear, slavery remains a foul blot on the annals of the age." Is it a wrong, an outrage, a blot on the age, to have civilized four million Africans through the only means by which the end could be accomplished? It is slavery only in a Christian country that has civilized the negro, and it is slavery alone that protects him now in his civilized condition. Remove the guardianship of the slaveholder, and the negro's destruction will inevitably follow. Mr. Spence says it is a wrong, and the wrong reacts on the master. But in this case, if there be a wrong, it is not that of the master: it was perpetrated by those who dragged the negro from his native country. The slaveholder has been the friend, the only practical friend, of the negro race. While others rant and declaim in sentimental phrases that mean nothing, or contrive schemes that do mischief merely, the slaveholder alone has civilized the negro. It is the master's care solely tha has divested the barbarian of his ferocity, the heathen of his vile superstitions, the savage of his imbecility, and imparted to the negro his truest claim to be "a man and a brother." But if slavery were an evil to the slaveholder "morally and economically," it would have nothing to do with the question at issue. No denouncer of slavery views it in any other light than as it affects the slave and his happiness; and to the slave, slavery has been not a wrong, but a blessing. Mr. Spence calls slavery "a gross anachronism, a theory of 2000 years ago." This is only saying that the form of labour called slavery has been found in all ages and among all nations. It is compulsory labour, nothing more, and will exist in one or another form as long as men shall toil for bread; as long as they waste their lives in coal mines and in manufactories of lead and steel.

But we are not dissatisfied with Mr. Spence. We are content to take what he is willing to give. "No reasoning," he says, "no statistics, no philosophy, can reconcile us to what our instinct repels." According to his reasoning, if logically carried out, slavery in the States is a good to the negro; according to his instinct it is a wrong and an outrage. We will take the distributive share assigned to us of his judgments, and appeal from his instinct to his reason. As an old astronomer discovered that the world moved, notwithstanding the suggestions of his instincts to the contrary, Mr. Spence may find also, in spite of this, that slavery in North America is a blessing to the negro, and the Southern States a paradise; that in a general view of the subject, the only view that can properly be taken of it, there is no wrong and no wrong-doer, so far as the negro and his master are concerned. As to the master, if care for his well-being is to be an element in the calculation, it is enough to say that his position is one in which Providence has placed him, and from which he has no means of retiring. For his temper and character, while he retains his place, he may appeal from the libels of Abolitionists to the judgment of the great philosophical statesman of Great Britain. In his speech on the resolutions for conciliation with the colonies, Mr. Burke bears testimony to the lofty character of the slaveholder; he says, "In Virginia and Carolina they have a vast number of slaves. Where this is the case in any part of the world those who are free are by far the most proud and jealous of their freedom. Freedom is to them not only an enjoyment, but a kind of rank and privilege. Not seeing there that freedom, as in countries where it is a common blessing, may be united with much abject toil, with great misery, with all the exterior of servitude, liberty looks among them like something that is more noble and liberal. I do not mean to commend the superior morality of the sentiment which has at least as much pride as virtue in it, but I cannot alter the nature of man. The fact is so, and these people of the Southern colonies are much more strongly, and with a higher and more stubborn spirit, attached to liberty than those of the Northward. Such were all the ancient commonwealths; such were our Gothic ancestors; such in our days were the Poles; and such will be all masters of slaves who are not slaves themselves. In such a people the haughtiness of domination combines with the spirit of freedom, fortifies it, and renders it invincible." The subject under discussion in Parliament led the great English statesman to speak of the high courage only of the slaveholder; but high courage is not the associate of ignoble qualities, and the most elevated examples of public and private virtue are found among the slaveholders of ancient Greece and Rome. The men of Plutarch were masters of slaves. Not less illustrious are those of the Southern States which history has already recorded; and we believe, without a doubt, that the deeds of the past, brilliant as they are, will be equalled, if not surpassed, in daring courage, in boundless devotion, in ready self-sacrifice by the heroic men who are now pouring out their blood like water to vindicate the liberties of the Southern Confederacy. No nobler examples of public or private virtue will be found in the history of any people.

The least judicious portion of Mr. Spence's book is that in which he remarks that Europe may impose on the Southern Confederacy certain conditions respecting slavery. "It will clearly be allowable to our Government," he says, "to decline to acknowledge their independence without express conditions in relation to slavery." On what pretence could such a position be assumed by England? Any conditions in reference to the internal concerns of the Confederacy would be at variance with international law, with the comity due from one independent Government to another, and with the self-respect essential to the well-being of every State. We might as reasonably attempt to dictate to England the mode in which she should govern the ryots of Bengal or the black natives of Australia. Mr. Spence admits the evil effects arising from Northern interference with Southern society; would the interference of England be less mischievous? The purpose would be to promote the amelioration of slavery, the effect would be to retard it. Nothing can ameliorate slavery but the increasing civilization of the slave. When he was a barbarian, lately from Africa, he required restraints which, in his present condition, are no longer necessary, and no longer known. Like his past, his future progress must be the work of time. Slavery to the African is education. All foreign interference would mar its teachings. The advance of the age, of general civilization, is the only true source of improvement here or elsewhere. We freely admit the obligations and duties of the master, but in discharging them he must be left to his own judgment alone.

In connection with this branch of the subject Mr. Spence makes an allusion to slavery in Cuba, and intimates that the condition of the slave is better there than here. Surely this is a mistake. A single fact will prove it. It is a fact adduced by Mr. Spence himself, as conclusive evidence of the good treatment of slaves in the Southern States. The slaves here have increased from seven hundred thousand in seventy years, to four millions, almost without immigration from Africa. In Cuba, an annual importation of Africans is required to repair the waste of life from hard work, and to keep up the number of labourers. Which condition will Mr. Spence prefer for the slave? Even the practice which he adduces as so important in the slave system of Cuba is quite as prevalent in the Southern States. It is provided by law in Cuba that a slave may buy himself free; the same thing is constantly occurring in the Southern States, not by formal legal provisions, but by common practice, which is the master of law. We know negroes who have virtually become their own masters by the customs of the country, who are owners of drays, horses, fishing-boats, slaves, houses, and lands, and who live in their own homes as freemen.

There are a few more opinions of Mr. Spence's work on which we might offer a remark, such as the imaginary degraded condition of white labour in the Southern States, and the supposed scanty progress of Southern industry; but we are content to leave these questions for time to solve. When the South shall be fully released from the trammels of her connection with the Northern States, she will be able to develop her true character, her capabilities, and resources. There was no lack of industry or energy in the ancient slaveholding republics, and we can see no reason why there should be any in this. Already, under all the disadvantages that have embarrassed her exertions, the progress of the South has been immense. In bestowing on the world's commerce, in a half-century a single product, whose annual value is $200,000,000, she has given sufficient evidence of what her vigour can perform. What will it not do when freed effectually from the influences of greedy and unscrupulous monopolists.

THE CONFEDERATE TREASURY.

The following is the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated Treasury Department, C. S. A., Richmond, Jan. 10:—

Hon. T. S. Bocock, Speaker of the House of Representatives, C. S. A.

Sir,—I have the honour to submit the following report of the condition of this department. The statements for the last year were made up to the 18th of February, 1862, the termination of the Provisional Government. From the commencement of the permanent Government to the 31st of December, 1862, the receipts and expenditures were as follow:—

RECEIPTS.
Patent fund	$13,920
Customs	668,566
Miscellaneous	2,291,812
Repayment of disbursing officers	3,839,263
Interest on loans	26,583
Call loan certificates	59,742,796
One hundred million loan	41,398,286
Treasury notes	215,554,885
Interest bearing notes	113,740,000
War tax	16,664,513
Loan 28th of February, 1861	1,375,476
Coin received from Bank of Louisiana	2,539,799
Total	$457,855,704

EXPENDITURES.
War Department	$341,011,754
Navy Department	20,559,283
Civil, miscellaneous, foreign intercourse, and customs	13,673,376

PUBLIC DEBT.
Interest on public debt (loans)	$5,892,989
Payment of Treasury notes, act of March 9, 1861, Principal	$545,900
Interest	20,860
Redemption of 6 per Cent. Certificates	11,516,400
Redemption of Treasury notes called in for cancellation and reimbursement of principal, under act of May 16, 1861	23,781,172
Total	$416,971,735

Add balance against the Treasury on the 18th of February, 1862	26,439,572
Total	$443,411,307

Amount of receipts	$457,855,704
Deduct amount of expenditures	443,411,307
Balance	$14,444,397

This balance consists in part of the coin on hand, received from the Bank of Louisiana, and the remainder in interest bearing Treasury notes.

The appropriations made by Congress, and not yet drawn for the Treasury, are as follows:—

Civil and Miscellaneous	$10,925,049
War Department	57,865,879
Customs	396,612
Navy Department	12,692,373
Amount	$81,879,913

The estimates for the support of the Government to the 1st July, the end of the fiscal year, are as follow:—

Legislative	$231,600
Executive (salary of President, &c.)	13,471
Treasury Department	29,929,697
War	242,977,067
Navy	16,948,870
State	150,253
Department of Justice	172,632
Post-office Department	60,123
Miscellaneous	10,000
Total	$290,493,713

In order to ascertain the amount to be raised by Congress, we must add:—

1. The estimates	$290,493,713
2. Undrawn appropriations	81,879,913
Total	$372,373,626

And deduct the balance in the Treasury of	14,444,397
Leaving amount to be raised	$357,929,229

The debt of the Government at the same date was as follows:—

BONDS AND STOCKS.
Under act of Feb. 28, 1861	$14,887,000
Under act of May 16, 1861	6,414,300
Under act of Aug. 19, 1861	67,585,100

Deposit certificates under act Dec. 24, 1861:—

Issued	$89,005,870
Redeemed	12,516,400
Total	$145,476,870

TREASURY NOTES.

8.65 notes	$992,000
Two years' notes	10,919,025
General currency	272,022,467
7.30 notes	120,480,000
$1 and $2 notes	6,216,200
Total	$556,105,062

In the above statement is contained a large amount of bonds and interest bearing notes, which are on hand in the various depositories not yet issued. It is important to bear this in mind in estimating the effect of the act of the last session upon funding Treasury notes. The loans in which such notes are funded are those mentioned in the schedule as loans of May 16 and August 19. The amount of those loans, as reported at the last meeting of Congress, was, on the 1st of August, $41,577,250.

By the statement now reported, the total amount of these bonds is	$73,999,400
From which should be deducted amount on hand not yet disposed of, say	8,000,000
Total	$65,919,400

And in order to ascertain the amount of Treasury notes funded, there must be deducted for the bonds issued for produce, say	7,000,000
Total	$58,919,400
Deduct amount reported 1st of August	41,577,250
Balance	$17,342,150

This balance shows the amount of Treasury notes funded in five months, the average being about three and a half millions per month.

During the same period the interest bearing Treasury notes have increased from	$22,799,900
To	120,480,000

Increase	$97,680,100
From which deduct notes on hand	11,004,600
Real increase	$86,675,500

THE CONFEDERATE INCURSION INTO HOLLY SPRINGS.

(From the Richmond Dispatch, Jan. 15.)

The recent cavalry exploit of General Van Dorn in the West was one of the most brilliant feats of the war, not falling short of any that have been made by the renowned Stuart or ubiquitous Morgan. A correspondent of the Mobile Register gives the following interesting particulars of his brilliant achievements in the vicinity of Holly Springs, Mississippi:—

Van Dorn took a by-way and meandering route through the swamp, and came within eight miles of Holly Springs in the evening, where he bivouacked his force until two hours before day, when he moved cautiously into town, leaving the Texas brigade upon the heights outside as a reserve. As our forces dashed in from all sides, the entrance proved a complete surprise, the breaking streaks of daylight showing the Yankee tents with their yet undisturbed slumberers. A charge was ordered upon them, and the torch applied to the canvass which covered them. To paraphrase "Belgium's" picture—

"Ah, then and there was hurrying to and fro,
And running in hot haste,
And cheeks all pale and blanched with woe,
Exhibiting Yankee cowardice."

The rapidity with which the tents of the enemy were vacated was marvellous; and, impelled by burning torches and rapid discharges of side arms, the Yankees took no time to prepare their toilets, but rushed out into the cool atmosphere of a December morning clothed very similarly to Joseph when the Lady Potiphar attempted to detain him. The scene was wild, exciting, tumultuous. Yankees running, tents burning, torches flaming, Confederates shouting, guns popping, sabres clanking, Abolitionists begging for mercy, Rebels shouting exultingly, women on déshabille clapping their hands, frantic with joy, crying, "Kill them! kill them!" A heterogeneous mass of excited, frantic, frightened human beings—presented an indescribable picture more adapted for the pencil of Hogarth than the pen of a newspaper correspondent.

The surprised camp surrendered 1800 men and 150 commissioned officers, who were immediately paroled. And then commenced the work of destruction. The extensive buildings of the Mississippi Central depot—the station-houses, the engine-houses and immense store houses—were filled with supplies of clothing and commissary stores. Outside of the depot the barrels of flour were estimated to be half a mile in length, one hundred and fifty feet through, and fifteen feet high. Turpentine was thrown over this, and the whole amount destroyed. Up town, the court-house and the public buildings, livery stables, and all capacious establishments, were filled, ceiling high, with medical and ordnance stores. They were all fired, and the explosion of one of the buildings, in which was stored 100 barrels of powder, knocked down nearly all the houses on the south side of the square. Surely such a scene of devastation was never before presented to the eye of man. Glance at the gigantic estimates:—

1,809,000 fixed cartridges and other ordnance stores, valued at $1,500,000, including 5000 rifles and 2000 revolvers.

100,000 suits of clothing and other quartermaster's stores, valued at $500,000; 5000 barrels of flour and other commissary stores, valued at $500,000.

$1,000,000 worth of medical stores, for which invoices to that amount were exhibited, and 1000 bales of cotton, and $600,000 worth of sutlers' stores.

While the capture of the camp, parolling of the prisoners, and destroying of the stores was going on, the Texan Rangers, comprising the 9th, 6th, and 3rd legions, became engaged with the Michigan cavalry, and drove them pell-mell through the town, and ran them off north, with a considerable loss to the Abolitionists, and a loss of thirty in killed and wounded on our part.

The ladies rushed out from the houses, wild with joy, crying out:—"There's some at the Fair Grounds; chase them, kill them for God's sake." One lady said, "the Federal commandant of the post is in my house, come and catch him." And a search was instituted, but without success, when the noble woman insisted that he was there, concealed; and finally, after much ado, the gallant (save the mark!) Colonel Murphy, the intrepid Yankee commandant of Holly Springs, was pulled out from under his bed, and presented himself, in his nocturnal habiliments, to his captors.

The Provost-Marshal was also taken, and, addressing General Van Dorn, said: "Well, General, you've got us fairly this time. I knowed it. I was in bed with my wife when I heard the firing, and I at once said, 'Well, wife, it's no use closing our eyes or hiding under the cover; we've gone up.'"

Our attention was given to Grant's headquarters, which he had left twenty-four hours before. All his papers, charts, maps, &c., were captured, together with his splendid carriage, which was burned. Among his papers was found a pass, to pass the bearer over all railroads and steamboats in the United States, at Government expense; to pass all pickets and guards; and other papers, at once interesting and valuable. Mrs. Grant was also captured, but no indignity was offered to her.

Nearly every store on the public square was filled with sutlers' stores, and after our men had helped themselves, the balance of the goods were burned.

When our forces first reached the depot, there was a train about leaving. The engineer jumped off and ran away, and one of our men took his place, shut the throttle valve, and stopped the train. Sixty cars and two locomotives were then fired and destroyed.

After the complete destruction of all public property about the place, and after each man had supplied himself with a suitable quantity of clothing and boots, at 6 o'clock in the morning the march was renewed, and Davis' Mill was the next place attacked. Here the enemy were entrenched, and sheltered themselves in a block-house and fort formed of cotton bales. The cavalry were commanded to charge, and attempted to do so; but the swamp and intricate lagoons breaking off in front of the enemy's position would not permit it. The Yankees opened fire with some effect from their fort, and were supported by a 9-pound rifled gun, mounted on an iron-clad railroad car, forming a railroad battery. The Texans were again ordered to charge, and Major Dillon, of Van Dorn's staff, whose gallantry during the expedition was particularly conspicuous, attempted to lead them to the attack, but the men refused to follow, believing the way impassable and the position too strong for cavalry demonstration alone. Colonel McCullough, of the Mississippi Cavalry, was ordered to get in the rear of the railroad battery, cut the track to prevent its escape, and capture it. I believe he succeeded in cutting the road, but our forces were compelled to withdraw, and the steam battery was not taken. The force then pushed on to Middleburg and Bolivar, and attacked both places, but found them too strongly defended and garrisoned to succeed in taking either of the points.

When the command turned back after its unsuccessful attack upon Bolivar the enemy sent a force of 10,000, comprising the three branches of the service, out after Van Dorn, and made great efforts to flank and cut off his force; but this dashing officer was too wary for them, and succeeded in returning with 400 head of captured horses and mules, laden with spoils taken from the enemy.

The people of Tennessee are represented as having been almost frantic with joy at the appearance of our forces once more upon their borders. They fed our soldiers with a bountiful hand, and wept for joy. "Thank God, you have come at last!" one and all exclaimed. Their hospitality was not a little surprising to our soldiers, who have been so uniformly swindled and extorted from in Mississippi. The people of Tennessee had been induced to believe that General Grant's headquarters were at Jackson, Mississippi, and that our whole army had been captured. Judge, then, of their surprise when they were visited by Van Dorn's command.

The entire number of prisoners captured and paroled during the raid is 2100 privates and 175 commissioned officers.

The following Special Orders of General Grant are very significant of the extent of the disaster:—

Headquarters, Thirteenth Army Corps.

Department of the Tennessee, Holly Springs, Mississippi, December 23, 1862.

Special Field Orders, No 33.

* * It is with pain and mortification that the General commanding reflects upon the disgraceful surrender of this place, with all the valuable stores it contained, on the 20th inst., and that without any resistance, except by a few men, who form an honorable exception; and this, too, after warning had been given of the advance of the enemy northward the evening previous. With all the cotton, public stores, and substantial buildings about the depot, it would have been perfectly practicable to have made in a few hours defences sufficient to resist, with a small garrison, all the cavalry force brought against them, until the reinforcements, which the commanding officer was notified were marching to his relief, could have reached him.

The conduct of officers and men in accepting paroles, under the circumstances, is highly reprehensible, and, to say the least, thoughtless. By the terms of the Dix-Hill cartel, each party is bound to take care of their prisoners, and send them to Vicksburg, Mississippi, or a point on James River, Virginia, for exchange or parole, unless some other point is mutually agreed upon by the generals commanding the opposing armies. By a refusal to be paroled, the enemy, from his inability to take care of the prisoners, would have been compelled either to have released them unconditionally, or to have abandoned all further aggressive movements for the time being, which would have made their recapture and the discomfiture of the enemy almost certain.

It is gratifying to notice, in contrast with this, the conduct of a portion of the command, conspicuous among whom was the 2nd Illinois Cavalry, who gallantly and successfully resisted being taken prisoners. Their loss was heavy, but the enemy's was much greater. Such conduct as theirs will always ensure success.

Had the commandant of the post exercised the usual and ordinary precautions for defence, the garrison was sufficiently strong to have repulsed the enemy, saved our stores from destruction and themselves from capture.

The General commanding is satisfied that a majority of the troops who accepted a parole did so thoughtlessly and from want of knowledge of the cartel referred to, and that in future they will not be caught in the same way.

By order of Major-General U. S. Grant.

JOHN A. RAWLINS,
Assistant Adjutant General,

THE CONFEDERATE ARMY BEFORE THE BATTLE OF MURFREESBORO'.

(Correspondence of the Mobile Register, Dec. 28, 1862.)

Our line of battle has been formed on the west side of Stone's River, our centre resting about three miles from town—our right extending as far as the Lebanon pike, and our left on the Shelbyville pike, making a distance of nearly six miles. Stone's River crosses the Shelbyville pike on the south side of the town about two miles and a-half distant, and sweeps round in a circular course towards the Lebanon pike, on the north side. General Hardee's corps occupies the right and centre, and General Polk's the left. There are two lines of battle in the front of General McCown's division held in reserve. The enemy still remains on the other side of Stuart's Creek, ten miles from town, and seven from our line of battle.

General Morgan having succeeded in cutting off the enemy's supplies by the destruction of fifteen miles of the Nashville railroad, which I sent you a telegram of to-day, will greatly aid our success. They have received no mails in Nashville since the 24th, the day on which Morgan captured the Abolition forces at Glasgow, Kentucky. As his return to Kentucky is now no secret, I will state that the expedition left Alexandria, Tennessee, on Sunday last, 21st instant, composed of two brigades numbering about 3200 men.

The same correspondent, writing on the next day (December 29th), gives the following interesting information in regard to the battle then imminent:—

I rode out to-day in front of our lines on the Nashville Pike to Stone's River, where our line of battle is formed. The river is very shallow, being at the ford, and not over ankle deep, and is but a mile and a half from town. Polk's corps is on the opposite, or north-west side of the river. The character of the surrounding country is open, and very slightly rolling, being mostly level. On this side of the river are numerous little brick chimneys, which were built in front of our tents, now all struck, and which mark our former camp grounds. The enemy advanced this evening and took up their line of battle about a mile from ours. About 400 yards in front of our line, on the left side of the Nashville road, stood a fine brick dwelling, which was set fire to this evening, with all the barns and outhouses, in order to prevent the enemy from approaching us under shelter. Their signal corps, while the building was burning, approached near the house to reconnoitre, and were plainly seen. On this side of the river there are small patches of thin woods, but, as I have said, the ground is mostly open, and it must consequently be a fair field fight. The forces of the enemy are now estimated at from 55,000 to 60,000. Our full force is about 33,000, thus we have a far superior number against us, and must depend solely on the fighting qualities of our troops. Rosecrans has the advice and aid, it is supposed, of Buell, but I do not suppose the latter is on the field.

By this time to-morrow night the fate of Middle Tennessee will be decided. The following "Memorandum for General and Staff Officers" was issued yesterday (Sunday) morning, which anticipated the commencement of the battle to-day:—

1. The "line of battle" will be in front of Murfreesboro'—half of the army, left wing, in front of Stone's River, right wing in rear of river.
2. Polk's corps will form left wing; Hardee's corps right wing.
3. Withers' division will form first line in Polk's corps; Cheatham's the second; Breckinridge's division forms first line in Hardee's corps; Clement's division the second line.

4. McCown's division to form reserve opposite centre, on high ground, in rear of Cheatham's present quarters.

5. Jackson's brigade in reserve to the right flank to report to Lieut. General Hardee.

6. The two lines to be from 800 to 1000 yards apart, according to the ground.

7. Chiefs of artillery to pay special attention to the posting of batteries, seeing that they do not carelessly waste ammunition.

8. Cavalry to fall back gradually before enemy, reporting by courier every hour. When near our line, Wheeler will move to the right, and Wharton to the left, to cover and protect our flanks and report movements of enemy. Pegasus to fall in the rear and report to Commanding General as a reserve.

9. To-night, if the enemy has gained his position in front ready for action, Wheeler and Wharton, with their whole commands, will make a night march to the right and left, turn the enemy's flank, gain his rear, and vigorously assail his trains and rear guard, blocking the roads and impeding his movements in every way, holding themselves ready to assail his retreating forces.

10. All Quartermasters, Commissaries and Ordnance officers will remain at their proper posts, discharging their appropriate duties. Supplies and baggage should be ready packed for a move forward or backward, as the result of the day may require, and the trains should be in position out of danger, teamsters all present and Quartermasters in charge.

11. Should we be compelled to retire, Polk's corps will move on Shelbyville, and Hardee's on the Manchester pike—trains in front, cavalry in rear.

(Signed)

BRAXTON BRAGG,

General Commanding.

THE SEARCH FOR THE ALABAMA.

The New York Tribune, in a piteous jeremiad over the exploits of the Alabama, says:—

And now, after twelve weeks' work, the following fleet is on the ocean, every vessel belonging to it a match for the Alabama, save in speed, and several well able to overhaul her:—

Vessels.	How long out.	Screw or Paddle.
Chippewa	A few weeks	Screw
Dacotah	Four weeks	Screw
Junata	Bound out	Screw
Keersage*	Three weeks	Screw
Minnesota	Ordered off	Screw
Powhatan	Some weeks	Screw

†Called from Europe.

It may seem strange that the energy and resources of the country cannot result in ridding the ocean of a pestering pirate. Officers of the highest standing give the following reasons for this:—

1st. In the Alabama everything is sacrificed for speed. It would not do to build men-of-war on that plan before the pirate's peculiarities were known, and since the most expeditious constructor could not have completed her equal.

2nd. The difficulty of finding one small ship on the wide ocean, especially when she can have as bright a look-out as her competitor, and can get out of the way with great alacrity.

3rd. There is not in the United States, to be purchased for love or money, a steamer possessing the speed necessary to catch her, and at the same time the strength to fight her.

CAPTAIN REDMOND BURKE.

(From the Richmond Despatch.)

Captain Redmond Burke, the famous scout and partisan, has fallen a victim to his daring and patriotism.—On the 25th of November, while on detailed service, near Shepherdstown, in Jefferson county, he was betrayed by one of a Union gang residing near, set upon while unsuspecting danger, and divested of his arms, and, spite of his undaunted resistance, murdered in cold blood. Even brave men might have surrendered under the circumstances, surrounded as he was by overwhelming numbers; but his bold spirit refused to submit to the indignity of being taken captive. He defended himself courageously, but could not escape. He fell pierced by many balls, amid the yells of his betrayers and murderers.

He was a brave, true-souled patriot. No heart in all our broad Confederacy beat truer, or with a warmer pulse of patriotism. With a moderate amount of education, he was yet a keen observer, and quick to understand. His virtues were a dauntless courage, a patriotism which nothing could affect, and a faithfulness in the execution of orders which rendered him a favourite with his general. Of Irish birth, and thus an adopted citizen of the Confederacy, he was not excelled by the native sons of the South in devotion to her honour and her interests. The very name of Yankee was hateful to him, and he pursued them, late and early, with what resembled a personal animosity. Taken prisoner on one of his daring scouts, he scaled the walls of his prison at Washington, and made his escape—only to recommence his career with new vigour. It was in the faithful performance of his duties that he fell a victim to his enemies.

Redmond Burke's name will always be recalled in connection with that of Major-General J. E. B. Stuart. He early became a favourite with that commander, and rendered him important service on many occasions. The public and appropriate recognition of these services came in the form of a commission from the State of Virginia, as captain of cavalry—and he justified, in the amplest manner, the confidence thus reposed in him by the great Commonwealth on whose border his exploits were performed. Whenever the exigencies of the situation demanded the services of a brave and accomplished scout to observe the position or movements of the enemy—to divine their intentions or unmask their designs—Redmond Burke was selected to perform the duty. The information which he brought was, in almost every instance, of the utmost value; and his diligent and thorough execution of orders secured for him the entire confidence of his general.

The romantic incidents which characterized these expeditions have already become the subject of public notice and newspaper comment. The narrative of his escape from the prison in Washington reads like a chapter from some volume of fiction; but this was only one of a hundred such adventures equally romantic and absorbing. In truth, it may be said that Burke's daily life was made up of romances; spent as it was on the scout, the partisan expedition, or the sudden foray on his foes. In this "good work" he never rested. To hunt down the enemies of the South, and slay them in fair fight—man against man, and steel to steel—was the chosen occupation of his life. Already old and gray-haired, age had not chilled the hot flow of his Irish blood, nor dimmed the eye that never covered before a foe.

It is not rhetoric, or exaggeration, to say that the services of this brave partisan were invaluable—that the place of Redmond Burke cannot be easily filled. He has fallen in the faithful execution of his duties—a valiant sentinel at his post upon the dangerous border. The sharp crack of his carbine is stilled—and the enemies of the South may rest more peacefully; but his name and fame will not be forgotten; his courage and patriotism will long be remembered.

A copy of the general order issued on the occasion of his death will appropriately conclude this hasty tribute to the brave partisan's memory:—

"HEADQUARTERS CAVALRY DIVISION, December 3, 1862.

"General Orders No. 14.

"The Major-General of Cavalry announces, with the deepest regret, the death of Captain Redmond Burke, whose valuable services and heroic conduct on our border are historic.

"He was killed by a lurking foe in a night attack on his little band, on the 25th ult., at Shepherdstown, where he had been for some time stationed on detached service.

"He possessed a heart intrepid, a spirit invincible, a patriotism too lofty to admit of a selfish thought, and a conscience that scorned to do a mean act.

"A devoted champion of the South, his gray hairs have descended in honour to the grave, leaving a shining example of patriotism and heroic devotion to those who survive.

"By command of

"MAJOR-GENERAL J. E. B. STUART.

"Norman R. Fitzhugh, Major and A. A. G."

It is fit that this just and eloquent tribute to a tried and faithful soldier should be heard beyond the camp, and the friends and admirers of Redmond Burke will be glad to have thus, in an authentic and unquestionable form, the evidence of that high appreciation which his services commanded from the man whom, over and beyond all others in the world, he loved and honoured.

The following despatch was sent by General Gregg, of South Carolina, a few hours before his death, on the evening of the battle of Fredericksburg, at which he received his mortal wound:—

To his Excellency Governor Pickens.

I am severely wounded, but the troops under my command have acted as they always have done, and I hope we have gained a glorious victory. If I am to die now, I give my life cheerfully for the independence of South Carolina, and I trust you will live to see our cause triumph completely.

MANCY GREGG.

A PRAYER FOR THE ARMIES.

The following is the prayer for the armies in the Service of the Episcopal (Church of England) Church of the Confederate States. It is ascribed to Bishop Green, of Mississippi:—

Almighty God, whose Providence watcheth over all things, and in whose hands in the disposal of all events, we look up to Thee for Thy protection and blessing amidst the apparent and great dangers, with which we are encompassed. Thou hast, in Thy wisdom, permitted the many evils of an unnatural and destructive war to come upon us. Save us, we beseech Thee, from the hands of our enemies. Watch over our fathers, and husbands, and brothers, and sons, who, trusting in Thy defence and in the righteousness of our cause, have gone forth to the service of their country. May their lives be precious in Thy sight. Preserve them from all the dangers to which they may be exposed. Enable them successfully to perform their duty to Thee, and to their country, and do Thou, in Thine infinite wisdom and power, so overrule events, and so dispose the hearts of all engaged in this painful struggle, that it may soon end in peace and brotherly love, and lead not only to the safety, honour and welfare of our Confederate States, but to the good of thy people, and the glory of Thy great name through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

GOVERNOR LETCHER AND MR. FERNANDO WOOD.

The Governor of Virginia has repudiated all connection with the Northern reconstruction schemes. The following letter has appeared in the Richmond Whig:—

Executive Department, December 8, 1862.

To the Editor of the Whig.

I have read your editorial in the Whig of this morning, and return you my thanks for your prompt and emphatic denial of the allegation that I was favourable to a reconstruction of the Union. My opinion upon this subject has been freely expressed on all proper occasions—in messages, in proclamations, and in conversation. I quote from my Message of January 6th, 1862:—

"The occurrences of the past nine months have demonstrated conclusively that we cannot live together as equals under the Government of the United States; and the habitual violation of the provisions of the Constitution, and the open disregard of the laws, by President Lincoln and his officials, render governmental association between us impossible. Mutual respect between the citizens of the Southern Confederacy and those of the North has ceased to exist. Mutual confidence has been succeeded by mutual distrust, and mutual good-will by mutual aversion. No Government can be enduring which does not possess the affection and respect of the governed. It cannot be that the people of the Confederate States can again entertain a feeling of affection and respect for the Government of the United States. We have therefore separated from them; and now let it be understood that the separation is and ought to be final and irrevocable—that Virginia will, under no circumstances, entertain any proposition, from any quarter, which may have for its object a restoration or reconstruction of the Union, on any terms or conditions whatever."

I quote also from my proclamation, dated June 27th, 1862:—

The people of Virginia, by overwhelming majorities of their Convention and Legislature, have solemnly announced to the world the purpose of this Commonwealth—under no conceivable circumstances, again to acknowledge allegiance to, or unite the destinies of our people with, those of the United States."

The course they pursued previous to the war was more than sufficient to justify our separation from them; but their disgraceful violation of the Constitution, and of plighted faith since the war; their utter perversions of truth; their reckless disregard of justice and of the rights of property, and their departure, in numerous instances, from the usages of civilized warfare; the invasion of our homes, and the murder of our peaceful citizens, render a connection with them in future odious to our sense of honour and abhorrent to our feelings. It has produced an estrangement as enduring as if there was an impassable gulf between us.

From the time Virginia seceded, I have always been opposed to reconstruction.

It only remains for me to add, that I have no personal acquaintance with Mr. Fernando Wood, do not know that I have seen him, and have had neither correspondence nor communication, directly or indirectly, with him before or since this war commenced. I state further, that I have had no communication, verbal or written, with any Northern man, upon this subject, since Virginia seceded.

Respectfully, JOHN LETCHER.

THE LATE BRIGADIER-GENERAL J. K. DUNCAN.—The following is the official order announcing the death of the late and lamented officer, General J. K. Duncan.

Headquarters Department, No. 2, Murfreesboro', Tennessee, December 20, 1862.

General Orders, No. 157.

The General Commanding announces with deep regret, the death of Brigadier-General J. K. Duncan, Chief of Staff. He died at Knoxville, Tennessee, on the 18th inst., after a painful and protracted illness.

The army of the country will lament the loss of this distinguished soldier, at a time of life when he might with reason, have looked forward to a long career of usefulness and honour. An educated officer of fine attainments, he was among the first in this struggle to enter the service, and was content with a subordinate position. By his zeal, efficiency, and gallantry, he had so won the confidence of his Government, and the admiration of his associates in arms, as to attain a position second only in importance to that of commander-in-chief of an army. His heroic defence of the forts below New Orleans is known to all, and his name has gone down to history. Dead to his family and friends, he will still live in the hearts of his countrymen, as among the brightest and bravest spirits of the many who have given their lives to the holy cause of freedom.

By command of General Bragg.

GEO. G. GARNER,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

We quote this order to disprove the slanderous report recently circulated by the Northern press, that this officer had been tried before a court-martial at Richmond, and convicted of dishonourable motives in the surrender of the forts at the mouth of the Mississippi in May 1862.

TULLAHOMA.—This place, to which General Bragg fell back with his army, is in Coffee County, Tennessee, situated on Rock Creek, and offers admirable means of defence. It is seventy-one miles from Nashville, and thirty-two south of Murfreesboro', and lies immediately on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, where it is intersected by the M'Minville and Manchester Road, a line proposed to Dauville and Frankfort, Kentucky.

A FICTION.—The account of the Seven Days' Battle which appeared in the Cologne Gazette, purporting to be written by a Prussian officer in the Confederate service, has found its way to the South. The Richmond Enquirer assures its readers that it is "a mere invention, utterly without truth."

The Arkansas Legislature has imposed a fine of not less than $5000, nor more than $10,000, and imprisonment in the penitentiary from five to twenty-five years, upon parties caught trading with Yankees.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The French proposal has been rejected. We elsewhere print Mr. Seward's despatch. It arrives too late for notice this week, though it richly merits it. The document is of course wordy—as wordy as a novel in a halfpenny serial—it ignores palpable facts, it coolly asserts palpable falsehoods. It assumes the ignorance and idiocy of European statesmen. Mr. Seward is quite confident about restoring the Union, the Federal arms have been very successful, the “small territory” held by the “insurgents” is kept “in close blockade and siege,” and much more of the same stuff. It is manifest, however, that M. Drouyn de Lhays does not believe in this rosy statement of United States' affairs—and why? Mr. Seward is afraid he “has taken other light than the correspondence of this Government for his guidance in ascertaining its temper and finances.” We think it is probable. We are under the impression that if Mr. Lincoln and his Ministers were solemnly to assure the French Minister that China was a part of the Continent of America, or that the Atlantic Ocean had been dried up by one of Mr. Lincoln's proclamations, that the French Minister would not credit the tidings. Just now Mr. Seward's veracity is on trial amongst his own party. We should think this despatch ought to settle the question even to their satisfaction.

But though Mr. Seward thinks proper to peremptorily decline the French proposal, there are decided evidences of the desire of the Northern people to put an end to the war. We do not mean by this that the war is likely to soon come to an end, because the people in the United States have about as much governmental influence as the serfs of Russia, unless they should rise and clear out the White House. But the pacific longings are worthy of note, for they may bring about a revolution. For instance, the French proposal was received without public disapprobation. The New York Times says it can see no harm in Commissioners from the North and South meeting in Montreal or Mexico, and discussing the existing difficulties. The New York Journal of Commerce thinks the suggestion not only entitled to respectful but grateful consideration. Still more important than this reception of the French proposal is the action of the State Legislatures.

In the New Jersey Legislature on the 11th inst., a series of resolutions was introduced, calling upon the President to return to his original policy; and urging him to revoke his Emancipation Proclamation. They protest against the war being waged to reduce the seceded States to a territorial condition, and express an earnest desire for a speedy and honourable peace. The New Jersey Legislature has also appointed Commissioners to proceed to Richmond for the purpose of inviting the Southern States to join in a National Convention.

Resolutions have been introduced in the Indiana Legislature demanding the establishment of an armistice as soon as practicable, and a Convention of all the States, including those of the Confederacy, to be held at Nashville, Tennessee, on the 1st of June.

The Illinois Legislature has appointed Commissioners to confer with delegates from other States upon the condition of the country, to meet at Louisville, Kentucky, in March next, and has agreed upon a recess from the 11th proximo until June 1, in order to receive their reports. In consequence of the proceedings of the Democrats, the Abolition members have seceded from the Legislature, and threaten to revolutionize the State. Will Mr. Lincoln treat the seceders as rebels?

Kentucky has also appointed Commissioners to the Louisville Conference in March.

Mr. Seward is paying the penalty incident to the union of a long tongue and a short memory; or, perhaps, we should say a conveniently short memory. This time there is no doubt about his being in the wrong, for no sane person would think of preferring the denial of the Federal Secretary to the assertion of the French Minister. The publication of M. Mercier's despatch of the 13th of April, 1862, revealed to the Northerners that Mr. Seward, though such a fierce denouncer of the “rebels,” would be charmed to meet with them in the Senate. On the 9th inst., the Federal Senate passed a resolution requesting the President to acquaint that body with the character of Mr. Seward's conferences with the French Minister. In consequence of this Mr. Seward, on the 12th, laid before the President the correspondence between M. Mercier and himself, accompanied by a despatch denying explicitly that he had made any suggestions to M. Mercier or influenced him in any particular, and stating that M. Mercier's passport to cross the lines was furnished at his own request, and that he travelled in a strictly private and unofficial manner. It is supposed in Washington that, after this affair, official and personal intercourse between M. Mercier and Mr. Seward is impossible, and therefore that the former must be recalled or the latter dismissed.

The Federal official reports of the naval fight at Charleston have been published. Every effort is made to tone down that affair. It is called by Admiral Dupont, “a raid upon the blockading fleet,” but there is just as much pretence for calling the battle of Fredericksburg, “a Federal raid.” It is true the movements of the Northern commanders are always known, and the Confederates attack without giving notice, and we suppose this is what Admiral Dupont means by a raid. We confess we cannot see through these foggy excuses. Admiral Dupont says:—

I have to report that about 4 o'clock on the morning of the 31st ult., during the obscurity of a thick haze, two iron-clad gunboats came out of Charleston by the main ship channel, unperceived by the squadron, and commenced a raid upon the blockading fleet. * * * The Mercedita was the first vessel attacked. Her officers and crew had been particularly watchful during the night to look out for suspected vessels, and at 3 o'clock had slipped her cable and overhauled a troop steamer running for the channel by mistake. She had returned to her anchorage, and Captain Stellwagen had gone to his room for a short time, leaving Lieutenant Commander Abbot on deck, when one of the iron-clads suddenly appeared. Her approach was concealed by the haze and the mist of the atmosphere.

Now, as the exit of the Confederates was not seen, how could the Federals know the time of it?

They did not, for the Confederate vessels came out of Charleston long before 4 o'clock. Further, if the particularly vigilant Mercedita had been able at 3 o'clock to see a troop ship, and slip her cable to overhaul her, is it not a little wonderful the approach of the Confederate vessel could not be perceived? Commander Stellwagen having an inkling of this difficulty, says at the time of the attack the moon had just set. Very likely, but the Confederate vessels did not come from the depths of the sea, but approached on the surface before the moon had set. We quite believe the Mercedita was surprised, but we do not believe in the fog, or, as Admiral Dupont calls it, the “thick haze.” Commander Stellwagen gives a graphic narrative of the surrender of the Mercedita:—

At 4 o'clock I laid down. Lieut. Commander Abbott was on deck giving an order to Acting Master Dwyer about recovering the anchor, when they saw a smoke and a faint appearance of a vessel close at hand. I heard them exclaim, “She has black smoke.” “Watch, man the guns.” “Spring the rattle.” “Call all hands to quarters.” Mr. Dwyer came to the cabin-door, telling me “a steamboat was close aboard.” I was then in the act of getting my pea-jacket, and slipped it on as I followed him out. I jumped to the poop ladder, saw the smoke and a low boat, apparently a tug, although I thought it might be a little propeller for the squadron. I sang out, “Train your guns right on him—he ready to fire as soon as I order.” I hailed the steamer, “Ahoy! Stand clear of us and heave off. What steamer is that? I then ordered my men to fire on him, and told him, “You will be into us. What steamer is that?” His answer to the first and second hail was, “Hulloa!” The other replies were indistinct, either by intention or from having spoken inside of his mail armour, until in the act of striking us with his prow, when he said, “This is the Confederate States' steam ram.” I repeated the order, “Fire! Fire! Fire!” but no gun could be trained on him, as he approached us on the quarter, and struck us just aloft our aftermast with a 32-pounder, and fired a heavy rifle through us diagonally, penetrating the starboard side through our Normandy condenser, the steamdrum of our port boiler, and exploding against the port side of the ship, blowing a hole in its exit some four or five feet square. The vessel was instantly filled and enveloped with a cam. Reports were brought to me “that we were shot through both boilers; that the fires were put out by the steam and smoke; that a gunner and one man were killed; that a number of men were badly scalded; that the water was over the fire-room floor, and that the vessel was sinking fast.” The ram had cut us through at and below the water line on one side, and the shell had burst on the other side almost at the water's edge. After the ram struck she swung around under our starboard counter, her prow touching us, and hailed, “Surrender, or I'll sink you. Do you surrender?” After receiving the reports, I answered, “I can make no resistance. My boiler is destroyed.” The rebel then cried out, “Do you surrender?” I said, “Yes.”

After this the crew were paroled, and we should think that it is unnecessary to hold a commission to inquire whether or not the Mercedita belongs to the Confederates.

The report of Admiral Dupont admits that the Keystone State was terribly cut up, that the Augusta, Quaker City, and the Memphis were injured. We are under the impression that the admiral's despatch has not only been carefully written, but carefully edited, but no editing can conceal the fact that the Confederates gained a glorious victory.

Charleston, so continually threatened with destruction, is not yet attacked. When the news came of the raising of the blockade, we were told that the question would be settled by the immediate capture of the city. Since then we have had the usual medley of despatches from New York. The first telegram tells us: “The bombardment of Charleston is believed to have already commenced, and telegraphic news to that effect is hourly expected.” Why do the New Yorkers believe before there can be any possible grounds of belief? The expectation was doomed to disappointment, and we are then told: “No news of the commencement of the bombardment of Charleston has yet been received. The fleet that conveyed the expedition consisted of 125 vessels of all descriptions.” Finally, we are informed the attack on Charleston was postponed on account of a difference between Generals Hunter and Foster. It occurs to us that it is barely possible the expected resistance may have had something to do with the postponement of the attack.

Neither has the assault on Vicksburg been commenced. The Confederates have further increased the defending force, by sending there a large portion of the Army of Virginia and of the garrison of Mobile. Moreover, they have completed the railroad from Lebanon to Meriden, which enables them to rapidly concentrate their forces at Vicksburg. The Confederates are repairing the railroad at Okaloona that was destroyed by General Grant.

But if the Federals are afraid to attack the Confederate fortifications, they do not hesitate to destroy independent property. The correspondence of the St. Louis Democrat, dated Helena, Arkansas, February 3rd, states that General Gorman had commenced the destruction of the Levee at Yazoo Pass, on the Mississippi. By this project a large tract of country which separates the waters of the Mississippi from those of the Cold Water River will be laid under water to a depth sufficient to float vessels of light draught. The Cold Water leads into the Yazoo some 200 miles above Vicksburg, and is also navigable for vessels of light draught. It is believed to be a part of General Grant's plan of attack upon Vicksburg to take this means of communication for reaching the rear of the city, and for cutting off the Confederate supplies. When the tyrant of Spain was endeavouring to subdue his rebellious subjects in the Netherlands, the people, who were struggling for their liberty, cut the dykes and flooded their country; but in the present instance it is the invader that resorts to this expedient. The war, in fact, has become, with the Lincolnites and their New England adherents, a war of ferocious vengeance. If they could desolate the South and incite the negroes to murder the Southerners, their most earnest wishes would be gratified. When the day of reckoning comes, the savagery instigated by New England will not be forgotten.

We have to record another Confederate naval victory. On the 21st of January, the Federal gunboat Morning Light, and the barque Velocity, were captured off Sabine Pass, Texas. The Morning Light was totally destroyed. The day before this victory the Federal Commandant Bell had issued a proclamation declaring Sabine Pass to be under blockade. The attack was made in the same manner as that which resulted in the capture of the Harriet Lane.

The Houston Telegraph gives a description of the cotton-clads used in these engagements.

The steamboats thus protected are known as the Magruder fleet. Upon the boiler deck cotton bales two or three deep are piled up and securely fastened to frames built up from the hold of the boat. These extend all around the boilers and machinery. A row of cotton bales is also placed on the cabin, and another on the hurricane deck, to protect the sharpshooters. Sharpshooters and swivels from behind these upper breastworks are enabled in perfect safety to sweep the decks of the enemy, and thus prepare the way for boarders. These boats are armed with rifled 32s or larger guns. Quite likely some of the guns from the West-field, of which there are eight splendid Dahlgrens, may be put on some of the boats. These large guns are a single one in the bow of each boat, and there are small guns also in the stern. The boats must be fitted with wrought-iron bowsprits, very sharp at the end, and furnished with barbs, to enable them to fix on to the enemy's vessel. A steel prow, under also, does its work in scuttling the enemy. The wrought-iron bowsprits with barbs are of more importance than the steel prows, inasmuch as they enable our boats to fasten on to the enemy's ships until the crews can board. The crews are generally 150 or 200 men, armed with double-barrel guns, pistols, cutlasses, and bowie knives able to slash their way through anything. Once on the enemy's decks, nothing can prevent their taking the ship.

The gunboat New Era was attacked on the 25th January, near Island No. 10, by a party of Confederates who had with them three cannon. The Federal gunboat suffered severely from the enemy on land.

The Federal ram Queen of the West has returned from an expedition down the Mississippi, and according to the Northern newspapers she was reported to have sunk three Confederate steamers laden with provisions, taken fifty-six prisoners, and to have gone within range of the Confederate guns at Port Hudson. It seems these doings are imaginary, for Colonel Ellis, her commander, in his official report, states that he failed in an attempt to destroy the Confederate steamer City of Vicksburg. He says his shells set fire to the Confederate vessel, but that the flames were extinguished, and in turn the bales of cotton by which his boat was protected took fire from the enemy's shells, which caused him to desist from the attack; but he makes no allusion to the sinking of the steamers or to the visit to Port Hudson. It is probable that the Queen of the West got the worst of the only encounter she had on her expedition. If she had destroyed much property a full account of it would have been given in the official report.

The Army of the Potomac is being dismembered—perhaps the best thing that can be done with an army thoroughly demoralized and daily melting away. About 35,000 men are to proceed to North Carolina, under the command of General Burnside, and a portion of them have already left the Rappahannock. This will relieve General Lee from the necessity of remaining in strong force in Virginia, and the Confederates will not think that the presence of a portion of the demoralized Army of the Potomac will add to the Federal strength in the West. A considerable portion of the Army of the Potomac must be kept in the neighbourhood of Washington for the protection of that city.

The New York Herald gives the following account of what was reported by telegraph as "a successful reconnaissance on the 7th inst." :—

A rash attempt to force the picket lines of the enemy six miles from Yorktown, last Saturday, was made by Captain Faith, of the 5th Pennsylvania Cavalry, which resulted in his men being drawn into an ambush near the "Nine Mile Ordinary," and thirty of them being killed. He was himself mortally wounded. His second in command, Captain Hagerston, was taken prisoner, as were the two lieutenants (Williams and Little) who were serving as volunteers.

The Richmond Despatch reports a second unsuccessful attack upon Fort M'Allister by the iron-clad Montawk, four gunboats, and one mortar-boat, on the 1st. It seems that iron-clad batteries are as invulnerable, if not more so, than iron-clad gunboats.

The Confederates have been repulsed in an attack on Fort Donnellson. The Federals in the fort were surrounded, and had fired their last round of ammunition when the Federal gunboats arrived and shelled the Confederates.

The following items are reported in the Northern papers :—

Accounts are received of an advance of a Federal foraging expedition twenty miles from Murfreesborough on the 30th ult. The Confederate cavalry were encountered and driven back some distance, but were afterwards reinforced, and repulsed the Federals, with a loss of 300 killed and wounded. The Confederate loss is not stated.

The town of Woodbury, Tennessee, previously reported to have been occupied by the Federals, was recaptured by the Confederates, under General Morgan, on the 26th ult.

Twenty-five of the Confederate General Morgan's men are reported to have attacked a Federal wagon train in Tennessee, under an escort of 400 men, and to have succeeded in carrying off eleven of the waggons and thirty prisoners.

The Federal cavalry in Tennessee surprised the Confederates encamped at Middletown and Franklin on the 2nd inst. The Confederate Major Douglass, all his officers, 125 prisoners, and their camp, equipage, horses, waggons, &c., were captured.

The Federals are reported to have entered Lebanon, Tennessee, on the 8th inst., and to have captured Paul Anderson, a member of the Confederate Legislature, and 600 other prisoners.

General Hunter has ordered a conscription of all able-bodied men in his district. The negroes may well pray to be delivered from their friends.

Mr. Sumner has introduced a bill into the Senate to enrol 300,000 negro soldiers; but he did not say how they were to be procured. Besides, it seems that the Federal troops decline to be associated with the negroes. On Ship Island there was considerable trouble on account of the arrival of some negro soldiers. A New York paper says: "We have an interesting report of the operations of the 1st South Carolina Volunteers (coloured) recently in Georgia and Florida. At St. Simon and Jekyll Islands they captured a quantity of railroad iron, valued at $5000, besides live stock and farming utensils." This may be true, but Federal troops and Federal officers did not require the aid of negroes to teach them how to steal.

We need hardly observe that the Florida has not been destroyed. She was chased by the Federal steamer Sonoma off the Bahamas on the 1st and 2nd inst. for thirty-six hours, but owing to her superior speed, the Sonoma was distanced, and gave up the pursuit.

The irrepressible conflict in the North in reference to the negro is daily extending. A joint resolution was introduced in the New Jersey Legislature on the 3rd inst. opposing the purchase of the emancipated Missouri slaves. The resolution declares that while New Jersey is ready to contribute its quota of the legitimate expenses of the Government, it will not submit to taxation for the special benefit of one State, and gives notice that it will not consider any debt so contracted in the light of an obligation.

An Illinois regiment has been placed under arrest for refusing to fight under the Emancipation Proclamation.

The Federal General, Loan, commanding the central district of Missouri, has issued orders that all bushwhackers, guerrillas, and other parties found engaged in irregular warfare against the United States in his district, shall be summarily executed. If these orders are carried out, General Loan's officers will be treated as felons, a fate they will deserve.

General McClellan is becoming the idol of the North. The Municipality of Boston refused to extend to him any hospitality, but this Municipality is the insignificant tool of the fanatics. The New York Assembly, by a vote of 95 against 4, has authorized the Governor to invite General McClellan to visit Albany as the guest of the State. This honour must be exceedingly mortifying to the Lincoln Administration.

The Secretary of War has ordered a court of inquiry to be held at Cairo to ascertain if any, and what, Federal officers have been engaged in trafficking in cotton on the Mississippi, granting licenses of trade, or using Government transportation for private purposes. This court, it is supposed, will investigate the charges current against General Butler during his Administration at New Orleans.

Mr. Chase's financial scheme has passed the Senate, and it is thought in Wall-street that it will certainly pass the House of Representatives.

ENGLAND.

The returns from Lancashire this week show an increase in five unions of 710 paupers, and a decrease in twelve of 3860, leaving a net decrease of 3150. The condition of the distressed districts has been the subject of much discussion in Parliament; but no important information has been elicited, and no hopes of any great amelioration in the condition of the trade have been held out, even by the most sanguine. It has even been suggested—and by Lancashire members—that all that now remains to be done is to withdraw from the idle factories as large a portion as possible of their unemployed labourers. It would appear, therefore, that without acknowledging it to themselves, farsighted men are beginning to be aware that the continuance of the American war must involve, not the temporary suspension merely, but the permanent ruin of the cotton manufacture. We hardly think that the Government or the public are prepared for this; and we believe that if they would only look the situation fairly in the face, they would be disposed to think somewhat differently of the duties and the necessities which it involves. England, without the cotton manufacture, would almost cease to be England.

The Central Relief Committee held a general meeting at Manchester on Monday. The principal topic of discussion was the provision of employment for the persons thrown out of work by the cotton famine. The funds received from New South Wales have hitherto been appropriated to this special purpose; but complaints on that subject have been preferred in the colony, where considerable misapprehensions seem to exist, and it was therefore resolved to merge the sum received thence in the general fund, and to make from that fund all the disbursements, past and future, required for the maintenance of schools and sewing-classes. It was stated that the sewing-classes find employment for 64,000 girls and young women, who would otherwise be idle, and exposed to all the dangers consequent on idleness; and that about 20,000 men and boys find occupation in the schools. There are 25,000 for whom work has not been found. Many landowners in the neighbourhood have taken the opportunity of making extensive improvements, in order to afford work to as large a number as possible of their destitute neighbours. It was determined that every possible effort should be made to induce the public to employ the destitute operatives; all the Committee being deeply conscious of the demoralizing effects likely to result from long-continued idleness and dependence. Mr. Farnall laid before the Executive Committee the following table, showing the number of persons dependent on charity in the various districts therein named :—

A prosecution for heretical opinions published long ago has been commenced in the Court of the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford University, against Mr. Jowett, Regius Professor of Greek. That gentleman is a man of great ability and a most distinguished scholar. His views are generally thought—and we certainly think them—inconsistent with the teachings of the Church. But as he maintains the contrary, we think that the present prosecution is ill-advised. The judgment of the Court, if it should pronounce any judgment, would carry no sort of weight, and most people would consider Mr. Jowett's opinion as to the compatibility of his views with those of the Church more reliable than that of a chance judge, who was never intended to exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and who may very possibly be quite devoid of theological knowledge. If Mr. Jowett were to be tried before a competent ecclesiastical court, we should approve the prosecutors and desire their success; but we cannot give our approval to a proceeding like the present, which seems to us to be simply "frivolous and vexatious."

The debates in the House of Lords are, perhaps, less interesting than they might be if a vote in that House were likely ever to produce a change of Ministry. But they are not wanting, either in practical importance, or in political significance. Especially in regard to foreign affairs, the views of the most enlightened and influential members of the aristocracy of England must carry great weight, both with the people and with foreign nations. And it is only men of character and influence who take a prominent part in the debates of the Upper House. Lord Derby and Lord Ellenborough, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, Earl Grey, Lord Russell, and even Lord Malmesbury and the Duke of Newcastle, express more by their speeches than is conveyed in their mere words. They are the leaders of opinion among the highest and best informed classes of English society; and on those questions—and they are many and most momentous—on which the nation is guided by the highest classes, their views may be understood to carry with them the whole weight attaching to the national opinion of England. This makes the discussions in the House of Lords on such questions as that of the Polish insurrection and the Russo-Prussian convention exceedingly important: and the censure of that House will probably have more weight with foreign Powers than the angriest denunciations in the House of Commons. It is the condemnation of statesmen and aristocracies, not the declamation of popular assemblies, which carries a sting to the feelings of Courts and Cabinets abroad.

The eldest son of Sir F. Powell Buxton, the leader of the Abolitionists in the struggle which terminated in the emancipation of the negroes and the ruin of the West Indies, has written to the Times, expressing the strongest disapproval of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, as tending to excite servile insurrection, and showing that his father held such incentives to rebellion and massacre in utter abhorrence.

Preparations are making everywhere to celebrate with illuminations, fireworks, public dinners, and festivities of all sorts, the wedding-day of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The Ministers have at length consented to introduce a Bill enabling bankers and others with commercial engagements falling due on the 7th, the day of the Princess Alexandra's landing, to make holiday and close their places of business. The nominal reason for this change of conduct is the alleged danger of attempting to carry on business in the midst of the immense crowds expected. The truth we suspect to be that a strong social pressure has been put on the Ministers, and that they are beginning to be ashamed of the ungracious appearance of their first refusal.

The Times has the following comment on the conduct of the State of Alabama in paying so punctually the interest due on its bonds: "The Bank of Mobile have remitted a large sum (about £40,000 it is believed) in specie, to meet, up to July 1864, the interest on the Bonds of the State of Alabama, payable in London at the Union Bank. Considering that Alabama is one of the Confederate States that have undergone the most severe trials from the war, this provision must be considered to entitle her to marked commendation." We believe that Alabama is not the only one of the Confederate States which has punctually met the demands of her creditors, in spite of the cruel pressure put upon them by the war.

The Times also says: "The final arrangements for the proposed loan of £3,000,000, on the security of cotton, have been made between Messrs. Erlanger and Co., of Paris and Frankfurt, and the Confederate Government, with the consent of Congress, and the particulars will probably be issued in a day or two."

It seems, from all signs at present apparent, that unless Ministers commit some wholly gratuitous folly, there will be no great party fight this session. The Conservatives are certainly strong enough to have a fair chance of ejecting their adversaries. But it is understood that the Earl of Derby does not wish to come into power until he has a majority in the House of Commons. His lieutenants are wanting in what we may call Parliamentary courage; they have not the boldness to determine on a policy and stick to it; they wait to have their way smoothed for them by Ministerial blunders and indicated by public clamour. Lord Russell has done his utmost to give them a chance; but they have failed to profit by his errors. Mr. Disraeli is a good tactician; but he evidently shrinks from hazarding a pitched battle except on ground of his own choosing. He is probably waiting for some occasion on which he may detach the Radicals from their Ministerial allies, and beat the latter in detail. The bulk of the Conservative party, however, are hardly to be depended upon on such an occasion. Much as they hate Mr. Gladstone and Earl Russell, they hate Mr. Bright and Mr. Cobden more. When they see their leader moving into the same lobby with these men, they begin to waver and hesitate. They are glad enough to see a hope of turning out their adversaries; but at any symptoms of an accord with the Manchester school, they begin to doubt. If Mr. Bright is with them, they fancy that they must be wrong. They don't want to conquer by his aid; and they begin to murmur against their leader when they see him using such an instrument. They do not care to "cast out devils through the Prince of the Devils."

An "emancipation" meeting was held at Manchester on Tuesday night. The characters of the speakers may be gathered from the following quotation from Mr. J. Patterson's speech as reported in the Daily News.

"He did not approve of the meeting recently held in the Mansion House, when the Lord Mayor received the Ambassador of the Powers of Darkness, the Minister of a hell-born Confederacy!"

EUROPE.

The latest intelligence from Poland is, upon the whole, unfavourable to the patriotic cause. There is a concurrence of testimony to the effect that the Russians have inflicted several severe defeats upon the insurgents in those very districts in which the insurrection had made most way. As to the actual results of particular fights the reports do not agree; they are for the most part absolutely irreconcilable and unreliable, and we abstain, consequently, from all details; but the general impression left by them is that which we have given. We have pointed out before that, whilst the insurrection embraced the whole southern half of the kingdom, its strength was concentrated in that south-western corner which is bounded by Prussian Silesia and the territory of the former republic of Cracow. Langiewicz and Kurowski were both said to be encamped in this district, and each was credited, by sympathizing accounts, with an army of several thousand men. Both have sustained severe defeats; and although the actual losses of the insurgents may not have greatly exceeded those of the Russians, the revolutionary commanders have sustained very damaging checks. Cracow is described as one house of mourning when the fugitives reached it, bringing the particulars of the engagements. We learn from Russian sources that the insurgents have also been beaten upon the Bug, but the story has not yet sufficient corroboration. The general result is, as we have said, in favour of the Russians, so far as the kingdom of Poland itself is concerned. The northern part of the kingdom, and generally the provinces which border upon Prussian territory, with the exception of the district at the extreme south-west, seem to be, if not under Russian authority, at all events not in the hands of the rebels. There is a story, indeed, to the effect that the insurgents have a large force in Augustowo, but we can hardly believe that if this were so we should not have heard something more definite about them. Augustowo is bordered for almost its whole length by Eastern Prussia, and if the insurgents were really its masters we should have learnt something about them from Königsberg and Gumbinnen. On the other hand, the absolute want of all intelligence from Lithuania is suggestive of an extensive development of the insurrection in that quarter. It has been a great point with the Poles to carry the war thus into the heart of Russia, and these old portions of the great republic were certainly quite as ripe for a rising as the so-called kingdom of Poland. Some time must elapse before anything can be heard of the events in these provinces, except through the Russian Government, and as it has not chosen to furnish any information, we are justified in presuming that it is not satisfied with the turn affairs are taking. It is now placed beyond all doubt that the Russian soldiers are allowed, or rather are encouraged, to commit the most horrible outrages. The towns they capture they reduce to ashes; the inhabitants they rob or murder as the whim seizes them; they spare neither age nor sex, and take no trouble to discriminate between friend or foe; they burnt the family seat of the Zamoyskis, after robbing it of its most valuable treasures; they have plundered and burnt equally the mansions of noblemen who disapprove the insurrection. The worst that can be said of the Poles themselves is, that excited, by these brutalities, they give little quarter when they chance to be victorious. To so great a length have these excesses of the troops gone, that the Archduke Constantine has issued an order directing the officers to maintain the strictest discipline, and to prevent the robbing or ill-treatment of persons not participating in the insurrection. It is bad enough to have to chronicle the perpetration of these outrages. It is worse to be obliged to recognize in them a heavy blow to our hopes for the success of the Poles. Europe had been led to believe that the Russian soldier would in a contest with Poland prove quite unreliable. We see now that, although his officers may have read the publications of Herzen, and have sympathized with Poland, the common soldier takes very cordially to the work of murdering Poles.

The Polish insurrection is the question of the day in Paris. The atrocities avowed by the Russians, the ostentatious intervention of Prussia, have roused all the old sympathies of France for Poland. A great sensation was created on Saturday, by an article in the Constitutionnel, declaring that the intervention of Prussia had rendered the insurrection a European question, and denouncing that intervention in the strongest terms. The article was assumed to express the sentiments of the Government and foreshadow its action. The Democratic journals, like the Opinion Nationale and the Siecle, redoubled their thunder, and the impression got abroad that the French Government had already addressed energetic remonstrances to Prussia and Russia. The Patrie, which also has pretensions to official information, announced that a despatch, full of remonstrance, had been forwarded, couched, however, in moderate terms; but the Constitutionnel, as if frightened at the monster it had raised, professed itself on Monday astonished at the excitement on the Bourse, and declared that up to the present time the French Government had done nothing beyond enter into communication with the Cabinet of London, in order to agree upon the course which should be followed in the matter. We are disposed to accept this as an accurate statement of the facts. In the absence of the particulars as to the character of the convention, the French Government will hardly have addressed Prussia in the imperious tone ascribed to it. La France takes care to point out that there can be no question of an interference by the Western Powers on behalf of the independence of Poland. All that they can ask is the grant of those national institutions promised by the treaties which confirmed Russia in her possessions. The Opinion Nationale gives a rumour that Prussia has already refused to listen to the representations of the French Ambassador, and the Constitutionnel says only a warning has yet been given—the Prussian Government will hardly desire that it should be a threat. We have observed elsewhere that we have little hope that the Prussian Government will pay more attention to a threat than to a warning; and the question arises, what next? The English Liberal journals insist that the Emperor must declare war against Russia and Prussia, operate upon the Rhine, and send help to the Poles. As the Daily News, with a charming naïveté puts it, he ought to go to war to vindicate treaties; this is to say, the Emperor, whose successful mission it has been to destroy the Treaty of Vienna, is to declare war in its name. The question is one for the Emperor and France and not for England. The time is not favourable for a war upon such an immense scale as a war with Russia and Prussia would be. Beginning about Poland, Poland would soon cease to be thought of by the combatants. The Emperor will assuredly not resort to war until every other means have been employed to obtain justice for Poland; and even if his remonstrances should be disregarded, it may be questioned whether he will deem it good for French interests to plunge the whole Continent in war.

A report that M. Fould had resigned—a report which is revived every other day—obtained one day this week more credence than usual, and the Bourse closed that day very flat. It seems, like all the previous reports, to have had no other foundation than the difficulties of the Finance Minister's position. The resolution of the Emperor to go to war might possibly have the resignation of the Minister for its immediate consequence.

The Opinion Nationale is to be prosecuted for inciting citizens to hate each other, an offence under the Code Napoleon, and not created by the laws of public safety. The incriminated article drew a contrast between the conduct of the manufacturers of Rouen and those of Alsace, very much to the disadvantage of the former. They were represented as having set themselves to produce cheaply, and in that pursuit to have reduced their labourers to beggary, with but small advantage to themselves. The manufacturers of Alsace, on the other hand, have sought to perfect their products and raise them to the height of works of art—handsome profit to themselves and comfortable wages to their men being the result. The writer draws an appalling picture of the distress in Rouen and its neighbourhood. The Cauchais weavers, he says, feed upon the leaves of the Colza plant. "Mothers take their daughters in their teens to the police office, and have them inscribed on a register which devotes them to infamy for life, and when remonstrated with, reply, 'We have no bread.'"

The Prussian Government is pouring troops in to its Polish provinces. Posen is put under a regime which is little less intolerable than a state of siege, although the German inhabitants of the province, who are not prone to judge their Polish fellow-citizens too moderately, have declared that there is not the slightest danger of disturbance. The exact terms of the convention with Russia are not known. Herr von Bismark Schonhausen was interpellated upon the subject in the House of Deputies, but refused to give any reply. A debate, however, followed this refusal, in which the conduct of the Government was severely censured; and the Minister declared that no remonstrances had been made by England or France—a statement true perhaps in the letter, but not in the spirit. The House, however, has determined to formally pronounce its opinion in favour of non-intervention. A motion to that effect has been submitted by two Liberal deputies, has been accepted by the Committee appointed to examine it, and will, no doubt, be adopted by the House almost unanimously. It will not have the slightest effect upon the policy of the Government.

Although Herr von Bismark declined to give the House any information about the convention, he seems to have talked freely enough about it to different members. A conversation he had with Herr Behrends, one of the Vice-Presidents of the Chamber, member for Dantzic, and therefore considerably interested in the matter, has been mentioned, not only in the newspapers, but in the House. The Minister is reported to have declared that the convention gives the Russian troops freedom of action for three miles (twelve English miles) within the Prussian territory—a concession which, considering the great distance along which the Prusso-Russian frontier runs, is practically handing over to all the horrors of war a very large slice of Prussia. Herr von Bismark is also said to have hinted that Russia was getting tired of the kingdom of Poland, and might be disposed to hand it over to Prussia. We should add that the Minister is said to have talked in this way "after dinner," and to show unmistakably after dinner that he had been dining.

The remonstrances of France and England are not likely to change the policy of the Prussian Government. The convention is much more the child of the King than of his Minister, and King William is an obstinate man, who will not be frightened by any threats from France. On the contrary, the party which surrounds him is evidently calculating upon using those threats to obtain a decisive triumph over the Liberals. They reckon, and not without reason, that any French demonstration on the Rhine would revive the German feeling against France. A declaration of war by France against Prussia would paralyze the House of Deputies. It could not refuse the supplies necessary for the defence of the country, and in the excitement of the contest it would be almost forgotten. We believe that King William would rather risk a war with France than give way to the House of Deputies.

The House has resolved to examine the budget for 1863, and hold the Ministers personally responsible for the expenditure of 1862. Herr von Bismark and his colleagues do not seem to be much impressed by the threat.

The Germans have a way of showing their sympathy with the Prussian House of Deputies in its great constitutional fight, which inflicts considerable inconvenience upon the President of the House, Herr Grabow. When they meet together upon any public occasion, they toast the House of Deputies. That is all very well; but in the excess of their enthusiasm they insist upon acquainting the President with the fact that they have just emptied a glass of Rhine wine, and exercised their lungs in several loud "hochs," in honour of the body of which he is the organ. So they send Herr Grabow telegrams that he may be put in immediate electrical rapport with them. There is nothing very objectionable in this, although, it seems a sad waste of money; but the telegrams, although sent at an early hour of the morning, sometimes reach Berlin very late at night, and Herr Grabow is knocked up just as he gets comfortably to sleep, to sign receipts for the messages. Five times in one cold week the sympathy of his countrymen dragged him out of bed. That sympathy, however, sometimes takes a very agreeable form, the wine growers of the Moselle and of the Rhine gau have sent him some choice samples of the vintages of 1858. For although the Rhine gau is in the Duchy of Nassau, the proceedings of the Prussian Parliament are followed there, and indeed in all other parts of Germany, with almost as much interest as in Prussia itself. As we are speaking of President Grabow, we may mention that the Berlin newspapers have been extremely scandalized by what they consider a gross insult offered to the representatives of the people in his person. The President attended some royal reception, and in the course of his peregrinations found his way into a room, from which he was immediately desired by the officials to withdraw; that was cruel treatment enough, but there is more to tell; the poor gentleman could not get a chair to sit upon. A deliberate design to insult the House is built upon these trivialities.

The telegraphic summary of Signor Mingheiti's speech gave the impression that the Ministers asked from the Italian Parliament the authorization to contract a loan for the nominal sum of seven hundred million of lire, or twenty-eight millions sterling. It seems, however, that what the Minister has really asked is, the authority to realise for the Treasury seven hundred millions, that is to say, at present prices to contract a loan for at least a thousand millions. The Minister calculates his total deficiency to 1866 at 1325 million lire, thus made up—

Actual deficit for 1862	..	375 millions
Estimated „ for years, 1863-6	..	950 „

which he proposes to provide for in this manner,—

By the Loan	..	700 millions,
Sale of Public Bonds	..	500 „
Treasury Bonds	..	150 „

We can only hope that Signor Mingheiti's estimate may turn out accurate. But in the present state of affairs a good many Powers are likely to come into the loan market. This competition may materially interfere with the operations of the Italian Treasury, and we can scarcely believe in the capacity of Italy to purchase Crown lands to the amount of five hundred million lire in four years.

The news this week from the Danubian Principalities is interesting. The National Assembly of the Danubian Principalities has passed a resolution to the effect that official legations should be appointed to the principal courts of Europe. Prince Couza replied that, although his personal wishes went with the resolution, he was obliged to dissent from it, as its adoption would create diplomatic difficulties. The Principalities, although practically almost independent, are nominally under the sovereignty of the Porte. The object of the National Assembly, in that, a true exponent of the wishes of the people, is to throw off the suzerainty and obtain their recognition as an independent nation. We may accept their ultimate success in these endeavours as assured. At present England and Austria will take care that their wishes are not gratified. Letters from Bucharest make much mention of intrigues to place the Duke de Leuchtenburg upon the throne of the Principalities. In the present embarrassments of Russia, it is quite needless to take notice of such a project, even if it should be seriously entertained.

There has been another revolution in Greece; just as peaceable as the former and quite as effective. It seems that Canaris, one of the members of the Provisional Government, resigned, whereupon the two other members, Bulgaris and Roupfos, formed a new Ministry, to which the National Assembly gave its approbation. However, either the resignation of Canaris or the composition of the new Cabinet was disagreeable to that portion of the sovereign people which inhabits Athens. A popular demonstration, in which a part of the garrison assisted, made the fact known. Bulgaris and Roupfos resigned their positions as members of the Provisional Government, the new Ministers resigned, and the National Assembly invested President Moraitini with the executive power. The want of a regular established Government is creating the greatest evils throughout Greece. Earl Russell has apparently given up his efforts to find a king for Greece; the Greeks themselves, faithful to their first love, insist upon having Prince Alfred, or no other king. Would it not be well to leave the Greeks to settle the matter for themselves? They cannot have the king they want. Europe cannot find them another. Ought not their future to be left in their own hands, to make or mar? The suspense is throwing the whole country into disorder. Why should not the Greeks be allowed to constitute a republic?

The Sultan has resolved to economize, a hatt has been published, in which he gives up 20 per cent. of his own civil list, orders the reduction of official salaries, and the dismissal of superfluous employes. En revanche, he builds barracks, increases his army, and buys warlike stores, we fear that the balance of the two operations will not be favourable to the Turkish exchequer.

BRAZIL.

The excitement occasioned by the proceedings of Mr. Christie and Admiral Warren has not diminished at Rio Janiero. The National Defence Fund is augmented every day by very liberal donations, and king and people seem to vie with each other in the determination to make any sacrifice necessary for the defence of the national honour. We fear that this feeling will not be lessened by the despatch with which Earl Russell attempts to conclude the question by intimating, in that magnanimous manner in which a bully may deal with a poor fellow whom he has just victimized, that by-gones should be by-gones, and that, having got all he demanded, he is content to be on good terms with Brazil. The correspondence which has been laid before Parliament supplies no new information; it only assures us of what we were already well informed, that Mr. Christie only acted in accordance with instructions from Earl Russell, and, although the outrage was undoubtedly aggravated by the ill temper of the Minister, the ultimate responsibility rests upon the Foreign Secretary. According to the Nord the French Government has sent a dispatch to Rio Janiero, expressing great sympathy with the Brazilian Government.

It is now said that the Spanish Cortes are positively to be dissolved. Why, does not appear. They have given the Ministry a large majority whenever it wanted one, and that surely ought to have spared them a little longer.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 19.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Earl of Derby gave notice that he should move for papers relative to the Polish insurrection.—After a short passage of arms between Lord Normanby and Lord Russell with regard to the French occupation of Rome, Lord Carnarvon rose to call attention to the present state of prison discipline. A Royal Commission had lately been issued to inquire into the working of the system of penal servitude, he should therefore limit his remarks to the case of prisoners confined for short periods in county and borough gaols. Above 130,000 passed through these gaols in the course of the year, and he was sorry to say that in the last year of which we had the returns a great increase had taken place, particularly in the worse class of crimes. He complained that prison discipline was not sufficiently penal, and that it was varied and uncertain. The "hard labour" to which prisoners were sentenced was exceedingly light, and the dietary was far too liberal. Criminals were far better fed than paupers or agricultural labourers. Neither of these latter had meat, except occasionally; criminals had meat almost every day. Again, punishment for infractions of prison rules had become exceedingly rare, chiefly on account of the sentimentalism of chaplains and prison inspectors. He entered into details to show the variety of treatment in different prisons, and the difference of expenditure, ranging from £16 to £90 per prisoner. Punishment ought to be deterrent, but under the present system imprisonment had almost ceased to be formidable to the criminal.—Earl Granville admitted that both as to labour and as to diet the system in county gaols was probably too lenient; at the same time it must be remembered that the diet which would keep free men in health would not suffice for prisoners. The power of Government over county gaols was very limited, and strong objections were felt to increasing that power. He thought it might be advisable to have a Committee to consider the matter.—The Earl of Malmesbury supported Lord Carnarvon's views. He said that paupers received from 2s. 6d. to 3s. 6d. per week; prisoners were maintained at a cost from 10s. to 12s. Prisoners received a more liberal diet, in many gaols, than soldiers and sailors. Such contrasts tended to demoralize the people, and to encourage crime.—Lord Wodehouse said that on an average of years crime was diminishing. The great fault of our system was the want of uniformity in our different prisons; still, in all separate confinement and hard labour were inflicted. He approved of the treadmill, as being a deterrent kind of labour; as for the diet, he thought it was certainly made too agreeable; but the universal report of the medical officers was that it could not be made less nutritious without injuring the health of the prisoners. He thought some greater power should be given to the Home Office to enforce some uniform system.—Lord Wensleydale supported Lord Carnarvon, and said that in Prussia the prisoners only received meat on four days in the year, and yet were kept in good health.—Lord Truro urged that the prohibition of spirits rendered extra food necessary.—The Marquis of Salisbury supported Lord Carnarvon.—Lord Cathcart said that confinement had a lowering effect on the system, and rendered extra food necessary.—The appointment of a Committee was agreed to.—In answer to the Earl of Dudley, Lord Granville said that Government would make no further change in the treatment of convicts until they received the report of the Royal Commission.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 19.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to Mr. Tite (President of the Institute of British Architects), the First Commissioner of Public Works said that some of the recent railways and bridges no doubt sadly disfigured the appearance of the capital, and he should be glad to attend to any suggestions on the subject from Mr. Tite or the Metropolitan members.—Mr. M'Mahon asked whether Government proposed to take any steps to remedy the inconveniences attending the present arrangement of judicial circuits?—The Attorney-General said that no change was proposed, except in reference to the Northern Circuit.—In answer to Mr. Stansfeld, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that no alteration was intended in the Spirit Duties.—The House went into Committee to consider the Queen's Message relating to a provision for the Prince of Wales. After a loyal exordium, in which he contrasted the advantages of constitutional monarchy with the evils incident to despotism and democracy, Lord Palmerston referred to precedents showing what provision had been made for previous heirs-apparent to the throne on their marriage. He said that in 1715 and 1745, that provision had been £100,000 per annum, in addition to the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall. In 1795 a still larger provision was made for the Prince who was afterwards George the Fourth. But under the present reign, contrary to the usual practice, the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall had been accumulated for the benefit of the Prince. Part of those accumulations had been invested in the purchase of a landed estate in Norfolk; part would be required for the outfit and establishment of the Prince. The remainder, with the probable income of the Duchy of Cornwall, will produce about £60,000. It was proposed to vote a further income of £40,000 a year, making a total of £100,000. A further allowance of £10,000 would be proposed for the Princess, with a jointure of £30,000 a year if she survived her husband.—Sir H. Wiloughby thought the House ought to have the accounts of the Duchy of Cornwall.—Mr. Augustus Smith objected to the grants. He said that the revenue of the Duchy of Cornwall amounted to £32,000 a year, and that the Prince received £16,000 a year from the Consolidated Fund.—The House listened with impatience, and constant cries of "Oh, oh," and "Divide."—Mr. Disraeli expressed his surprise at the conduct of Mr. Smith, and the rebuke which he administered to that gentleman was greeted with loud cheers. He said that the sum proposed was exceedingly moderate, and he hoped it would be sufficient; he thought that the Prince was fully entitled to any benefit he might derive from the improvement of the revenues of the Duchy.—Mr. Gladstone explained that the £16,000 paid to the Prince out of the Consolidated Fund was a compensation for certain duties on tin which had been abolished, and which would have produced a much larger revenue.—Sir John Trelawny, amid loud expressions of impatience, objected to the grant.—Mr. Bouverie stated that at the commencement of the present reign the net revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall did not exceed £12,000 a year, and the expenses of management were about £12,000. By the admirable management of the late Prince Consort the income has been raised to £50,000, and the expenses reduced to £8,000. He thought that public opinion out of doors would consider the proposal of the Government exceedingly moderate; it was much less than had been generally expected.—The whole of the propositions of the Government were agreed to nem. con.

Sir George Grey moved the second reading of a Bill to continue the law for the Punishment of Corrupt Practices at Elections.—Mr. H. Berkeley opposed it. He said the law ought to punish, not the elector who took a bribe, but the candidate who gave it. He showed that the present law did not prevent either bribery, treating, or intimidation.—Lord Henley objected to the rule that paid agents should not be allowed to vote.—Mr. Bentinck said that the annual discussion of that subject was an annual farce, for no one in or out of the House really thought bribery criminal. He thought testimonials to the members of Parliament (alluding to the sums received by Mr. Roebuck, and Mr. Cobden) quite as objectionable as bribes to voters.—Mr. Powell strongly objected to the disenfranchisement of constituencies in which corruption was proved to have taken place to a considerable extent; which he said was punishing the innocent for the guilty.—Mr. Phillips said that the Corrupt Practices Act had done a great deal of good.—Mr. Sergeant Pigott approved the Bill.—Lord Robert Montagu pointed out many methods of bribery which the law could not touch.—Mr. Packe suggested that public houses should be closed during polling hours.—Sir George Grey said in reply, that because the law could not do everything, that was no reason why it should not attempt to do what it could. He defended the rule prohibiting all persons engaged in the collection of revenue from voting at elections. He defended the temporary disenfranchisement of boroughs in which extensive bribery prevailed, saying that it would induce all respectable persons in the place to endeavour to ensure purity of election.—The Bill was then read a second time.

Mr. Villiers moved the second reading of his Bill to continue the Act of last year for relief of unions suffering from the cotton famine. He agreed to the suggestion that the Act should be only continued for six months more, in order to afford opportunity for further discussion; also to the proposal that the time for the repayment of money borrowed on security of the rates should be extended from seven to fourteen years. He said that the Act had had no such effect in producing laxity in the administration of the Poor Law as some persons had feared.—Colonel Patten said that he would not oppose the second reading, but he objected to the principle of the rate in aid. It was quite true that the property in Lancashire and Cheshire had increased in value by the cotton manufacture. But that increase of value was received by the landlords, whereas the burden of the rate in aid fell upon the occupants. He said that greater facility should be given to unions of raising money by loan. Some persons had wished that the extra rates should be paid by the owners of property; but the fact was, that the owners of property had already rated themselves in the way of voluntary contributions to a much greater amount than they could be called upon to pay by such a modification of the Poor Law.—Mr. Gregson said that if the American war were to end immediately we should receive plenty of cotton, but if not, we ought not to keep the operatives in demoralizing idleness. He had received a letter from India expressing the hopelessness of inducing the natives there to buy calico at the present prices, and he thought that, unless an increased supply of cotton could be obtained, we ought to assist our operatives to find other employment. He had seen a very curious document the other day, namely, a bond from the Southern States of America for 50,000 lbs. of Orleans cotton at 6d. per lb. deliverable at the termination of the war, at any port of shipment free of export duty, forty days after the presentation of the bonds. He thought the purchase of these bonds would be a very good speculation, and was himself rather tempted to buy one. By these bonds the South were enabled to obtain the sinews of war.—General Lindsay complained that the union of Wigan, where liberal local contributions had kept down the poor rates, had been obliged to assist other distressed unions.—

Mr. Egerton remarked that when a union extended into two counties, the Act provided that it should receive a rate in aid from that in which the greater part of it situated. This the Poor Law authorities interpreted to mean, not where the greater part of the rateable value was situated, but where the greater part of the area lay; and thus Macclesfield with a normal rate of 4s. 6d. had to contribute to the relief of Ashton, whose poor rate was usually very low.—Mr. Sydney said that the Consolidated Fund ought to bear the pressure of the cotton famine.—Mr. Humberston said the rate in aid was vicious in principle, and if adopted, ought to be made national.—Lord E. Howard said that in one union the relief of the poor required a rate of 24s. in the pound. The cottage owner, the shopkeeper, the small farmer, would be ruined if the rate continued at the present level. He thought the Government ought to lend to the distressed unions. He considered it probable that the condition of Lancashire would soon be worse than at present.—Mr. Cobden did not like the rate in aid. He thought that greater facilities for borrowing ought to be afforded. Government should permit the unions to borrow when they please, and limit the sum which might be borrowed. He suggested that the Lancashire members should meet together, and talk over the matter before the Bill went into committee.—The second reading was then agreed to.

On the motion for the second reading of the Bill to modify the system of credit allowed for the payment of malt duties, several members for agricultural constituencies complained of the inadequacy of the relief offered, and of the hostility of Mr. Gladstone to the agricultural interest.

On the order for going into committee upon the Births and Deaths Registration (Ireland) Bill, Lord Naas moved an instruction to the Committee to make provision for the registration of marriages in Ireland. He insisted upon the great importance of a registration of marriages, which could be effected, he observed, without any alteration of the marriage law. He specified various plans of registration, and expressed his surprise at the timidity of Sir R. Peel in dealing with this question, in which he would encounter no difficulty.—Mr. Monsell gave his cordial assent to the motion. The system of registration of marriages introduced into Scotland had worked well there, and it was most desirable, and this was a favourable time, to get rid of the difficulty in Ireland.—Sir G. Bowyer dissented from this conclusion; he thought it inexpedient to introduce the subject of marriages into the Bill.—Sir R. Peel said it appeared to him that the House was rather in favour of going on with the Bill as at present framed. Lord Naas had said that his proposal would entail no alteration of the marriage law in Ireland. He (Sir R. Peel) was of opinion that it would; that it would be impossible to legislate upon the subject without introducing many alterations in that law. He hoped, therefore, that the House would support him in proceeding with the Bill as it stood.

After further discussion the House divided, when the motion of Lord Naas was negatived by 89 to 66.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 20.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Earl of Carnarvon questioned the accuracy of a statement made by Lord Granville the other night, that no police supervision was exercised over convicts on ticket-of-leave in Dublin.—Lord Granville explained. Supervision there was, but it was not exercised by the police.—The Duke of Marlborough moved for a return giving a nominal list of persons released on tickets of leave since 1857. He cited a case of Radpath, who ought to have suffered at least eight years' penal servitude in this country, but who had been removed to Australia the year after his trial (1858), and was now at large there.—The motion was withdrawn.

The Earl of Ellenborough asked for papers relative to the Polish insurrection, and the convention between Russia and Prussia. In a speech of great force and eloquence, he explained and condemned the recent treatment of the Poles by Russia. He could not doubt that the Cabinet felt as he felt, and as every English gentleman must feel, in regard to that treatment. The insurrection took every one by surprise. After manifesting conciliatory dispositions, suddenly on the night of the 21st of January, Russian soldiers surrounded the homes of persons living in Warsaw, and without giving them an hour to prepare for the separation, tore away from their families, not those who were best fitted for military service, but those who were suspected of disaffection, and whom it was therefore thought by the police expedient to consign for life to the army. This drove the people to despair; it was a blow, and the nation rose to avenge it. He trusted that the Government would declare their opinion that the insurrection had been provoked by the conduct of Russia. At present that country was hardly to be considered a part of Europe. By the Crimean war her passage of the south-west had been cut off; the Polish insurrection had now similarly separated her from Europe in the North. She had to reconcile to herself not merely the Poles, but the public opinion of Europe, whose censures she could not but feel. It was impossible but that the French army and the French nation should sympathize with Poland, remembering how long and how gallantly the Poles had fought for France; and the Emperor could not choose but give diplomatic expression to that sympathy. The Poles are striving now for national life, as Prussia strove in 1813. By that strife Prussia won whatever honour and influence she now enjoys; and if the King insists on helping Russia to trample out the liberties of Poland, his conduct can hardly fail to bring about a crisis in his own dominions, which may extend further and again disorganize all the States of Europe. The noble Lord concluded by expressing a hope that the present insurrection might be the commencement of a brighter era, and that the present generation might witness the re-establishment of Poland.—Earl Russell said that he could not publish the report received from our Consul at Warsaw, as to do so would render that gentleman's position untenable. The present insurrection was not wholly unexpected. Great though peaceable demonstrations had occurred in Warsaw last year; and it could not but be expected that, if no concessions were made, further and more violent results would follow. The higher classes in Poland—the landed aristocracy—had not desired any revolutionary violence. They had hoped to obtain a constitutional Government or at least a national Administration from the Czar; and it had been reported that the Emperor Alexander II. was not indisposed to grant these things. But when 200 of the great landowners signed an address in this sense, they were told that they had committed a crime against the State; and Count Zamoyski, one of the chief men in Poland, who had been instrumental in the presentation of the address, was ordered to quit the country; and—though apparently by mistake—did not obtain permission to return even to visit his dying wife. The middle classes of the towns, on this, had been driven to despair, had formed secret societies and plotted insurrection. Instead of endeavouring first to put down these societies by law, and then to conciliate the Poles, the Russian Government had adopted—it was said at the suggestion of the Marquis Wielopolski, himself a Pole—the resolution to strike the blow which had provoked this insurrection. The conscription is at all times a harsh measure. But instead of enforcing it fairly, the Russian authorities had exacted the whole contingent from the towns, where disaffection was supposed to be more general than among the peasantry, and had taken the conscripts not by lot but from a list furnished by the police. This drove the people to despair and to instant rebellion. As to the convention between Prussia and Russia, he had not been able to obtain a copy, nor did he understand that a copy had been furnished to the Ministers of those Powers in London. He was informed, however, that the Russian troops were to be allowed to pass over Prussian territory in arms, and to pursue and capture insurgents on Prussian soil. Austria had wholly refused to accede to any such arrangement, while still adhering faithfully to her previous engagement with Russia. He had not hesitated to communicate to the Russian Government his opinion that its conduct in reference to the conscription was imprudent and unjust. He had also told the Prussian Ambassador that, by giving such assistance as the convention promised to Russia, Prussia made herself, in some sense, accessory after the fact to the conduct by which the insurrection had been provoked. The rebellion might prove to be a mere movement of despair; or it might assume the dimensions of a national movement. He declined to produce the papers asked for.—Lord Malmesbury censured the conduct of Prussia, and asked whether, by the convention, unarmed fugitives crossing the Prussian frontier were to be given up to Russia.—Lord Russell said that the convention was, he believed, silent on that point. [We rather think that a treaty already exists between the two Powers for the extradition of political offenders. It is so stated in the "Recollections of Siberia," which we lately reviewed.] The cheers which greeted both Lord Ellenborough and Lord Russell at every sentence condemnatory of the conduct of Russia and Prussia, or expressive of sympathy with the Poles, were very significant. It is not often that the House of Lords is so moved; and that that august and Conservative assembly should feel so strongly for rebels is as striking a proof as could be desired of the universality of the opinion that the rebellion has been not only provoked, but thoroughly justified.

FRIDAY, FEB. 20.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Ewart asked for information concerning the Russo-Prussian convention.—Lord Palmerston, without any comment, stated the facts precisely as they were given by Lord Russell in the other House. On the motion that the House do go into Committee of Supply, several questions were put and motions made. Mr. D. Griffith said that we gave our sympathy freely to residents in the Valley of the Mississippi; why should we refuse it to inhabitants of the region of the Nile? Forced labour was the great evil and curse of that country; it was slavery in its worst form, because the slaveowner had a direct interest in the health and well-being of his slave, whereas a ruler with despotic power obtained labour on his own terms, and was troubled with no responsibility as to the maintenance of the wretched people who were brought in chains to perform his tasks from a distance of 200 miles. He wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government would afford their support to Ismail Pasha in the execution of his declared intention to abolish forced labour in Egypt?—Lord Palmerston said that her Majesty's Government highly approved of the intention of the Viceroy of Egypt.—Viscount Enfield asked whether the First Commissioner of Public Works would reopen the road across Hyde Park, which had proved so useful during the Exhibition?—Mr. Cowper answered in the affirmative; but added that carts and omnibuses would not be allowed to use the road.

Sir L. Palk, who had withdrawn that part of his motion which had reference to mediation in the American war, and who in the course of his speech said that the time for mediation had gone by called attention to the distress existing in the manufacturing districts, dwelling upon the extent of the distress and the discouraging aspect of the future, both as regarded the continuance of voluntary contributions of funds for its relief, and the prospects of a supply of cotton, as to which he thought there was no cause for hope. Upon the latter point he blamed the action or non-action of the Government, who, he thought, might have promoted cotton culture not only in India, but in Queensland, Jamaica, and other British dependencies. He moved an address to her Majesty, praying that a Royal Commission may be issued to consider the best mode of obtaining a permanent supply of cotton. The House was very empty, and the motion was evidently considered a bore. Mr. Milner Gibson replied, which he would not have been allowed to do if his colleagues had attached any importance to the proposition. He thought the remedy proposed was very questionable. He doubted whether a Royal Commission of such a kind had been ever appointed, and it could not make any report which would justify Government in undertaking, or Parliament in sanctioning, a direct encouragement of cotton cultivation by the advance of money, and thus becoming a cotton trader. All the information which a Royal Commission could obtain was already before the House and the country. The appointment of a Royal Commission could, therefore, do no good, while it might do harm, by creating groundless expectations and paralyzing private enterprise. He hoped that Sir L. Palk would not press his motion, from which no practical benefit could arise.—The motion was withdrawn.

Mr. Maguire (who took an active part as Mayor of Cork in promoting subscriptions for the relief of distress in Lancashire) asked whether the attention of the Government had been directed to the distress now existing in Ireland, and, if so, whether any measures were in contemplation for its relief. He detailed facts from which he argued that Ireland was retreating; that cultivation and live stock were diminishing; that from being an exporting it had come to be an importing country; that it was subsisting upon its capital, not upon the profits of trade; and he read statements which went to show the natural result of this state of things, in widespread distress and destitution.—Colonel Dickson bore testimony to the existence of the deepest distress in Ireland, which was extending to the commercial classes.—Sir R. Peel was bound to admit, on the part of the Government, that, in consequence of deficient harvests, a great pressure was felt by various classes; but he could only reply that over the causes which afflicted Ireland, resulting from atmospheric influences, the Government had no control, and it would be very difficult for them, with the state of Lancashire before them, to propose a grant of public money. He had lost no opportunity of stimulating the activity of the local authorities. Mr. Lewis (one of the members for Marylebone) called attention to the great number of railway schemes affecting the metropolis (upwards of thirty) introduced in the present session, and asked what protection is afforded to the public interests in this matter. He thought the Board of Trade should take up the question, or that power should be given to the Metropolitan Board of Works to protect the interests of the public. He moved for copies of reports upon the subject. Mr. Massey pointed out the difficulty in the way of any Government interference in the matter. He agreed, however, that the public interests should be protected; and powers for that object could not be entrusted to a body more competent to deal with it than the Metropolitan Board of Works. He promised to propose an alteration of the Standing Order to enable the Board to exercise the power of public protection. Sir G. Grey thought the suggestion that the Metropolitan Board of Works should be allowed to appear before the committees on behalf of the public was entitled to consideration.

This motion of Mr. Lewis was agreed to.

The House then went into Committee upon the Births and Deaths Registration (Ireland) Bill, the clauses of which were agreed to after a very long discussion.

After disposing of some other business, the House adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 23.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

In the absence of Lord Russell, Lord Stratheden was obliged to postpone his motion for the production of any correspondence which may have taken place between Mr. Mason and the Foreign Office. The rest of the sitting was occupied by a discussion on a proposed extension of the Great Eastern Railway through London as far as Finsbury-circus.—Lord Derby objected to that extension, and wished that some more efficient protection should be afforded to the interests of Londoners in regard to measures of this kind. He thought the Metropolitan Board of Works ought to have a locus standi before the Select Committees on Metropolitan Railway Bills.—Lord Granville agreed with this suggestion.—Earl Grey thought the Bill might be postponed for a short time, and that, as the Session was likely to be an idle one, the House would do well to consider how the interests of owners and occupiers generally might be protected in such cases.—After some further discussion the debate was adjourned for a fortnight.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 23.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

A short personal explanation took place between Lord Robert Montagu and Lord Clarence Paget, Secretary to the Admiralty. The latter has recently gone down to a dinner at Chatham, and while there, talked rather loosely about the future greatness of the place as an arsenal. Lord R. Montague and Sir F. Smith, at present member for Chatham, chose to treat this loose talk as an official promise made for electioneering purposes. This Lord Clarence Paget denied, and after a somewhat angry explanation, the subject dropped.

Mr. S. Fitzgerald gave notice that on Thursday next he should move for papers in continuation of correspondence already published between her Majesty's Government and that of the United States, and also for correspondence between her Majesty's Government and certain gentlemen here who represent the Southern States.

After a few unimportant questions had been asked, and answered, the second reading of the Prince of Wales' Annuity Bill came on. In answer to Sir H. Willoughby, Mr. Gladstone denied that on the death of the Prince of Wales the Duchy of Cornwall reverted to the Crown. After some debate, the bill was read a second time. In answer to Mr. Butt, Sir George Grey said he did not intend to propose any alteration in the law relating to the confinement of insane persons.

Mr. Buxton called attention to the purchase and deportation from Egypt of a negro regiment by the Emperor of the French, which elicited from Lord Palmerston a statement of the circumstances of the case, and an emphatic declaration that the late Pacha, in agreeing to the measure without the sanction of his sovereign, the Sultan of Turkey, had exceeded his powers. Not content with this, the Egyptian Government had committed an act which could be likened only to the violence and cruelty that had been recently inflicted by the Russians on the inhabitants of Warsaw. They had employed persons to perambulate the streets of the towns, with orders to seize every Nubian whom they deemed fit for military duty, tear him from his family, and send him on board a French frigate to be conveyed to Mexico. Her Majesty's Government had expressed their opinion to that of Egypt that such an arrangement was perfectly irregular, and that it was a violation of the rights of the Sultan, for the Pacha had no right to dispose of the subjects of his sovereign without the Sultan's consent.

After an irregular discussion on naval subjects, the House went into a Committee on the navy estimates.

Lord C. Paget prefaced his exposition of the estimates, by remarking that he could congratulate the Committee upon the reduction of their amount, because the Government had been enabled by the generosity of the House to make such enormous exertions that the navy had been thereby placed in an efficient state. The money vote proposed for 1863-64 was £10,736,032 which was less than the vote for 1862-63 by £1,058,273. After pointing out the reductions in the several items of expenditure, Lord Clarence stated the number and description of armour-clad vessels afloat and building. The number of these vessels under construction or at sea was twenty-one. Of this number ten (including one small vessel) were actually at sea, or would be ready at the end of the year, and eight more would be completed by April next year. He explained the course proposed to be taken in the conversion of line-of-battle ships, and with the frames of wooden ships building. The number of seamen and marines was the same as last year—namely, 76,000 men. He read an account of the amount of our naval force afloat and its distribution, and, in conclusion, gave very satisfactory details of the condition of the navy, the continuous service men, the Naval Reserve, and the Naval Coast Volunteers. He moved the first vote of 76,000 men. Sir J. Pakington thought Lord Clarendon was justified in claiming for the Government the merit that it had effected this reduction of £1,000,000 without encroaching upon the efficiency of the naval service. He thought the resolve not to diminish the number of men was a judicious and prudent one.—Mr. Baxter complained of the suggestion by Mr. Bentinck, that France meditated an invasion of this country. As a financial reformer, he did not move a reduction of the number of men, because he thought the Government in earnest in economy and retrenchment, and hoped they would not stop.—Sir J. Elphinstone noticed some topics in Lord C. Paget's exposition. He thought that ventilation was not sufficiently attended to in the navy, and the proper construction of ships for tropical climates.—Admiral Walcott hoped that no measure would be resorted to that would lessen the efficiency of the service.—Mr. Cobden said there were not two opinions as to the maxim of the last speaker, that England should maintain a navy superior to that of any nation in the world. But the superiority of a navy did not now depend upon the number of men: it was a question of science and skill, so that when he objected to 76,000 men, he did so for this reason, that he defined the Government so to employ that number in the ships they had that they could be of any use to the country. And when he objected to the number of men he objected to the whole expenditure of the Navy, for the number of men voted was the measure of the expenditure in all the departments. The conduct of the Government in shipbuilding had been nothing less than insanity, and the House should be cautious in trusting them now. Could we afford, rich as the country was, to go into all these novelties, on a grand scale, of iron-clad broadsides? Were we sure that in a few years they would not share the fate of the sailing line-of-battle ships? He called upon the Admiralty to suspend the building of monster broadsides till the plan of Captain Cowper Coles had been tried, and if it was successful this enormous number of men would be unnecessary.—Mr. Laird concurred with Mr. Cobden in commending the invention of Captain Coles, and in urging the Government to let the cupola ships be tried before the completion of the broadsides.—Mr. Lindsay dwelt upon the enormous loss the country had sustained through the caprices of the Government in their shipbuilding operations. The debate continued in the course of which Lord C. Paget gave further explanations on the subject of the iron-clad vessels. Ultimately, the vote and a few other votes were agreed to, when the Chairman was ordered to report progress.

Mr. Gladstone moved the second reading of the Tobacco Duties Bill, which was resisted by Mr. Ayrton and some other members on the ground of its alleged unfairness towards British manufactures. The debate was adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 24.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Bishop of Bangor moved the second reading of a Bill to allow service in certain Welsh Churches to be performed in the English language. The motion was agreed to.—In answer to a question from Lord Stratheden, the Under-Secretary for War explained the relations between the Government and the Volunteer force, and the impossibility of appointing a field-day except on some such general holiday as Easter Monday.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 24.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Sir J. Hay moved a resolution, "That this House will, upon Thursday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an address to her Majesty, submitting that, in the opinion of this House, 1, the position of the officers of her Majesty's naval service in respect of promotion and retirement is not satisfactory, and ought to be amended; 2, that, with a view to the increased efficiency of the naval service, and to meet the just expectations of officers with respect to promotion, it is desirable to adopt for all ranks the principle of retirement by age; and, 3, that the pay of naval officers ought to be so adjusted as to enable them consistently to maintain the rank they hold and to give them fair remuneration for honourable service." Observing that considerable dissatisfaction existed among the officers of the navy, and, in his opinion, not without good grounds; that they looked upon the Admiralty as anything but friendly to the concession of their just rights; he proceeded to justify and enforce his propositions, showing that his scheme of retirement would benefit the service and promote its efficiency by producing a steady flow of promotion. With reference to the last proposition, he pointed out the grievances suffered by officers of the navy through insufficient and diminished pay and allowances, which he contrasted with those of the army and the civil service, and also with the remuneration of officers in the navy of other nations.—Lord Palmerston moved, as an amendment, the following resolutions:—"1, that this House, having on the 13th of March, 1861, instructed a Select Committee to consider the present system of promotion and retirement in the Royal navy, is of opinion that its decision should be suspended until the subject shall have been accordingly considered and reported upon; and, 2, that a Select Committee be appointed to consider the present system of promotion and retirement in the Royal navy, and to report their opinion thereon." Doing, he said, full justice to the motives of Sir J. Hay, and convinced that he was actuated by nothing more than a desire to promote the interests of the service, he could not refrain from regretting the course which, in and out of the House, Sir John had thought proper to pursue. Military and naval bodies ought not to become deliberative assemblies, to enforce upon the Government changes for their own benefit; to meet together, to appoint committees, and to correspond with members of the profession, calling upon them to state their grievances. Such a proceeding tended to shake the foundations of military and naval discipline, and would form a most dangerous precedent. The course taken by Sir J. Hay, in proposing his resolution, was not altogether consistent with the functions of the House, which ought not to assume those of an administrative character. The propositions, moreover, were vague, and would leave the Government entirely at sea as to the mode of carrying them out. But it was not expedient for the House to present such an address to the Crown; it was for the Government, on its own responsibility, to propose any addition to the expenditure they might deem necessary for the public service, and for the House to reject or to adopt the proposal.—Sir J. Elphinstone supported the original motion, considering that the wrongs and grievances of the officers of the navy called for inquiry and redress.—Mr. B. Cochrane dissented from some parts of Sir J. Hay's scheme; but, as a whole, he thought it one for which he deserved the highest credit.—Mr. Ferrand, in supporting the motion, observed that the officers of the navy had appealed to the Admiralty, but had appealed in vain; they had laid their claims before the Board, who, not showing that those claims were unjust, returned a curt and offensive reply. They were then compelled to come to that House; for to whom were they to appeal?—Mr. Bentinck, after some remarks upon the composition and proceedings of the Committee of 1861, admitted that there was a great deal of force in what had been said by Lord Palmerston as to the mode proposed by Sir J. Hay of dealing with the question, and suggested that the proposal to refer it to a committee should be accepted.—Lord C. Paget analyzed the plan of retirement proposed by Sir J. Hay, showing in detail the injurious action it would exert upon the service, and that it was impracticable without inflicting injustice upon officers. He disputed the correctness of the comparison made by Sir J. Hay between the pay of the British and French naval officers. He did not deny that there was room for improvement, but there had been great improvements made in the pay and position of all classes in the navy, and it was not fair to make charges against the Admiralty, and to instigate officers to discontent.—Sir J. Pakington insisted that Sir J. Hay was not liable to the charge made against him by Lord Palmerston, and that his motion was not open to any objection on account of its form. He, on his part, charged Lord Palmerston with inconsistency, and a change of tactics in now proposing an inquiry by a Committee which he had opposed in 1861. He (Sir John) thought the question ought to be dealt with by the Executive, or, if not, that it should be referred to a Royal Commission.

With regard to the plan proposed by Sir J. Hay, he did not assent to all the details, but he corroborated Sir John's statements as to the underpayment of the superior officers of the navy. Though he should vote for the motion if pressed to a division, he suggested whether he would not best discharge the duty he had so well performed by not pressing it; and he appealed to the Government whether, in that event, it would not be better that they should undertake the question.—The motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. Adderley moved for leave to bring in a Bill inflicting corporeal punishment for robbery with violence.—Sir George Grey objected to the principle of the measure. Leave was given.—Sir George Grey asked leave to introduce a Bill postponing the payment of Bills of Exchange due on the 7th proximo, the day of the arrival of the Princess Alexandra. Leave was given.—The Prince of Wales' Annuity Bill passed through Committee.—Mr. Newdegate asked whether the Princess was a Protestant.—Lord Palmerston replied: I am very glad to be able to answer the question of the hon. gentleman in a manner that will, I am sure, be satisfactory to him and to the House. When the question arose of selecting a Princess who might be the wife of the Prince of Wales, the following conditions were thought to be requisite: first of all, that she should be young; next, that she should be handsome; further, that she should be agreeable, that she should be amiable in her disposition, that she should be well brought up; and, lastly, that she should be a Protestant. All these conditions, I am happy to say, are united in the Princess Alexandra. I trust, therefore, that the choice will be as satisfactory to the nation as I am sure it will be conducive to the happiness of the Prince of Wales.

At half-past 10 o'clock the House adjourned until Thursday.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, February 25.

The Cotton Market at the date of our last report was very much depressed, and Fair Dhollerahs hardly saleable at 16½d.

On Thursday and Friday there was considerable pressure to realize, and several low sales were reported, especially in American, strict middling Mobiles being forced off at 20d. On Saturday the market opened weak, but on receipt of the Australasian's news, reporting cotton at New York 93 cents, with an excited market; a considerable amount of business was done in the afternoon, at an advance of 1d., and in some cases 2d. per lb. on the previous forced sales of American cotton.

On Monday, the possibility of serious complications arising out of the Polish question, had a damping effect, and holders showing a disposition to sell freely at a slight advance, the market closed tamely with sales of 4000 bales.

On Tuesday the market was very flat, the business reaching only 2,500 bales. To-day a little more has been done, the sales reaching 5,000 bales, but mostly at lower prices and on the basis of the depressed sales of last week. We quote Fair Dhollerah 16½d., and Middling American 21d. to 21½d.

By the City of Manchester to-day we learn that the French Emperor's offer for mediation has been peremptorily declined by the Northern Government, at the same time resolutions have been passed in the Illinois Legislature calling for a general convention of States next month, to consider their present difficulties, and the New Jersey State Legislature have determined to communicate direct with the Southern Government. Meanwhile the attack on Charleston has been postponed, and the army of the Potomac is in process of dismemberment, whilst affairs at Vicksburg are still in statu quo.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, February 24.

There has been no noticeable change in our yarn and cloth market during the past week, notwithstanding the reduction of the bank rate from 5 to 4 per cent., and the better telegrams from Bombay dated 4th of February, reporting an active demand for our staples at improving prices, which may be accounted for by the quietness of the Liverpool cotton market, and a general belief here that the North cannot carry on the struggle against the South much longer.

The German houses are in possession of orders for pincops and doubled yarns, which they do not feel inclined to place at present, in consequence of the cotton market showing such signs of weakness, as to induce them to believe that lower prices will be taken by spinners shortly.

Home trade yarns have been very quiet, and the agents who deal largely in this description complain much of the manufacturers returning a very large proportion of the Surat cotton yarn sold lately, as being almost unfit to make into cloth. This complaint, indeed, has been very great during the last two or three weeks.

Cloth of all kinds has been in little demand, and not a single sale of any consequence is reported.

To-day the market has been very quiet, although there has been a better feeling observable, sellers showing no disposition to yield at all in their quotations.

There have been some inquiries for 40s. and 60s. yarns, in bundles, suitable for India, but only a small amount of sales in them has been effected.

Home trade yarns are nominally firm, but in case offers had been made, no doubt a concession might have been submitted to by the seller.

Cloth remains in the same state as last week, although there have been some inquiries made for 22-inch T cloth, 2 and 3 lbs. also for 30-inch Madapolams suitable for the Levant.

Foreign Correspondence.

PARIS, February 24th.

Your readers are all more or less acquainted with a very suggestive fable of Lafontaine's, the hero and victim whereof is an unfortunate donkey. Some great calamity having befallen the kingdom of beasts, lion, tiger, wolf, fox, come forward in the handsomest manner, and proclaim that though they may have devoured a few peasants, worried flocks and plundered hen-roosts, their consciences are perfectly at ease. The court of quadrupeds unanimously vote that such peccadilloes cannot by any means have brought down the visitation they suffer from. Our long-eared friend then comes forward, encouraged by the impunity he sees so freely granted to great offenders, and jauntily intimates that one very hot day as he was passing along a green field under a heavy load,—

“ — l' occasion, l' herbe tendre
Et le diable aussi quelque peu metantant,
Je tondis de ce pré la largeur de ma langue.”

No sooner are the words out of his mouth than a chorus of reprobation arises against him,— “ Haro sur le baudet ! Ce maudet animal

Ce pelé, ce galeux ! il a fait tout le mal !”

In short, his friends eat him up.

On reading the speeches in Parliament on Friday, and the articles in the French papers during the past week, shall I venture to confess that the King of Prussia appeared to me to stand very much in the same light as the luckless baudet? He has been sorely tempted—for many years he has been longing for a taste of that right royal dish, absolutism.

He has heard, until very lately, a great deal, both from East and West about the duty of Governments to check the “progress of revolution,” and now, when an insurrection breaks out in an adjoining country, which threatens to spread to his own dominions, his singleness of purpose in offering his aid to put it down, is received on the part of England, France, and Austria with an unanimous shout—haro sur le baudet!

The Prussian baudet, however, might prove a tougher customer than his fabulous prototype; and in spite of rumours, and of threatening articles in semi-official prints, I do not believe in any aggression being contemplated. Apprehensions, however, do exist of such an aggression, and there is a great deal of wild talk about the restoration of Poland, &c. That diplomatic remonstrance will not be spared is highly probable, but that the Emperor of the French, backed by the “moral support” of England, will march an army to the Rhine, I confess is more than my powers of belief are able to stand.

Great uncertainty still prevails as to the nature of the arrangement between Russia and Prussia, and it is doubted whether it really amounts to so flagrant a breach of neutrality as the speeches delivered by Lords Russell and Palmerston would lead one to suppose. But, taking it for granted that it is everything that it is described, and assuming for instance that Prussian troops have crossed the Polish frontier, it is not easy to see on what principle the Western Powers could justify their intervention between two of the oppressors of Poland and their victim. Neither England nor France interfered when Russia passed her battalions into Hungary to crush the successful insurrection, which neither Windischgratz nor Radetzki were able to cope with; and though justice, policy, and humanity all advocate an intervention to put an end to the sanguinary drama in America, England refuses to share in it, on the flimsy pretence that Mr. Lincoln and his associates do not appear in the proper frame of mind to entertain it.

Having attempted to put the policy ascribed to the Western Powers, with regard to the Polish insurrection in its proper light, let me say that the popular feeling here has been roused to a very unusual degree of indignation by the atrocities which have goaded the Poles into insurrection, and that entertained towards Prussia has been well described as partaking of the loathing with which a volunteer assistant to the hangman would be regarded. The sympathy of all liberal minds is naturally due to a gallant people fighting for their independence, and those who advocate on the other side of the Atlantic, a cause akin to that which the Poles are fighting for against tremendous odds in Eastern Europe, cannot but form wishes for their success.

There are points in common between the Poles and the Confederates, just as there are points in common between the tyranny of the Czar and that of President Lincoln, and between the Turchin's, Butler's, McNeil's, and the Russian butchers who knout women to death, and have towns plundered and sacked, whilst they are at breakfast (Czas of Cracow.) But there is this great difference between them, that the Poles are fighting a hopeless battle, whilst every day makes the success of the Confederates more certain.

The Russians, though their troops are worsted in partial encounters, show no sign of faltering in their task of crushing out the remnants of vitality in Poland, whilst the North divided against itself, defeated in the field, ruined in finances, gives signs of having had enough.

The Moniteur and the political world here generally attach great importance to the movement which is taking place in the West, and to the unanimous reprobation which the proposal to embody a negro army, excites in every part of the Union. Southern victories have brought the North to a very low ebb, but it seems reserved for the Abolitionists to give it the coup de grace.

It is said that the reply of the Federal Government to M. Drouyn de Lhuys' note of the 9th, has been brought by the Australasian, and from the silence of the Moniteur it is inferred that it is negative, as was expected. The war affords to the Butler's, Cameron's, &c., too favourable an opportunity for plunder that they should wish to terminate it. It would be killing the goose with the golden eggs. The belief, however, continues general that the hostilities are drawing to a close, and the approaching triumph of the South may be confidently predicted from the gloom which is settling down upon their enemies.

M. Proudhon, the well-known apostle of socialism, has this week published a book which has made some impression, from the vigour of his attacks on those who happen to disagree with him, and from the very extravagance of his conclusions. The work is entitled Du Principe Fédératif,—of which principle (which may be rendered the doctrine of State-rights) M. Proudhon is so devoted an adherent that he proposes to carve out France into a number of Federal republics, with Paris for their capital. There is a good deal in the book that verges on insanity, at the same time there is a certain amount of method in its madness, and his reflections on the present contest in America are not without point. M. Proudhon with a philosophical elevation of thought, which his countrymen are far from being able to comprehend, reproves European democracy for its support of the North in this struggle, and condemns it still more strongly for approving Mr. Lincoln's “emancipation” proclamation, which seeks to do away with the “name” of slavery, but substitutes for it that white slavery which he pronounces to be infinitely worse—which the French call “proletariat,” and which we know but too well in England, though we have no name for it. The work, however, owes its success in Paris, not to its philosophy, but to the virulence of its attacks on sundry well-known journalists who are dished up, a la sauce piquante, and greatly relished by the community at large, who enjoy personalities, all the more from the tame and too parliamentary tone the papers are compelled to assume.

The Bourse has been greatly affected during the past week by the reports of an impending war with Russia and Prussia; of an army of observation being stationed close to the Rhine; of the resignation of M. Fould, and other calamities, equally vague in their character, and uncertain in their existence. Nothing could be more easy than to collect 40,000 or 50,000 men from Metz to Strasburg within 43 hours, when such large Place d'Armes, as Paris, Nancy, and Lille, are connected by two or three lines of railroad. But all these rumours have, I believe, their existence merely in the panic caused by the ignorance of the public as to what the intentions of the Government may really be.

A letter from our Richmond correspondent arrives at the moment of our going to press. Its interesting contents will be laid before our readers next week.

VICKSBURG.

The following description is taken from the letter of the Special Correspondent of the Morning Herald dated Philadelphia, February 10th:—

The Mississippi flows near Vicksburg through flats of its own deposit. Those flats vary from 20 to upwards of 100 miles in width. They are subject to an overflow of from four to twenty feet deep. At the city a breadth of hills runs out through these low flats to the very bank of the Mississippi. A narrow apron of overflowed land lies at a few points between those hills and the river; but in most instances the channel lies with its whirling current at their very base. A belt of land subject to overflow lies for a width of about 200 yards between the Mississippi and the base of the “bluff” on which Vicksburg stands. That hill presents to the river a contour similar to that of a truncated cone. It rises up in a rapid slope to a summit 300 or 400 feet high. The streets of the city are cut into the sides of the hill, and constitute a succession of terraces one above another. The system of defences adopted for the position is outside my knowledge, but must be as formidable as any such system can be in the case of a profile admitting of a dozen lines of earthwork around the whole sweep of the hill, each commanding the other, and all commanding the water approach so completely as to make a direct advance from the “landing” utterly impracticable. This bustling hill is but one of a chain that, equally formidable throughout, embraces the channel of the Mississippi as far south as Warrenton. This semicircular sweep of “bluffs” has doubtless been made—as it may have been very easily—unapproachable at any point by a hostile force from the river. The flank approaches to this breadth of hill country are very difficult. The Yazoo River constitutes the line of access to it on the north. The naked red clays of the whole region back of Vicksburg are torn by heavy rain storms into a tangled network of ravines deep and steep. This favours the defence in general, and makes it from the line of the Yazoo perhaps irresistible. The weak point of the communications of Vicksburg lies, however, at the place where the railway from that city to Jackson, the capital of Mississippi, crosses on the trestlework the swamp of Big Black River. That part of the railway is but a few miles back of Vicksburg, and is accessible from a point on the Mississippi below Warrenton, by way of the valley of the Big Black. In high stages of water, as at the present, it is approachable by gunboats. In either case this appears to be the assailable point of the defences of Vicksburg.

Vicksburg is situated on one of those bends in the channel of the Mississippi known locally from their shape as “horse shoes.” The city occupies the toe, the range of hills extending south of it to Warrenton, rising up like a wall around one-half the circle of that “horse shoe.” The tongue of land within the bend is subject to overflow. Across this the Federals have cut a canal with the expectation that the Mississippi rushing through will widen and deepen it to the dimensions of a new bed. “Cut offs” such as the Federals expect to make in this instance, have been made similarly at other points on the river. In this case, however, the soil is stiff clay, and there is therefore grave reason to conclude that the river will fail in opening by its own action the shallow cut into which they have introduced it to the dimensions required. This canal is in fact sat down as a failure. A new cut is being opened at another part of the horse shoe; but this probably will be found, unless carried down with the quicksand, equally unavailable. At all events, it will fail to result in any change useful for the purposes of navigation before several months. In order to place you in possession of the physical conditions of the attack on Vicksburg it is only necessary to repeat that with the exception of the breadth of hill country on which that city is situated all the country around is a more or less reclaimed swamp. The whole region for a 100 miles on every side of the Confederate defences, except in the rear, is subject to an overflow of from four to twenty feet deep, and even the rendezvous of the Federal army, protected temporarily by an embankment that may be cut through in half an hour, must in the present stage of the Mississippi floods be saturated with wet. A further rise in the water would drive the Federal army to their transports, and yet immense reinforcements are being forwarded from Memphis to participate in its desperate and bloody enterprise.

The Confederate Judge, Magrath, has delivered an opinion sustaining the constitutionality of that portion of the amended Sequestration Act which gives to the next of kin of an alien enemy the sequestered property of such alien enemy. The question of constitutionality was made under directions from the office of the Attorney General.

Missouri has recently contributed fifteen additional regiments to the Confederate army. Several of these regiments participated in the recent battle in Arkansas.

Resolutions have been introduced into the Virginia Legislature, declaring the determination of the State to guarantee to the Confederate Government the payment of her proportion of the public debt, and pledging the faith of the State for the same; also, a proposition to enroll and organize all exempts in the State into Brigades, regiments, and companies, to be subject to the call of the Governor in case of necessity.

Total number of emigrants arrived at New York for the year ending December 31, 1862, 75,982; arrived to same date in 1861, 65,529. Increase over 1861, 10,453.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 25s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

Agency at Liverpool: WM. KNOX, Secretary Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings.

Agency for the Continent: G. FOWLER, 279, Rue St. Honore, Paris.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1863.

The American Question before Parliament.

On Monday last Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald gave notice that on Thursday (this day) "he would move for papers in continuation of correspondence already published between her Majesty's Government and that of the United States, and also for the correspondence between her Majesty's Government and certain gentlemen here who represent the Southern States." A notice of a motion similar in purport had previously been given in the House of Lords by Lord Campbell; but the motion itself has been adjourned until next Monday at the express request, as we have good reason to believe, of Earl Russell, who thus stands pledged to discuss it on that day. The same request, coming almost simultaneously from both Houses, and urged by men representing the two great antagonistic parties, affords a strong proof, if any were needed, that this request is made for no party purposes, and that the American question is not, as it ought not to be, an object of party tactics. It is difficult to imagine on what grounds the Government can refuse these papers. The "civil war," as it is still misnamed by many, has not diminished in magnitude or interest since the beginning of the last session, when a perfect shower of blue books on America gratified the public curiosity. This year there have been papers on every other foreign question, but not a page relating to this, the greatest of all. It could not be that there were none to publish, for even if the Washington Government has fully anticipated the publication of the diplomatic correspondence with the North, it is generally understood in well-informed circles that the correspondence between the Foreign Office and the representatives of the South is not the least interesting portion of the diplomatic record of the year. Publication of this correspondence could not consistently be refused, as it was towards the close of last Session, on the ground that it was unofficial or extra-official, because of the representatives of the Confederate States not being recognized in their diplomatic character. From this objection, even if it were well taken, the Government is estopped by its former publication, in February 1862, of the notes of Messrs. Yancey, Rost, and Mann, and even of the present Commissioner of the Confederate States. What was right then must be right now. It can scarcely be that this correspondence contains matter of such momentous importance as to require, in the public interest, the veil of secrecy.

The only valid reason which can be imagined for withholding it is, that it must inevitably lead to a debate, and therefore to an expression of Parliamentary opinion. To our thinking, it is high time that this expression should be made. The French proposal of mediation has just been peremptorily refused by the Government at Washington, and with it, as we predicted, the friendly suggestion of entering into negotiations with the South. The last pretence for delay is therefore removed. If well-authenticated rumour is to be credited, the French Emperor has long since decided, as the alternative in the event of the rejection of his double proposition, to recognize the Confederate Government, and the question of veracity which has arisen between his Ambassador and the Chief of Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet is not likely to alter this resolve, or to retard its execution. Under these circumstances, it behoves the dignity and self-respect of this country to decide what attitude she will assume; whether, in spite of French recognition, Great Britain will still persist in ignoring the just claims of the Confederates, and thus make enemies, commercially as well as politically, of both the American nations alike, or whether she will act true to her position as a great Power, and her relations with both combatants, and assure France of a cordial co-operation in a measure which cannot much longer be deferred.

Why there should be any hesitation between two courses, when all the considerations of justice, humanity, and policy, so obviously point out the right one, it passes human ingenuity to conjecture. In our dealings with the late United States, have we incurred any obligations towards the States north of the Potomac and the Ohio which do not equally bind us towards the States south of these rivers? As members of a Federation treating with us through a common agent, these States stood before us equals and peers in all respects, and as such we recognized them by the treaty of 1783, declaring each by name to be a free, sovereign, and independent State. Has there subsequently been any treaty by which we recognized in, and guaranteed to, one group of those States a right of sovereignty over the others? By what title can we withdraw from Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia, what we accord to the fullest extent to Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and New York? What claims of legality has the Government at Washington which do not belong in the same degree to that at Richmond? The former consists of representatives of a certain number of States united for specified common purposes; so does the latter. Both Governments are founded upon substantially the same political theories, and established by the same forms and the same rules of representation. Of the two, the one at Richmond has proved itself to have a stronger hold upon the affections and loyalty of its citizens. It has moreover, in a comparison of probable stability, the advantage over its rival. No one even of those who would still refuse it recognition now doubts its ability to maintain itself, while the warmest partisans of the Washington Government cannot be blind to the multiplying signs of its rapidly approaching disintegration. Why, then, should we have one measure for the North and another for the South? Let it not be said that the fear of one makes us unjust to the other. Suppose the North had the power as well as the inclination to make war upon Great Britain, would our excessive forbearance not rather provoke, than avert the danger? When did nation bent on war ever wait for just ground or lack a pretext? If we were in the position of the lamb to this Northern wolf—as, thank Heaven, we are not yet—would our drinking ever so low down the stream prevent him from devouring us?

The friends of the South throughout this country await with eager interest the result of the motions to-night and on Monday, and especially the discussion in the Lords, in which Earl Russell is expected to take part. It seems probable that the Government will not refuse the papers demanded, and in that case the decisive debate may be postponed a little while longer. We hope, however, that both the movers will urge upon their colleagues and the country the necessity of prompt and consistent action, not so much for the sake of helping the Confederates, who have shown themselves able to dispense with foreign help, as for the sake of British interests and British honour. The correspondence moved for will show the grounds on which the Confederate Government has claimed official recognition, and the grounds on which the British Government has hitherto refused it. Between them let Parliament and the public judge.

The New Campaign.

Mr. Seward is once more confident, another "ninety days" is fixed as the period within which the coup de grace will be given to the Southern Confederacy. The North is always going to begin, always on the eve of some tremendous enterprise, and this time, the public is assured, such preparations have been made, such precautions have been taken, that victory is certain. Yet the news brought by the last mail is ominous of failure. A week ago the attack upon Charleston seemed imminent. The gage of defiance had been boldly thrown down by the Confederates. The Federal Flotilla had been driven ignominiously from Charleston waters. We were told that prompt and summary vengeance was at once to be enacted, and a New York mob revelled in the belief that the attack had commenced. But there is another postponement. The great fleet of transports which embarked General Foster's 65,000 men has sailed quietly by Charleston and landed its human freight on St. Helena Island; the only change off Charleston Harbour is the substitution of a blockading squadron of iron-clads for the wooden vessels which fared so badly in the late engagement; and the people of the Palmetto City are half inclined to believe that the storm cloud has passed them by, and that the bolt of war will fall upon Savannah. There really seems to be some fatality attending the expeditions of the Federals. For weeks and weeks General Foster's army has been on the point of striking a blow. It lay for a month or two at Newbern, North Carolina; it advanced a few miles towards Kingston, and everybody expected a dash upon the railroad between Richmond and South Carolina, and an attack upon Wilmington. It is suddenly countermarched, and re-embarked; and it is next heard of, not at Charleston nor at Savannah, but at Saint Helena Island. The "mystery," as the New York papers say, is at an end, and General Foster, having landed his troops, has gone leisurely back to Washington to consult about future movements, and to complain of General Hunter. Meantime the grand Army of the Potomac is being broken up, and General Burnside, at the head of 35,000 men, is reported on his way to North Carolina, where, we presume, he is to imitate General Foster's resultless advance upon Kingston. We have never been able to understand the precise object of the large force assembled at Newbern. But if 65,000 men were not sufficient to accomplish it, half that number is not likely to be more successful; and we confess our utter inability to fathom Northern strategy at this point, unless the object be to keep Burnside and his corps d'armée out of harm's way, and not to risk too many men under "fighting Joe Hooker." The dismemberment of the Federal army in Virginia will, however, relieve all anxiety about Richmond, and set a considerable Confederate force free to succour Charleston, Tennessee, Vicksburg and Port Hudson. In any change of front, the Confederates operating upon interior lines, and having direct railroad communication, must have the advantage in rapidity of movement. Their strong lines along the road between Washington and Richmond will always enable them to make head against the Federal army with a greatly inferior force. The town of Richmond was long ago placed beyond the reach of a coup de main. It is reasonable to believe that a considerable portion of the Virginian army has been despatched Southward, and that when the day of battle comes in Tennessee and Mississippi, the veterans who have so often "driven" the Federals in Virginia and Maryland will have their share of the fighting.

For the present the immediate interest of the conflict is concentrated at Vicksburg. Thither all the available forces of the North are being hurried, and the struggle which has twice terminated disastrously to Federal arms is about to be renewed in terrible earnest. Hitherto the Federal attack has been conducted from the Mississippi and from the Yazoo. At both points the natural defences of Vicksburg render it almost impregnable. In front a belt of marsh land, 200 yards in width, stretches some three miles along the Mississippi to the foot of the precipitous hill on the side of which the terraced city of Vicksburg stands. Every terrace, and the summit of every slope, is covered with batteries, and the attempt to storm from the river would be about as hopeless as to assault Gibraltar from the "neutral ground." From the south of the Yazoo the approaches to Vicksburg are hardly less formidable. A series of ravines, formed by winter torrents, constitute so many outworks for the defenders of the town, which a very little engineering skill will enable them to convert into strong positions, against which the whole fury of the Northern army may dash itself in vain. But it is said to be the intention of the Federals, by cutting the "levee" of the Yazoo River to inundate the whole country in the rear of Vicksburg, to float their lighter transports up from the Mississippi and Yazoo, and so intercept the communications between Vicksburg and Jackson, and cut off the supplies of the garrisons. In the meantime M'Clermand's troops are hard at work digging the canal on Louisiana bank. But as the soil is said to be a stiff clay, there seems to be very little chance of their completing the work this season, and when it is borne in mind that the whole country within 100 miles of Vicksburg is subject to overflow when the rivers are at their height, and that the Federals are at this moment sleeping on ground only a foot or two above the present stage of the river from which they draw water, it is easy to conceive the desperate nature of the enterprise the Federals have taken in hand. The best sanitary measures can do little to help great camps of men huddled together upon this saturated soil. And although the few weeks of cold weather that are yet to be expected may keep under the fevers and other diseases incidental to such exposure, it needs but the recollection of the condition to which the Federal flotilla off Vicksburg was reduced last year in the hot season, to bring before us vividly the terrible sufferings and losses the Federals must undergo when the waters subside, and they are subjected to the literal influences of the malaria from the drying swamps. The only hope of the Federals, then, lies in immediate action. But if due advantage has been taken of the natural facilities afforded for defence, and if, as we do not doubt for an instant, Vicksburg is properly garrisoned, the North must meet with another fearful disaster. Of the attack on Port Hudson we still hear nothing, and the reason assigned for the delay is the inefficiency of Farragut's flotilla. So many drafts have been made upon him for ships at other points, in consequence of the successes of the Confederates at Galveston and Sabine Pass, the capture of the Harriet Lane, and sinking of the Hatteras, the destruction of the Westfield and others, that it is said his force is scarcely strong enough to blockade the mouths of the Mississippi. But in the case of Port Hudson, as in that of Vicksburg, every day's delay is in favour of the defence, and it is now, perhaps, doubtful if the assault of Port Hudson will be at all attempted, unless the fall of Vicksburg shall enable Grant and M'Clermand to co-operate with Banks and Farragut.

We have heard little of Rosecranz's movements in Tennessee for the last two or three weeks, but report says that he has been largely reinforced, and that an advance is contemplated upon Tennessee River, and even into Georgia. In this case, a great battle is imminent. Whether Longstreet or General Johnston is to have the command of the Confederate army in Tennessee, it has certainly been strengthened by several brigades from the army in Virginia, and the Confederates cannot allow Rosecranz to obtain the command of Eastern Tennessee without a struggle. Already the irregulars are pressing in upon his railway communication and cutting off his supplies. Forrest's horse are attempting to fasten themselves permanently on his line of transport, and even Fort Donnellson was on the point of changing hands, when the fire of some Federal gunboats drove off the victorious assailants and saved the remnant of the Federal garrison. In truth, the immense distances over which the Northern armies have to operate must expose them to constant attacks in the rear, and paralyze all their most important movements. Another Confederate force is at this moment marching northward upon Memphis, and repairing the Mississippi Central Railway, for a further advance. Memphis has been stripped of its garrison; and it is quite possible that General Van Dorn contemplates striking a sudden blow at the communications of General Grant, by the capture of this important town. Memphis could not be held long against the Federal flotilla, but its capture for a week would go near to involve the starvation or surrender of the army before Vicksburg, as two or three batteries or field pieces on the heights of Memphis would be quite sufficient to bar the passage of the Mississippi to unarmed transports. It is at Vicksburg, however, that the final act of this bloody drama has to be played out. There will be the great shock of war; for there it has to be decided whether the Confederacy shall be rent asunder and the waters of the Mississippi open to the products of the West, or whether the last link that holds the Western States to the Union shall be broken.

The Western and Middle States.

The most unaccountable phenomenon, and that which most disappointed the well-founded expectations of the Confederates, has been the zeal, nay, the fury, with which the Western States of the late American Union entered upon the war for the subjugation of the South. These States, carved out of the ample territory of Virginia, and peopled to a large extent—except in the extreme North-West, where the German element preponderates—by men born south of the Ohio, or their immediate descendants, had in all former political contests been the fast friends and staunch allies of the South. As a purely agricultural population, they had many interests in common with the planting States and antagonistic to the manufacturing and commercial communities of the East. They also shared, with scarcely less intensity, the Southerner's dislike and contempt for the "Yankee." Whatever may have been the causes which forced the Western States into an unnatural alliance with New England—whether it was a chimerical fear of losing the free navigation of the Mississippi, the hostility growing out of the madness of the last Presidential contest, or simply an unreasoning ebullition of popular passions—certain it is that the Western States have heretofore been the chief supporters of the war, and have borne nearly the whole of its burdens. They have furnished the only really good soldiers for Mr. Lincoln's armies; whatever successes the North has to console itself for the long list of reverses, are due to them; and whenever, as in the valley of the Mississippi, they have met the Southerners, the battles were far more fierce and less decisive.

New England, the instigator of the war, has monopolized all its spoils without feeling any of its hardships. While she has made up her quotas to the armies by foreign hirelings, her factories, her ships, her jobbers and contractors, have drained the wealth of the Union, and it is to her chiefly that the enormous debt of the Washington Government is due. Henry Ward Beecher, in a recent speech, said, "New England rules the United States," and it has been even so. A New York paper gives us a curious illustration of the completeness of the political ascendancy which "Yankeeland" has been permitted to attain over the other States of the Federation. The Senate, it is well known, is the most important branch of the Federal Government, not only because it is the highest legislative assembly, but because it may on occasion assume judicial functions, and always shares with the President the exercise of the principal executive powers. Now, the chairman of every important Committee of the United States is a Senator from New England, as the following list will show:—

Committee.	Chairman.	Where from.
Foreign Relations	Sumner . .	New England.
Finance	Fessenden .	New England.
Military Affairs	Wilson . . .	New England.
Naval Affairs	Hale	New England.
Post Office	Collamer . .	New England.
Pensions	Posters . . .	New England.
Claims	Clark	New England.
Public Buildings	Footes	New England.
Contingent Expenses	Dixon	New England.

It is astonishing that these palpable facts have so long escaped the attention of the other States in the agonized Union. At last the long-expected cry is raised in the Western States, "While our heart's blood waters the battle-fields of the Union, New England has the profits of the war." Most significant events are taking place. Illinois has just appointed Commissioners to represent her sovereignty in a Convention to be held next month at Louisville, and which has for its avowed object to negotiate terms with the seceders. The measure was not passed without violent protests of the minority, which threatens armed resistance, and Illinois is virtually on the eve of a civil war within her borders. The neighbouring State of Indiana is about to follow her example; and thus it may be that within a few months, unless a great victory on the Mississippi galvanize the Washington Government into life, one after another of the Western States will detach itself from the unholy alliance against the South. A determined attitude on the part of Europe could have precipitated this event months ago, and might still place it beyond the chances of useless battles on which it now depends.

The feelings of the West have found an echo in the Middle States, those great and populous communities which lie, politically as well as geographically, between the sectional extremes of the late Union. Free speech and free press have been restored in the Metropolitan State of New York. From Pennsylvania brave and bold words have been heard, and her people also are growing weary of New England domination. New Jersey has acted with energy and promptness, and has made as yet the most important step towards peace. These are hopeful symptoms, which we shall watch with painful interest. They are signs of returning reason. But alas! a single mischance may dissipate the hopes founded upon them. Were Charleston or Vicksburg to succumb to superior numbers, though their fall could have no bearing upon the ultimate issue of the war, which is already decided beyond doubt, the same madness would once more seize the people of North America, and the demon of bloodshed would again have an indefinite lease of power. Humanity may well rejoice that in the two greatest, and probably the last battle-fields, the chances of war seem to be with the Confederates.

The Twenty-second of February.

This week has brought with it the anniversary most honoured by Americans, whether of the South or North—the anniversary of the birth of Washington. We will not dwell on the reflections which the day suggests—how on this day one portion of the Great Republic, of which he is called the founder, stands arrayed against Washington's immediate countrymen—how his descendants fight this day, and on an immensely vaster scale, the same battle, against superior odds, for self-government and national independence, that he fought against the misguided advisers of George III.—how the Constitution which his wisdom helped to frame has been torn to shreds by those who profess to be his successors, and how the seat he honoured is disgraced by an imbecile jest-monger—how all his solemn warnings have been disregarded, and the lessons which he taught, both by precept and example, have been forgotten. The 22nd of February has now become, and in the memories of two historically distinct nations will remain, the anniversary of a greater event than that of the birth of any man, however exalted over his fellows; it is the anniversary of the birth of a nation.

On the 22nd of February, 1862, the permanent Constitution of the Confederate States came into operation, and Mr. Jefferson Davis commenced his six years' term as the first President of the infant Confederation. It will amply repay to glance rapidly over the historical significance of this event. A year and a few days previous, delegates from six of the Southern States, shortly after joined by a seventh, had assembled at Montgomery, to abjure, in the name and by the authority of their respective constituencies, the Federal compact which bound them to the American Union. For the purpose of ensuring unity and concert of action in so grave a crisis, these States formed themselves provisionally into a Confederation, under a provisional permanent the functions of which were to expire by limitation in one year from the date of its formation. At the same time, however, and with due deliberation, the plenipotentiaries of these seven States agreed upon the bases and framed the conditions of a Government and close alliance, which could derive its validity only from the full and firm endorsement of the popular will, to be ascertained according to long-established usages, and with the slow and solemn formality of law. Never did a revolution so boldly appeal to the people, never was a people's verdict so unanimous. Though the thunder-cloud of war burst upon these States with a thousandfold the fury which the most cautious had feared, though great and splendid armaments were hurled against them while they were almost defenceless and wholly unprepared, though they were cut off from intercourse with the world by being shut out from the great common highway of nations, the people of these States never faltered. The greatness of the danger brought them allies and friends to share it, and the seven States became thirteen. So perfect was the unison of feeling among all classes of the population that, bating the shock and turmoil of war which in all respects bore the characteristics of a foreign war, the change of the Federal agent from Washington to Richmond was almost insensible, and affected the internal tranquillity less than in times of extraneous peace the periodical change of a Presidential incumbent had done. Nowhere were there civil commotions, nowhere any collision with constituted authority. The States acted as sovereignties with the unanimous consent of their citizens. It is impossible to exaggerate the severity of the test to which the framers confidently exposed the new Constitution. In every State, in every town, in every hamlet, a multitude of local and general elections had to be held before it could spring into life; the results of the primary elections had to be sifted and confirmed through the agency of Legislative Assemblies, and all this with a powerful enemy at the outer walls, without any machinery to restrain and repress general or local dissent, if such there should be, or to muzzle the expression of individual opinions—all this at a time when all combined to work upon the timidity of men and to disincline them from so perilous a leap as that proposed. Yet at the appointed time and with the appointed forms, after a year of war and of invasion, the new Government, fully panoplied, as though it dated generations back, commenced its functions. From that day the Revolution ceased to be an untried experiment and became an established fact. That day the Confederate States took their place in the commonwealth of nations and their diplomatic recognition became a simple matter of form and a question of time.

As the Confederacy in its formation may be likened to Minerva, mature as soon as born, so in other respects it may well be likened to Hercules crushing the serpents in his cradle. The infant nation, like the infant individual, usually needs the fostering care of others to ripen into vigorous life. The policy, the self-interest, or the active sympathies of other and older nations have almost always afforded that aid to the new-comer. To the Southern Confederacy all such aids were wanting. To it, for the first time in history, was assigned the cruel task of doing in its infancy what few, and those only the most powerful nations, could have successfully done in their maturity—conducting a war on a scale unprecedented in modern times. The most memorable contests for national independence would have had a different issue, had similar conditions been imposed. We speak not of Greece or Belgium, or even of Italy, to all of whom help was granted in the hour of greatest need and in proportion to that need; not of the Spanish-American colonies, supplied with arms, money, and ships, by the United States; but of the Netherlands, who in their struggle against Spain had the material aid of all Protestant Europe, without counting the substantial assistance of England; the American colonies, which in their War of Independence had for allies the armies and navies of France, Holland, and Spain. How the Confederate Government has stood this extreme trial is proved by the fact that the anniversary of its establishment finds it stronger in moral and material resources, and its enemy weaker, than on the 22nd of February a year ago.

A year ago Northern Americans in London celebrated Washington's birthday—strange contradiction!—with a show of circumstance and ceremony. There was then much valiant talk about "empire," "manifest destiny," "natural boundaries," supposed to extend from the frozen ocean to Cape Horn, and some profane perversion of holy texts to the sanctioning of bloodshed and strife. This year the celebration scarcely affords a chance paragraph to the newspapers, and the only persons known among those present are the officials of the Washington Government. Well might Mr. Adams say that he felt "embarrassed," "in the position of the Irishman who, being somewhat exhilarated, got so far as to doubt his own identity and said, 'Faith, it is not I, but somebody else,' that he felt, in fact, as if he were in a 'straight jacket.'" Well may Mr. Adams doubt his own identity, for, to the disgrace of English statesmanship, he is permitted to represent officially the thirty-three States once constituting the American Republic; when in truth he is "somebody else," the representative of at most twenty of them. He is permitted to do so in violation of the solemn treaties which recognize Virginia, Georgia, and the Carolinas as free, sovereign, and independent States, the treaty signed in this generation which acknowledged Texas as an independent Republic. He is permitted, by a mockery of common sense, and a disregard of common justice, to represent as Minister a country with which his Government has been for two years at hopeless war, the current of whose history he is himself forced to confess is for ever distinct from that of the country to which he belongs, and the anniversary of whose birth he thus unwittingly commemorates, while unblushingly invoking the name of Washington.

What Constitutes a Nation.

There are some words—and those of most frequent use—the meaning of which no one questions, and yet the meaning of which it is most difficult to define. These are words which summarize a range of ideas so vast that the mind fails to comprehend them at a single glance. The word "nation" is one of these words. To fix and determine with any degree of accuracy the scope of its meaning, is something more than an etymological puzzle or even a philosophical speculation; it is the gravest practical problem which a statesman has to solve. When potentates and diplomatists assembled a half century ago to reconstruct the map of Europe, this problem was before them, but they neglected the grand opportunity for its permanent solution. Instead of the boundaries which the Creator had traced on the face of nature, and in the hearts of men, they invented an artificial system, which, however skilfully devised as a balance of power, was in violation of natural laws, and therefore perishable. The peace of Europe was to be secured, not by consulting the instincts of nationality, but by deliberately repressing and crushing them. Political organizations were framed, and political frontiers drawn, not to extend over homogeneous populations, but rather with a view of embracing as many contradictory and irreconcilable elements as possible. Scarcely a Government was constituted by the Congress of Vienna that did not receive under its sway fragmentary nationalities, whose traditions, prejudices, and tendencies were in conflict with its own. In every instance where the peace of Europe has been seriously endangered since, it has been from this cause. The Netherlands, north and south of the Scheldt, differing in race and in religion, could not co-exist under the same governmental head, any more than they could in the time of Caesar, or during the common revolt against Spain. Italy could no longer brook her German masters and her plurality of sovereigns, and, after many centuries, for the first time resolved in earnest to become a nation. Many-headed Germany is haunted in its sleep by the dream of unity. Even in the petty kingdom of Denmark conflicts of nationality are the source of European discord. Poland, always a smouldering volcano, is the most recent and most formidable outbreak of rekindled national life, which, whether burning with a peaceful light, or blazing up in a lurid flame of revolution, is consuming, one after another, the artificial barriers set by the treaties of Vienna.

It has been the fashion of late years to ridicule the idea of nationality, and to treat it as a chimera. Doubtless evil-minded or misguided men have often abused the hold which this idea has upon the human heart, and in its name, as in that of liberty, great crimes, as well as great follies, have been committed. But nationality is, in fact, to the aggregate of a human society what liberty is to each of the individuals in the aggregate. The same imperious necessity which is felt by the individual, of possessing a certain freedom and responsibility of action, to give him self-respect, to develop fully his higher faculties, and to preserve, so to speak, his own identity, this same imperious necessity which is felt by the individual man, is felt, and for precisely the same reasons, by great masses of men. As the adult spurns the leading-strings of the child, so a nation will revolt against any guidance which is not its own, even when that alien guidance is paternal and judicious, which it seldom can be. To this sentiment of nationality, animating alike the smallest as well as the largest human societies, mankind owes some of the most brilliant deeds of heroism; and it cannot be regarded otherwise than as one of the sacred feelings implanted in our breasts. Indeed, it predominates in some respects over nearly all others, for all our relations in life are, in a great measure, regulated by the manners and modes of thought which are the characteristics of the nationality to which we belong. The idea of nationality is, in fact, that of country, and wherever brave men do and dare in defence of that idea, we cannot but honour the deeds and the daring. It is, indeed, impossible to circumscribe, by settled rules, the proper sphere and lawful scope of the sentiment of nationality, because it is most difficult to define what constitutes a nation. Assuredly it is not a population living under the same Government, for many distinct nationalities are frequently brought under a common sway, without in the least losing their distinguishing peculiarities; and on the other hand, a nation may be in all respects a nation, although a multitude of governments take the place of one national head. The heterogeneous populations of the Austrian empire do not constitute a nation, and yet the subjects of all the kings and princes of Germany constitute only one. Community of descent is not altogether a reliable criterion of nationality, for the descendants of the same stock often diverge very widely in national characteristics; and on the other hand, these islands afford a most striking illustration of how completely time and events may fuse antagonistic populations into one strongly marked nationality. But this much is certain, that whenever and from whatever cause the consciousness of national identity pervades a population, a nation is born. Those who belong to it, do so, not because of the operation of any political machinery, but because they have in common something which they cherish, whether that something be in the present or only in the past.

We have just witnessed in the New World the sublime spectacle of the birth and fiery baptism of a nation; to the Old World, Poland is now teaching the lesson, how many trials and through how many generations the sentiment of nationality, once awakened, will survive. Whatever doubts might still have been entertained as to the radical and inherent differences of character between the peoples north and south of the Potomac, no doubt can be entertained that they are distinct nations now and henceforth. The currents of their history are for ever diverted into different channels, for a few brief years have given to each a past never to be forgotten. In the South especially, the sentiment of nationality has struck deeper roots than in most other countries. Not only has the country its statesmen and its generals, its triumphs and its reverses, but each family in the land has its hero or its martyr. If the South had not possessed the conditions of a vigorous nationality before, it would have derived them from the events of this war. Poland, one of the oldest of nations, has not a more heroic age than the Southern Confederacy, the youngest of nations, has already lived through, nor a more inexhaustible wealth of historical recollections than this brave sisterhood of States has amassed. The civilized world has pronounced the attempted murder of Polish nationality a monstrous crime. Is a similar attempt less iniquitous because it is perpetrated in the New World, and under different pretexts? By the unanimous verdict of all generous minds, Poland has amply atoned for the many sins of her past by the long years of suffering and of cruel oppression which she has endured. Are the gushing sympathies which now well forth from every part of Christendom towards her less deserved by the people beyond the Atlantic, whose brief career is so fruitful of promises for the future? At this moment England is preparing to put forth her whole moral might, and to interpose it between the oppressor and the oppressed. All parties and all classes unite in the effort, to the honour of them all be it said. But let it not be forgotten in that hour of overflowing sympathy, extinguishing for the time all sordid feelings, that it is sought in the New World to make another Poland of a country peopled by our own race and near kindred.

The Defences of England.

When the history of a war is written, as in the case of the Crimean war, it generally appears that, but for some comparatively trifling circumstance, the conflict might have been avoided. We are astonished to find how fair a prospect there was of the preservation of peace when we were preparing for an appeal to the sword. A wise Government will learn from this, not that warfare is altogether avoidable, but rather that in the midst of apparently profound peace, war is always possible, and even imminent. Whilst we have been watching with eager interest the contest that has convulsed America, Europe has now and then given due notice that the time has not arrived when the art of warfare may be forgotten. Fourteen months ago England was making ready to avenge the insult offered to her flag by the United States. Italy has been a source of continued anxiety, and still is, for it is highly probable that Victor Emmanuel will have to fight for the kingdom won by French valour and bestowed upon him by the generosity of the French Emperor; and it is not likely that Italy will fight her battles without other nations taking a part. Greece is in a state of governmental anarchy. Turkey is restless. We have lately been on the eve of another Chinese war; we have treated our ally Brazil as an enemy; and France is engaged in a campaign in Mexico. Within a month a still more serious affair has cropped up. The insurrection of the Poles, that was to be conquered in a few days, has proved a truly national movement, and the friends of that long-suffering and heroic people almost dare to hope that the night of dire oppression is past, and that, even if they do not have a separate king, they may, at least, have a separate and independent kingdom, and so far as they are concerned make the Czar of Russia a constitutional monarch. England and France have chafed under the real or supposed duty of non-intervention, and have felt bitterly the anomaly of being permitted to shield Turkey from Russian ambition, and not being permitted to lend a hand to assist the Poles in getting rid of the cruel yoke of Russian bondage. But though the peoples of Western Europe were sullenly consenting to let Russia and Poland fight out the quarrel between themselves, they will not tolerate the intervention of another Power to aid the Muscovite. To the surprise, indignation, and ineffable disgust of the civilized world, the Prussian Government, that has so lately violated the free Constitution of the Prussian people, has entered into a compact with Russia to aid her in case of need, and has further been guilty of arresting Poles on their way to join their compatriots. If Prussia persists in this policy she will inevitably provoke an armed remonstrance. It is therefore, especially at this juncture, a matter of congratulation that the English Government, while making a considerable reduction in the estimates, has not impaired the efficiency of our army and navy. Without anticipating war, we are glad that we are prepared for it, for in our offensive or defensive strength lies our best hope of maintaining peace.

For a professedly non-military Power our army is of considerable dimensions. In India, in addition to the native troops, we have 72,676 men. Besides these we have 14,242 regulars, including 9349 belonging to the India depots. There is a reduction of about 4000 in the present year. The total number of her Majesty's regulars is 220,918. But this is not all. We have 128,000 militia, 14,000 yeomanry, and 150,000 volunteers for home defence, and these, being trained to the use of arms, are the depots from which our regular force may be rapidly and effectively recruited and increased. The total number of men of all departments of the service is over 500,000. Our troops are splendidly-equipped, and our arsenals are brimful of the matériel of war.

But England is essentially a maritime Power; and even Mr. Cobden admits our navy ought to be the largest in the world. We have in commission 150 vessels, carrying 2257 guns, and manned by 30,337 seamen. We have in course of construction and at sea 21 armour-plated ships, and the wooden frames for five more armour-plated ships are to be built. With regard to what Lord Paget very properly calls "the pith, the marrow, and the bone of the service—the seamen"—76,000 officers, seamen, marines, and boys have been voted. Although we have the same number of men, the expenditure for the navy is £1,053,273 less than last year, and this too in spite of an increase in the item for the conveyance of troops. Mr. Cobden found fault with the estimates, but, as usual, refused to divide the House. We confess we do not understand the honourable member's tactics. If he think the estimates excessive, he ought to place on record a practical proof of his dissent from them; if he do not think them excessive, he ought not to grumble at them. We are, however, convinced that Mr. Cobden has so much sense and patriotism that he would not find fault with the estimates, if he did not know that his fault-finding will not produce any change. He contended that wooden ships are useless; but that is not quite certain, though it is true that they are not fit to contend with iron-plated ships; and our Admiralty is putting our wooden ships into armour as fast as possible. Further, Mr. Cobden seems to think that hereafter nothing but turret ships will be used, and therefore, we shall require less men. That was certainly no reason for carping at the vote for the current year, seeing that at present we are obliged to depend on other than turret ships. Nor is it at all surprising that Captain Cole's cupola ships are better than broadside ships; and beyond question, they will not alone constitute a navy. Like Mr. Cobden, we sit at the feet of nautical Gamaliels, and when he prates about the strength of the Federal navy, we must remind him that men who know something about the matter think that a few first-class English vessels could sweep the Federal navy from the seas. The hon. member made an extraordinary slip on Monday night. He said: "He asked any practical man whether, if we had a war with America to-morrow, he would send one of our line-of-battle ships, with 700 or 800 men, and thirty or forty tons of gunpowder on board, to meet the iron-clad Monitor on the other side of the Atlantic?" Has Mr. Cobden not heard of "the iron-clad Monitor, on the other side of the Atlantic, foundering? Perhaps the hon. member refuses to believe in Federal reverses. If we are so foolish as to take heed of the loud bark of the Yankees, we are not so idiotic as to fear the bite of their dead dogs. Mr. Cobden informs us, on the authority of Captain Coles, that "all their (Federal) iron-clad Monitors are mounted with guns of 450 lbs." This may be true, but we have yet to learn whether they can compete with vessels of different construction, whether such guns are compatible with speed and seaworthiness, and whether the iron-clads may not be disabled or taken by boarding. The Monitor foundered at sea in something less than half a gale of wind, and the Montauk had her turret damaged by a land battery. We repeat, that turret ships may be a useful appendage to, but they do not of themselves constitute, a navy, and until now they have not proved successful or invulnerable on the other side of the Atlantic.

Our saving in the army and navy estimates for the present year is £2,053,386. The army estimates are £15,060,237, and the navy £10,736,032, being together £25,796,269, of which amount £3,525,216 is for the non-effective service. No expenditure that maintains the integrity of our empire is extravagant, and it is even, in a pecuniary point of view, cheaper to spend a large income in preparing for war than having to go to war from not being prepared. When Mr. Cobden tells us that having a large army and navy encourages nations to go to war, he only states a half truth, for being prepared does not so much stimulate the spirit of aggression as it discourages attack. Strength is only comparative, and when ambition makes a people go to war, they do so, not because they have a large army and navy, but because they think themselves stronger than their neighbours.

English Universities.

The idea conveyed to the mind of a foreigner by the word "University" varies according as he is a German, Frenchman, or American; but is so utterly different from that which is conveyed to the mind of an Englishman, that it may be pronounced a truth, that foreign Universities have scarcely anything in common with English Universities, except the name. No one can reasonably doubt that the political and social life of a civilized country is influenced to a great extent by the system of education under which the youth of the wealthier classes is trained, and when that system aims at something more than mere instruction in the various branches of knowledge, and actually succeeds in framing the character, defining the views, and controlling the sentiments of those who are made subject to it, the enormous power which is thereby exercised for good or evil over the destinies of a great country, and indirectly over the world, may easily be imagined, and all this the Universities of England pretend to do and succeed in doing; and how far their influence has been wielded for good and not for evil, the present position of this country fairly indicates. Opinions may and must differ on the relative excellence of political systems, on the wisdom of a particular line of policy, on the doctrines maintained by political parties, or on the conduct of a particular Government; but the world at large is every day becoming more and more impressed with the fact, that English statesmen and educated Englishmen at large do endeavour to act in both foreign and domestic affairs with straightforward honesty of purpose, and a strenuous desire to conquer prejudices and obey reason.

Believing, then, as we do in the great effects produced by our University systems, we think it possible that some exposition of the constitution of one of them would prove not only valuable but also interesting to our readers. To the English portion of them the subject is, to a considerable extent, familiar; but to many of those who have felt the results and appreciated the assistance of such an institution, a review of its principal features may be acceptable, while to those who have not been equally fortunate, as well as to foreigners, no apology for introducing the subject can well be required. Possibly no one is not aware that Oxford and Cambridge are the principal seats of learning, and stand on an equal footing in all respects with each other. It is difficult to comprehend why Lord

Macaulay should have designated Oxford as the "more splendid" of the two sisters; but with him, as with all men, the proverb was true, omne ignotum pro magnifico, for Macaulay was a Cambridge man. We, however, make no invidious distinction, and it is merely as a matter of convenience, and to obviate confusion, that, at present, our remarks will be directed exclusively to the University of Cambridge.

In order to make ourselves intelligible, we must, at the outset, state that the members of the University are divided into two great distinctive classes, those who have terminated their educational career, and those who are still engaged therein; or, to use the technical expression, those who are no longer in statu pupillari, and those who are. The former is the governing body, the latter the governed. The former class has attained the degree of Masters of Arts; the latter is subdivided into two bodies—first, those who have attained the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and, second, those who are yet students in the ordinary acceptation of the term and of course have not attained to any degree at all—they are usually called undergraduates. A student becomes in the regular course a Bachelor of Arts at the end of three years from his first enrolment at the University, and a Master of Arts at the end of six years. Premising thus much, by way of explanation, we come at once to the constitution of the University. There is, then, as of course is to be expected in a monarchical country, a supreme ruler, the Chancellor, chosen for life to an office of honour rather than of responsibility or power, and always filled by a personage of the highest rank. The former Chancellor was the Prince Consort, the present is the Duke of Devonshire. His duties devolve upon, and are performed by, the Vice-Chancellor, who is chosen from the list of the Heads or Masters of the Colleges, of whom we shall presently speak more at large. There are two Houses of Assembly, to use an expression not quite accurate, but intelligible to foreign ears. The upper is called "The Council of Senate," the lower "The Senate." The former is composed of sixteen members, one half of whom hold office for two years, and the other half for four years. Four of these members are chosen from the Heads of the Colleges; four from the list of the Professors of Literature and Science, of whom there are twenty-eight; and eight from the Senate. This Senate, or Lower House of Assembly, consists of all the Masters of Arts, and has the same power and exercises the same kind of influence in the affairs of the University as the House of Commons does exercise in England, and as the Lower House of Assembly is supposed to exercise in Continental States. Of course, only a small proportion of the Senate is continuously resident in Cambridge, but those who are resident have the privilege of electing the Members of the Council, or Upper House. The Vice-Chancellor and all the officers exercising magisterial, financial, or other authority on behalf of the University, are chosen by a somewhat artificial system, and hold office for one year; for each office the Council of Senate nominate two persons, of whom the Senate elect one. All laws, orders, and regulations emanate from the Council of Senate, but must be ratified and approved by the Senate. Such being the constitution of the University, as presented in its broadest outline, we cannot fail to be struck with the marvellous constancy with which, even in designing the organization of a social institution, the English people endeavour to imitate the framework of the political system under which they live. Nor must it be supposed that this constitution is a mere remnant of antique prejudice preserved by a spirit that clings to the cobwebs of five centuries. It is the silken web of the nineteenth century, a thing of yesterday, almost an untried experiment, based on and connected with the primary system, but itself numbering but six years of existence, the result of the inquiries and recommendations of a Royal Commission, embodied in a Bill, made an Act by the two Houses of Parliament, and ratified by the Royal Assent on the 29th day of July, 1856. Yet how it bears the stamp of an English system!—it is monarchical culminating in one head, whose authority is so limited as to resemble rather the Chairmanship of a Board than the power of a President—it is restrictive and conservative, for the nomination of all officers, and the right of originating all laws, is vested in the Council or Upper House; it is democratic, for the election of officers, and the exclusive right of passing laws, is vested in the Senate or Lower House; and that this assembly is essentially democratic is a fact at once apparent when we reflect that it embraces every person who is no longer in statu pupillari, that there is no intermediate body, and that the degree of Master of Arts, follows, as a matter of course, upon that of Bachelor of Arts being conferred at the end of six years from the student's first admission to the University. Its members are not merely in the vigour of life and intellect, but even in the youth of existence—not yet bound to a line of thought from which it is an effort to free the mind—not yet restricted to a line of policy to deviate from which would incur the accusation of inconsistency. Free thus from prejudice, so far as humanity can be free, tempered with the wisdom and discretion taught by constant and familiar intercourse with a small nation of wise men, ready to bow to the demands of the mighty in knowledge and foresight, the truest political and social leaders, yet never the slaves of a partisan, they present the finest materials for a deliberative assembly that Utopianism could imagine, and would perhaps effect results in themselves perfect were an approximation to the perfect possible, amid the faults, foibles, and weakness of the human mind.

Perhaps, however, the most interesting feature of the University system is the existence of the colleges in a separate and independent state: in point of fact, it is the aggregate of these bodies which constitutes the University. Each college is a petty state, autocratic, and autonomous: each possesses a system of government entirely its own, and almost as complex and elaborate as that of the University itself. Moreover, the University exercises no jurisdiction or power whatever, over the individual colleges, either coercive or dictatorial. They have, by mutual compact, agreed to unite for certain purposes, and for those only; and beyond the defined limits of those purposes, their federation cannot possibly be extended. They respect the rights of each other, and consistently vindicate their own claim to independence. They are not even taxed for the benefit of a common fund, and an attempt made by the Commission appointed under the Act of Parliament, to which we have already alluded, to impose such a tax, was met with a resistance as unanimous as it was successful. The purposes for which they have agreed to unite are two fold; first, the examination of the students of all the colleges in a body, and the conference of degrees consequent thereon; second, the exercise of a proper control over the whole body of students by what we may call a magisterial, and constabulary, or police authority. The University, however, a corporan, and can acquire, and does possess property; but it is poor, and the colleges are rich; it is decidedly weak, and they are decidedly strong. The most strenuous defender of State rights in America would not be slow in coming to the conclusion that the relations of the colleges to each other and to the University leave nothing to be desired.

Now these colleges are in number eighteen; each is governed, or rather presided over, by a Head or Master, who is elected for life by the Fellows of the college. Certainly, his power, which before was somewhat overweening, has been shorn of its fairest proportions by the Commission, and a system of monarchical or even despotic authority, which harmonised admirably with the views of a Tudor Dynasty, has been exchanged for one which more resembles the limited prerogative of Queen Victoria. Still, from the earliest times the Fellows of the college have held the power of the purse, a power which any one in the least acquainted with the working of constitutional forms of government will readily appreciate; and the purse of a college is no mere shadow—it is not a bundle of Chase's greenbacks or unredeemable bonds; it has a substantiality about it that is highly appreciated by those who have the good fortune to share the contents, and its currency has always been cash. In fact, the revenues of these colleges are enormous; some few range as high as £30,000 a year, and are entirely derived from landed estates situate in the fairest parts of England. The colleges have always been specially exempted from the Mortmain Acts, which, at various times, and with varied strictness, have hindered or prevented the appropriation of land to charitable purposes. Even Henry VIII., who stripped the monasteries with ruthless vigour, founded and endowed the wealthiest and greatest of the colleges of Cambridge. These estates are managed by the societies to which they respectively belong, without foreign interference, the only provision being that no estates shall be sold without the approval of one of those innumerable boards of commission the establishment of which seems to be the main design of a modern Act of Parliament. Doubtless, this is a very wise precaution, but possibly the consideration may suggest itself, that members of a college, like private individuals, have sufficient regard for their own interests, if not for their successors, to keep all that they have, and, if possible, to acquire more. As to the disposition of these revenues, it will at present suffice to state that they are applied, in the first instance, to the maintenance of the splendid establishments which each college supports, the repair of its edifices, the service of the chapel, and the supplies of the Hall; a salary varying from £800 to £2000 a year is awarded to the Head, to whom also is allotted a fine house within the precincts of the college, and who is thus enabled to support his position with proverbial dignity and hospitality. Next, educational objects, such as the payment of tutors, lecturers, and other offices, and the sums awarded by way of prizes and annuities to students of superior merit, claim their share; the residue, with reasonable reservation, is distributed among the Fellows of the college. These persons, to whom we have before alluded, are selected from students of the college who have taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Merit constitutes the sole title to the honour and emoluments of the position; the number of Fellows is limited, and vacancies are filled as they occur. Assembled under the presidency of their head, they discharge the functions of an administrative body, electing their officers and controlling the educational and financial departments. The tenure of their Fellowships is determined in some cases by marriage, in some by effluxion of time, in others by the omission to take the Orders of the Church, but the rule of the colleges is not uniform. The Fellows may reside or not, as taste directs them. If they attempt the adventurous career of the learned professions, they command the means of support while success is yet uncertain. While those who remain at college are enabled to pursue those studies to which their lives are not unfrequently devoteded. Combining, as in many instances they do, great learning with great simplicity of mind and a lofty elevation of character with a frank and genial disposition, they seem, as they follow the even tenor of their existence, to catch a gleam from the immortal light of the sages and poets by whose works their genius is illumined, and in their turn kindle a flame to the powers of which youth is not insensible, and to the contemplation of which even manhood may turn when wearied and distracted with the turmoil and confusion of every-day life. They rivet the link which binds the successive generations of society, and present an impregnable barrier to the assaults of fashion and caprice. Supported by the vast endowments of their foundations, and strong in the loyal support of those around and about them, quite independent of government or popular aid, they are not compelled to vary their system of learning or theology to suit the shifting views of moralists or politicians. Their strength lies in their perfect independence, and such independence we believe to be an indispensable element in the success of all great educational institutions.

Before concluding, we would draw attention to the remarkable capacity of our Universities for producing men fitted for every walk of life. At present we cannot speak of the nature of the studies pursued therein, but it is sufficient, perhaps, here to state that they are principally confined to classics and mathematics. In spite, however, of that which to an American must appear a narrow restriction, it is the fact that men from the Universities fill and adorn every kind of station in life, and exercise with success every variety of profession. The bulk of the clergy is drawn from Oxford and Cambridge, and the Episcopal Bench is entirely recruited from those sources. We see men who have attained the highest University honours now members of the Cabinet; they abound in the House of Commons, and at the bar. But we may go further, and find officers in the army who have taken with them from the Universities a sound sense and a firmness of character which is by no means despised in the mess-room and on parade. Some have even exchanged the lecture-room for the merchant's office and the banker's house, and have displayed a practical industry and shrewdness that will bear comparison with the experience of those who, from the age of sixteen, have been devoted to the ledger and the waste-book. One objection to our remarks we are bound to anticipate. We shall be accused rather as enthusiastic admirers, than as sober critics, observant only of virtues, and blind to faults; but we frankly own that the Universities are by no means free from great errors and great defects. Yet these appear rather in the details than in the general features of their systems. Abuses and mistakes are inseparable from the contrivances of human ingenuity, and no institutions can have existed for five centuries untainted and unalloyed. Many of the evils that do exist are not incapable of reformation; some, and perhaps the most glaring, are not the results of the system; but whatever their origin or nature, they are not to be removed but by wise and deliberate measures, lest the remedy prove a greater mischief than the disease.

THE ASCENDENCY OF THE FEDERALISTS.

How little the idea of party government entered into the views of the first President of the United States, and of the able and earnest statesmen who surrounded him, may be judged by the composition of his Administration. The Cabinet in those days consisted only of four members; of whom the most important were the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury. These two offices were filled by the two men who afterwards came to be regarded as the chiefs of contending parties, and who actually represented the conflicting tendencies which divided the people and the Constitutional Convention. Those who inclined respectively in either direction were known at first as Federalists and anti-Federalists; the former being the party which desired to establish a Confederation in the strict and limited sense of that term, the latter wishing to create a Government which, if not formally and avowedly national, might in due time become so. The Constitution was the result of a compromise between these two views. When that compromise had been agreed upon, and was actually at work, the names, and in some sense the position, of parties were interchanged. The national party, desiring before all things to strengthen the bonds of union and strengthen the central power, were naturally known as Federalists; while the title of anti-Federalist was as naturally assigned to those who maintained against the Federal Government the separate and independent sovereignty of the several States. Had there been a real and clear division of parties beforehand, this interchange of names could hardly have taken place during the lifetime of the statesmen who upheld each view in the Constitutional Convention. But as party organization had never existed, and party names had not become familiar, the change was so easily effected that few European readers are aware that the name of Federalists was ever applied to the party which opposed what Frenchmen would call the "solidarity" of the United States.

The chief of this party, which had probably from the first a majority of the people on its side, and which speedily assumed or acquired the name of Republican—that of anti-Federalist seeming to imply something of disloyalty and antagonism to the newly-established Federal Constitution, and being therefore unsuitable to a party by which that Constitution was fairly and loyally accepted—was Washington's Secretary of State, Thomas Jefferson. This gentleman was tainted from his youth with what were long scouted in England as French ideas—the doctrines of the wild and generally infidel philosophers whose teachings did so much to prepare the way for the French Revolution. He it was who drew up the Declaration of Independence; he it was who foisted upon the United States the absurd assertion that "all men are born free and equal." He was by nature an intriguer, and by prejudice an Abolitionist. But, though by no means a great statesman or a political philosopher, he was one of the most shrewd and capable practical politicians of his day: he was more pliant and more adapted to win popularity than any of his rivals; and he was fortunate in falling upon a time and country in which revolutionary theories were in favour. He was well fitted for the leadership of the popular party, which asserted the individuality and sovereignty of the States—of which they were naturally jealous—against what was believed by the foremost minds of his age to be the general interest in the development of a strong and united nationality. He was fortunate, moreover, in the subsequent turn of events, which made it evident that the object of his adversaries was unattainable; that causes deeper and more insuperable than State jealousies or popular prejudice must render the formation of a national Government impossible.

Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, was perhaps the ablest man among the Federalists. He had wished to create a really national system of government, by far the best thing that could have been done, had it only been practicable. He had an evident leaning towards monarchy, not from any sentiment of loyalty, but from a sense of political expediency. Perhaps he did not fully comprehend the impracticability of improvising royalty, and the helpless weakness which must always beset a constitutional monarchy founded on the shifting soil of popular favour, and built of the ruins left by revolution. Only an ancient dynasty, rooted among a people accustomed for ages to reverence the royal name, can possibly fulfil the delicate functions of a merely nominal sovereignty. But, at all events, Hamilton saw that the United States would never accept a monarchy; and his wish, therefore, was to establish, under Republican forms, a Government with as few of the weaknesses and vices of Republicanism as possible. He desired that the President and Senate should hold office during good behaviour, and that the State Executives, with very limited authority, should be appointed by the Central Power. Even in the most liberal construction that they would bear, therefore, the powers bestowed by the Constitution upon the Federal Government fell far short of what he would have assigned to it. But he did his best, consistently with the Constitution, to strengthen and consolidate the authority of that Government. He was, therefore, the natural chief of his party, which, however, did not generally share his more extreme and esoteric opinions. The Federalists were probably from the first in a minority among the people; but, until party antagonism assumed an organized form, their known ability and their high personal character preserved for them a decided ascendancy in the councils of the Union. Another source of influence which they could ill have spared was the high and unrivalled authority of General Washington; who, though removed beyond the sphere of party conflict, was believed to share almost entirely the views of the Federalists.

Mr. Secretary Hamilton's two principal measures were the funding of the public debt, including the assumption of a large portion of the State debts, and the creation of a United States' bank. He carried both his measures, but not without vehement opposition. The opposition to the assumption of the State debts appears to have proceeded entirely from local considerations. Those States which had the largest debts—among which were Massachusetts and South Carolina—favoured the measure; Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, and Georgia were averse to it; though even from these States some clear-sighted Federalists discerned its importance in their point of view, and gave it their support. The opposition to the bank in Congress is also said to have been animated by local jealousies. Its seat had been fixed at Philadelphia, and the Southern members are affirmed to have wished to locate it further South. However this may be, every Southern vote but seven was given in the negative, and every Northern vote but one in the affirmative. Washington submitted the bill to his Cabinet, asking their opinions as to its constitutionality. It was pronounced constitutional by Hamilton and Knox. Jefferson and Randolph maintained a contrary view. The President's opinion was shown by his assent to the Bill, notwithstanding the division in his Cabinet.

After this, the feeling of personal antagonism between the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury grew stronger and more bitter; and nothing but the irresistible influence of General Washington could have made it possible for them to act together. In the meantime, partisanship was growing more general and more angry in Congress and in the country; and there was already visible that geographical line of party demarcation which should have warned all clear-sighted statesmen of the radical evil that lay at the root of all the disputes and all the perils that from time to time arose, and which, if it could not be cured, must inevitably end sooner or later—as it has ended—in the disruption of the Union. It would not be easy, even in an old-established and loyal kingdom, to maintain national unity very long under a system of government by party if party lines coincided with geographical boundaries. Under a Federal Government the danger is less pressing, but more certain and incurable. It is true, on the one hand, that the independence of the States narrows very much the area of party conflict and the importance of party victory or defeat; and therefore a Federation may contrive to hold together, despite the antagonism felt on domestic topics between its component parts, longer than a single State could do if its northern half were at feud with the southern; simply because party strife affects individual interests less keenly in the former case than in the latter. But, on the other hand, it is obvious that when States appear in the field as partisans, party conflicts become too serious and too violent to be permanently confined within constitutional limits; and that when all the States south of a geographical line are ranged on one side, and all north of that line on the other, the debate is likely to be ere long transferred from the halls of the Legislature to the field of battle. Looking back on the history of the United States, it is plain that what has now happened was certain from the first to happen as soon as the foreign and commercial policy of the nation (which is under the absolute control of Congress) became of such interest to the States as to provoke them to angry antagonism, or as soon as there seemed the least danger that Congress, under the control of a party representing one section of the Union, would attempt interference in the domestic policy of the other. The tendency of parties to become sectional, which appeared before the expiration of Washington's first term of office, obviously carried with it the seeds of disunion if not of civil war. But at first the subjects of sectional controversy were not those which for the last forty years have been constantly before the minds of both North and South. The first tariff awakened no vehement controversy. The Northern States did not care to take a strong line in hostility to slavery; the Southerners were by no means unanimous in its defence. The fact that all the foremost men in the country were slaveholders, while few of them approved of slavery in the abstract, checked any disposition to make this subject the theme of party conflict. It was chiefly on topics of financial or foreign policy that the North and South found themselves in antagonism. The greater length of the war in the Southern States, and their greater efforts in its prosecution, left them in a state of embarrassment and distress which brought them on many occasions into political conflict with the North; and as they had been by far the greatest sufferers in the conflict with Great Britain, they naturally felt towards her an antagonism which the Administration did its utmost to discourage.

The war between France and England compelled the President to take up a distinct course of foreign policy. It was clearly the interest and the duty of America to remain neutral. She could gain nothing, and would risk a great deal, by quarrelling with England, which was now infinitely better able to hold her own than she had been in 1776 and the subsequent years; and France, engaged in a revolution at home, and in war with half the world on her frontiers, could not again render aid to the United States. Moreover, the insolent tone of the French Republic was galling in the extreme to the Administration, and prevented them from feeling any of that sympathy with their quondam allies which might have blinded them to their country's interests. But the Opposition were blind; and the neutrality of the Government was furiously denounced as subservience to England. Only the casting vote of the Vice-President saved in the Senate a bill for enforcing the observance of neutrality on American citizens; and in 1795 the treaty concluded with Great Britain only just escaped defeat.

In the meantime, Jefferson had resigned at the end of 1793; and Hamilton in 1795. General Washington announced his intention to decline a third election in 1797; and retired amid the general regret of the country. Yet so high did party spirit run, that a leading paper of the day could actually speak of "the Father of his country" in such terms as these:—

If ever a nation was debauched by a man, the American nation has been debauched by Washington. If ever a nation was deceived by a man, the American nation has been deceived by Washington. Let his conduct then be an example to future ages. Let it serve as a warning that no man may be an idol. Let the history of the Federal Government instruct mankind that the mask of patriotism may be worn to conceal the foulest designs against the liberties of the people.

The closeness with which parties were balanced was shown in the contest for the succession to the vacant chair of Washington. The whole number of votes in the Electoral Colleges was 138, making the absolute majority 70. John Adams, of Massachusetts, late Vice-President, the candidate of the Federalists, received seventy-one votes; Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, the Republican candidate, had sixty-seven votes. John Adams had the votes of every Northern State, except Pennsylvania, and three votes from Delaware, and seven from Maryland. Jefferson had all the rest of the Southern votes, and the whole vote of Pennsylvania, save one. Thus in the first great party contest, the two sections stood arrayed in antagonism, and sectionalism was established as the basis of American party organization. That vote might fairly be said to have been ominous of the vote of 1860, and of its consequences.

Parties were closely balanced in the House; in the Senate, the Administration had a majority. War with France was generally anticipated, and preparations for it were made; but those very preparations averted the calamity. The resumption of negotiations, ordered by the President without the knowledge of his Cabinet, produced a disagreement which led finally to a breach among the Federalists. The Cabinet was broken up; and on the recurrence of the Presidential election in 1800 Mr. Adams was defeated. Seventy-three votes each were cast for Burr and Jefferson; sixty-five for Adams; and sixty-four for Pinckney—the rule then being that the candidate receiving the largest number of votes became President and the next Vice-President. The election, by this tie, was thrown into the House of Representatives, where Mr. Burr received the support of the Federalists. After a long and obstinate contest, the votes of Delaware and South Carolina were withdrawn, and Jefferson, receiving the votes of ten States out of sixteen, was elected. New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island voted for Mr. Burr. The Federal party never recovered this defeat; and for the next twenty years the political heirs of Mr. Jefferson had a monopoly of power.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.*

It is much to be deplored that religion should ever be associated with asceticism, and wisdom with dullness, instead of the one being arrayed in the garments of gladness, and the other being pleasing as well as useful. We have, indeed, made a considerable advance towards correcting these errors. Religion is no longer, except amongst a few sections, considered incompatible with the free enjoyment of social intercourse and social pleasures, and religion has consequently exercised a powerful and beneficent influence in all classes of the community. At present, it is not considered necessary to make the pursuit of knowledge as difficult as possible, and there is even some danger of our having so smoothed the way as to make the learning of the age superficial and fruitless. An author who wishes to gain a reputation—and to do this he must have readers—is bound to blend amusement with instruction. The task is exceedingly difficult. Study will make most writers instructive, and there is no lack of writers who can amuse—it is the talent for combining the two that is so rare—the capacity for preparing mental food that is equally palatable and nutritious. Mr. Senior accomplishes this admirably. Those who read this volume for amusement will be almost unconsciously instructed, and those who seek in it instruction will find that a true story well told is as exciting to the imagination as well told fiction. We hope this observation will not be misconstrued. We do not mean that our author has produced that strange medley known as historical romance, in which truth is only employed to make falsehood more dangerous because deceptive; but that he gives life to the records of the past, and in this volume before us he has done so under unfavourable circumstances. The space occupied by the quarterly reviewer is limited, no matter how vast the subject he treats upon, and the most he can hope to do is to present a sketch; but let it be remembered a sketch may be perfect. Mr. Senior eschews details, except when they are necessary for illustration; yet we venture to say that his essays generally convey not only a clearer but a fuller view of the subjects than do the elaborate works on which they are nominally founded. In reading this volume we recall the remark of an author who said, "I did not understand my book or its subject until I read the review of it in the Edinburgh."

The first sketch will probably be as popular as any that follow; it treats of the era of the French Revolution, of the events that changed the face of modern Europe, and that still exercise a controlling influence over the minds as well as the actions of men. The life of M. Berryer—to whom was granted the very exceptional good fortune of having a son as distinguished as himself—would, in any period, have supplied ample materials for a biography. For sixty-four years he was engaged in the practice of the law, and this in a manner that gave him a better opportunity than is enjoyed by the English barrister of investigating the character and designs of his clients. In England and Scotland the professional rule prohibits any intercourse between the advocate and his client, except in the presence of the client's solicitor;

But on the Continent not only does no such rule exist, but the counsel appear to perform almost all the duties which with us are confined to the solicitors. We shall find M. Berryer receiving his clients, calling on them, travelling with them, obtaining evidence—in short, acting almost always in the double capacity of counsel and attorney.

In 1778, at the age of twenty-one, M. Berryer was admitted to the bar, and does not appear to have known the tedious interval that almost universally (at least, in this country) intervenes between the call to the bar and the advent of clients. Mr. Senior, who afterwards dwells upon the horrors of the Reign of Terror, prefaces that part of his sketch by some anecdotes that show the whole system was corrupt, and that revolution, though a violent, was the only, remedy. It is not surprising that monarchs and governments should dread revolution, but it is wonderful that they do not perceive that revolution is the offspring of tyranny and bad government—that it is the natural effort of the body politic to get rid of mortal disease. When such incidents as the following were tolerated—when they were of every-day occurrence—how could the nobility of France be astonished that at length the people rose against their oppressors whom they despised even more than they hated?

As a further illustration of the morals of the old regime, we shall introduce in this place the notice of a more important cause of M. Berryer's, though it terminated at a later period of his career—that of Madame de Pestre de Seneffe. When the events which we have to relate commenced, she was between fifty and sixty years old, and resided at Brussels, a widow with seven children, and a still more numerous progeny of grandchildren; enjoying a high reputation, and a large jointure derived from property in Belgium and in France. At a supper in the palace of the Prince de Soubise, a set of Parisian fashionables resolved that one of them should proceed to Brussels and marry the opulent widow. The necessary funds were supplied by a contribution, and the choice of the emissary was left to chance. The lot fell upon the Comte de Wargemont, a man of high family, and of considerable property, heavily encumbered.

On his arrival at Brussels he introduced himself to Madame de Pestre, and secured the services of her maid and of her confessor. The maid concealed him one evening in her mistress's bedroom. In the middle of the night he showed himself. Madame de Pestre called for assistance. This was the signal for the appearance of the maid, who urged on her mistress the danger to her reputation of an ecclat, and proposed that the advice of the confessor should be taken. The Count protested that his indiscretion had been forced on him by the violence of his passion; and the confessor recommended that all scandal should be avoided by an immediate marriage. Madame de Pestre was weak enough to consent; but as she yielded, not to love, but to fear, she insisted that the marriage should take place in Brussels, that she and all her estates should continue subject to the laws of Flanders, that her husband should have no power to require her to enter France, that she should continue absolute mistress of her property, and that the only benefit derived by the Count should be a life income of 20,000 francs, and 100,000 francs as capital.

The marriage on these terms took place in February 1776. The husband almost immediately quitted his wife, and in June wrote to ask her whether she could suppose that he had any motive for marrying an old woman except the full command of her fortune. A few days afterwards he informed her that he intended to seize all her property in France, and to force her to join him there. His attempts to execute these threats produced a compromise, in pursuance of which a divorce a mensa et thoro, in a suit instituted by the husband, was pronounced by the ecclesiastical tribunal of Mechlin; and the Count, in exchange for all his claims under the marriage or the settlement, received 350,000 francs and an annuity of 10,000 more.

The 350,000 francs, however, were soon spent, and the Count renewed his legal warfare. He attempted to set aside the divorce, succeeded in getting possession of the French estates, and kept up a never-ending litigation respecting those in Belgium. Madame de Pestre died, worn out with care and vexation. The annexation of Belgium rendered the whole property of her children subject to the jurisdiction of the French laws, and the Count spent the remainder of his life in prosecuting them from tribunal to tribunal. M. Berryer was counsel for Madame de Pestre and for her descendants; and he dwells upon his exertions in their cause as one of the most arduous and one of the most brilliant parts of his professional career. They procured him on one occasion a curious testimony of admiration. M. de Wargemont was dead, and his sister, Madame de Querrieux, had succeeded to some of his claims, and apparently to some of his litigiousness. As her brother's representative, she prosecuted an appeal against the Pestre family. An elderly lady sat behind M. Berryer while he conducted the defence. She was observed to listen with great emotion, and as soon as he sat down, pressed him to accept, as a mark of her admiration, a ring made of the hair of her youth.

During the Reign of Terror M. Berryer was obliged to relinquish his professional pursuits, so far as pleading in open court was concerned. He determined to refuse all public offices, but he did not altogether escape suspicion; and had it not been for his friends he would have been added to the countless victims of the terrible Committee. He obtained admission into the Treasury as sub-agent;

In this new post, his days were passed in the office, and his evenings in transacting the legal business of his former clients; and again he fancied himself safe. Some vexations, indeed, he was exposed to, but they were almost ludicrous annoyances. He and his wife were forced to bring their table into the street, and to consume, in the presence of the passers-by, "le diner patriotique." His wife was sometimes forced to attend at the baker's to inspect the sale of bread, to see that no one was served before his turn, and that no one was allowed to purchase beyond his strict wants. At other times she had to head a deputation from the women of the section to the Convention, deliver a patriotic speech, and receive the fraternal embrace of the president.

M. Berryer was entrusted with the secret intention of overthrowing Robespierre—a confidence that might have cost him his life:—

Such was the state of things when, on the 24th Prairial An 2 (June 12, 1794), Bourdon de l'Oise requested a visit from M. Berryer. He went, little expecting the frightful confidence that was to be reposed in him. "Robespierre," said Bourdon, "has become my enemy. He intends to murder me by the guillotine. I have resolved to be beforehand, and to destroy him with my own hand." As proofs of his courage and resolution, he displayed the dress which he had worn at the storm of the Bastille, still covered with the blood of its defenders; the plumes which had ornamented his cap in the Vendean war, torn by balls in every feather; and the huge sword with which he had pierced many an enemy, and which was now to be plunged into the heart of Robespierre. Berryer listened in terror; but still more dangerous matter was to come. Bourdon added, that he had selected him as depositary, not only of his secrets, but of his last wishes and of his fortune, and placed in his hands a parcel containing his will, his title-deeds, and instructions to be followed in the very probable event of Bourdon's fall before he had an opportunity to execute his attempt, or in consequence of the attempt.

For forty-five anxious days, and almost sleepless nights, M. Berryer retained this terrible deposit. He was now for the first time an actual conspirator. His connection with the chief conspirator was notorious. His safety seemed to depend on Bourdon's immediate success in destroying, by his own hand, both Robespierre and the oligarchy of which he was the president. Assassination is a desperate resource. The attempt itself rarely succeeds, and where it does succeed rarely produces the intended result.

Happily the tyrant fell, and the worst phase of the revolution was over. We need not further pursue M. Berryer's career, though we may remind our readers that he defended Marshal Ney, and incurred the enmity of the Bourbons by doing his best to prevent them committing a crime and a blunder which even to this day is freshly remembered against them.

The volume comprises eight sketches, including "Lord Campbell's Chief Justices," and we but do them justice in saying that they were worthy of a place in that Review which first gave to the world the biographical essays of Macaulay.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE OF THE FEDERAL PRESIDENT.

WASHINGTON, Thursday, February 12.

The President to-day sent to the Senate the following despatches:—

MR. DAYTON TO MR. SEWARD.
(Extract, No. 255.)

Paris, January 15, 1863.

Sir,—A despatch will shortly be sent by M. Drouyn de Lhuys to M. Mercier, requesting him to suggest to you on a suitable occasion the propriety of appointing Commissioners to treat with the South for peace, and for Union if possible; if not possible, for such terms of separation as may be eventually agreed upon. This communication was submitted by M. Drouyn de Lhuys to the Emperor on the 9th inst., and returned to him by the Emperor yesterday. The despatch answers what is supposed would have been the objections to a proposal for an armistice or mediation.

1. It proposes, it says, no interference of any kind by a foreign Power.
2. It does not require or ask for any cessation of hostilities pending the negotiations; but, like the negotiations of peace in 1783 between the United States and Great Britain, permits everything to proceed as if no efforts for a settlement were being made.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

WM. L. DAYTON.
To his Excellency W. H. Seward, Secretary of State, &c.

M. DROUYN DE LHUYS TO M. MERCIER.

(Translation.)

Department of Foreign Affairs, Political Division
Paris, Jan. 9, 1863.

Sir,—In forming the purpose of assisting, by the proffer of our good offices, to shorten the period of those hostilities which are desolating the American continent, we have to be guided beyond all by the friendship which actuates the Government of the Emperor in regard to the United States. The little success of our exertions might chill the interest with which we follow the fluctuations of this contest, but the sentiment to which we have yielded, is too sincere for indifference to find place in our thought, or that we should cease to be painfully affected while the war continues to rage. We cannot regard without profound regret, this war, worse than civil, comparable to the most terrible distractions of the ancient republics, and whose disasters multiply in proportion to the resources and valour which each of the belligerent parties develops. The Government of his Majesty have, therefore, seriously examined the objections which have been made to us where we have suggested the idea of a friendly mediation, and we have asked ourselves whether they are truly of a nature to set aside as premature every tentative to a reconciliation. On one part has been proposed to us the repugnance of the United States to admit the intervention of foreign influence in the dispute; on the other, the hope, which the Federal Government has not abandoned, of attaining its solution by force of arms.

Assuredly, Sir, recourse to the good offices of one or several Powers contains nothing incompatible with the pride so legitimate to a great nation, and means purely international are not those alone which furnish examples of the useful character of mediation. We flatter ourselves, besides, that in proffering to place ourselves at the disposal of the belligerent parties to facilitate between them negotiations, the basis of which we abstain from prejudging, we have manifested to the patriotism of the United States all the consideration to which it is entitled, now perhaps still more than ever, after such new proof of moral force and energy. We are none the less ready, amid the wishes which we form in favour of peace, to take into account all the susceptibilities of national feeling, and we do not at all question the right of the Federal Government to decline the co-operation (concours) of the great maritime Powers of Europe. But this co-operation, is it not the only means which offers itself to the Cabinet of Washington to hasten the close of the war; and if it believes that it ought to repel any foreign intervention, could it not honourably accept the idea of direct (pourparlers) informal conferences with the authority which may represent the States of the South? The Federal Government does not despair, we know, of giving a more active impulse to hostilities. Its sacrifices have not exhausted its resources, still less its perseverance and its steadfastness. The protraction of the struggle, in a word, has not shaken its confidence in the definitive success of its efforts. But the opening of informal conferences between the belligerent parties does not necessarily imply the immediate cessation of hostilities. Negotiations about peace are not always the consequence of a suspension of warfare. They precede, on the contrary, more often the establishment of a truce. How many times have we not seen plenipotentiaries meet, exchange communications, agree upon all the essential provisions of treaties, resolve, in fine, the question even of peace or war, while the leaders of armies continued the strife, and endeavoured, even to the latest moment, to modify by course of arms the conditions of peace. To recall only one memory drawn from the history of the United States, the negotiations which consecrated their independence were commenced long before hostilities had ceased in the New World, and the armistice was not established until the act of the 30th of November, 1782, which, under the name of Provisional Articles, embraced in advance the principal clauses of the definitive treaty of 1783. Nothing, therefore, would hinder the Government of the United States, without renouncing the advantage which it believes it can attain by the continuation of the war, from entering upon informal conferences with the Confederates of the South, in case they should show themselves disposed thereto. Representatives or commissioners of the two parties could assemble at such point as it should be deemed proper to designate, and which could for this purpose be declared neutral. Reciprocal complaints would be examined into at this meeting. In place of the accusations which North and South mutually cast upon each other at this time would be submitted an argumentative discussion of the interests which divide them. They would seek out, by means of well-ordered and profound deliberations, whether these interests are definitively irreconcilable—whether separation is an extreme which can no longer be avoided, or whether the memories of common existence—whether the ties of any kind which have made of the North and of the South one sole and whole Federative State, and have borne them on to so high a degree of prosperity—are not more powerful than the causes which have placed arms in the hands of the two populations. A negotiation, the object of which would be thus determinative, would not involve any of the objections raised against the diplomatic intervention of Europe, and without giving birth to the same hopes as the immediate conclusion of an armistice would exercise a happy influence on the march of events. Why, therefore, should not a combination which respects all the relations of the United States obtain the approbation of the Federal Government? Persuaded on our part that it is in conformity with their true interests, we do not hesitate to recommend it to their attention, and not having sought in the project of a mediation of the maritime Powers of Europe any vain display of influence, we would applaud, with entire freedom from all susceptibilities of self-esteem, the opening of a negotiation which would invite the two populations to discuss, without the co-operation of Europe, the solution of their differences.

I request you, sir, to give this assurance to the Cabinet of Washington, while commending to its wisdom counsels dictated by most sincere interest in the prosperity of the United States. You are, moreover, authorized, if Mr. Seward expresses the wish, to leave with him a copy of this despatch.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

DROUYN DE LHUYS.

M. Mercier, Minister of France at Washington.

MR. SEWARD TO MR. DAYTON.
(No. 297.)

Department of State, Washington, Feb. 6, 1863.

Sir,—The intimation given in your despatch of January 15 (No. 255), that I might expect a special visit from M. Mercier, has been realized. He called on the 3rd inst., and gave me a copy of a despatch which he had just received from M. Drouyn de Lhuys under the date of the 9th of January. I have taken the President's instructions, and I now proceed to give you his ideas upon the subject in question. It has been considered with seriousness, resulting from the reflection that the people of France are known to be faultless sharers with the American nation in the misfortunes and calamities of our unhappy civil war. Nor do we on this any more than on other occasions forget the traditional friendship of the two countries, which we unhesitatingly believe has inspired the counsels that M. Drouyn de Lhuys has imparted. He says:—"The Federal Government does not despair, we know, of giving more active impulse to hostilities." And again he remarks:—"The protraction of the struggle, in a word, has not shaken the confidence of the Federal Government in the definitive success of its efforts."

These passages seem to me to do unintentional injustice to the language, whether confidential or public, in which this Government has constantly spoken on the subject of the war. It certainly has had and avowed only one purpose—a determination to preserve the integrity of the country. So far from admitting any laxity of effort or betraying any despondency, the Government has, on the contrary, borne itself cheerfully in all vicissitudes with unvarying confidence in an early and complete triumph of the national cause. Now, when we are in a manner invited by a friendly Power to review the twenty-one months' history of the conflict, we find no occasion to abate that confidence through which in an alternation of victories and defeats, as is the appointed incident of war, the land and naval forces of the United States have steadily advanced, reclaiming from the insurgents the ports, forts, and posts which they had treacherously seized before the strife actually began, and even before it was seriously apprehended. So many of the States and districts which the insurgents included in the field of their projected exclusive slaveholding dominion have already been re-established under the flag of the Union that they now retain only the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Texas, with half of Virginia, half of North Carolina two-thirds of South Carolina, half of Mississippi, and one-third respectively of Arkansas and Louisiana. The National forces hold even this small territory in close blockade and siege. This Government if required, does not hesitate to submit its achievements to the test of comparison, and it maintains that in no part of the world, and in no times, ancient or modern, has a nation, when rendered all unready for combat by the enjoyments of eighty years of almost unbroken peace, so quickly awakened at the alarm of sedition, put forth energies so vigorous and achieved successes so signal and effective as those which have marked the progress of this contest on the part of the Union.

M. Drouyn de Lhuys, I fear, has taken other light than the correspondence of this Government for his guidance in ascertaining its temper and finances. He has probably read of divisions of sentiment among those who hold themselves forth as organs of public opinion here, and has given to them an undue importance. It is to be remembered that this is a nation of 30,000,000, civilly divided into forty-one States and territories which cover an expanse hardly less than Europe; that the people are a peaceful democracy, exercising everywhere the utmost freedom of speech and suffrage; that a great crisis necessarily produces vehemence as well as profound debate, with sharp collisions of individual, local, and sectional interests, sentiments, and convictions, and that this heat of controversy is increased by the intervention of speculations, interests, prejudices, and passions from every other part of the civilized world. It is, however, through such debates that the agreement of the nation upon any subject is habitually attained, its resolutions formed, and its policy established. While there has been much difference of popular opinion and favour concerning the agents who shall carry on the war, the principles on which it shall be waged, and the means with which it shall be prosecuted, M. Drouyn de Lhuys has only to refer to the statute-book of Congress and the Executive ordinances, to learn that the national activity has hitherto been, and yet is, as efficient as that of any other nation, whatever its form of government, ever was under circumstances of equally grave import to its peace, safety, and welfare. Not one voice has been raised anywhere, out of the immediate field of the insurrection, in favour of foreign intervention, or mediation, or arbitration, or of compromise with the relinquishment of one acre of the national domain, or the surrender of even one constitutional franchise. At the same time it is manifest to the world that our resources are yet abundant, and our credit adequate to the existing emergency.

What M. Drouyn de Lhuys suggests is that this Government shall appoint Commissioners to meet on neutral ground Commissioners of the insurgents. He supposes that in the conferences to be thus held reciprocal complaints could be discussed, and, in place of the accusations which the North and the South now mutually cast upon each other, the conference would be engaged with discussions of the interests which divide them. He assumes further "that the Commissioners would seek, by means of well ordered and profound deliberations, whether these interests are definitely irreconcilable, whether separation is an extreme that can no longer be avoided, or whether the memories of a common existence, the ties of every kind which have made of the North and the South one whole Federative State, and have borne them on to so high a degree of prosperity, and are not more powerful than the causes which have placed arms in the hands of the two populations." The suggestion is not an extraordinary one, and it may well have been thought by the Emperor of the French, in the earnestness of his benevolent desire for the restoration of peace, a feasible one. But when M. Drouyn de Lhuys shall come to review it in the light in which it must necessarily be examined in this country, I think he can hardly fail to perceive that it amounts to nothing less than a proposition that while this Government is engaged in suppressing an armed insurrection, with the purpose of maintaining the constitutional national authority and preserving the integrity of the country, it shall enter into diplomatic discussion with the insurgents upon the questions whether that authority shall not be renounced, and whether the country shall not be delivered over to disunion, to be quickly followed by ever-increasing anarchy.

If it were possible for the Government of the United States to compromise the national authority so far as to enter into such debates, it is not easy to perceive what good results could be obtained by them. The commissioners must agree in recommending either that the Union shall stand or that it shall be voluntarily dissolved, or else they must leave the vital question unsettled to abide at least the fortunes of the war. The Government has not shut out knowledge of the present temper of any more than of the past purposes of the insurgents. There is not the least ground to suppose that the controlling actors would be persuaded at this moment, by any arguments which a National Commissioner could offer, to forego the ambition that has impelled them to the disloyal position they are occupying.

Any commissioner who should be appointed by those actors, or through their dictation or influence, must enter the conferences imbued with the spirit and pledged to personal fortunes of the insurgent chiefs. The loyal people in the insurrectionary States would be unheard, and any offer of peace by this Government on the maintenance of the Union must necessarily be rejected. On the other hand, as I have already intimated, this Government has not the least thought of relinquishing the trust which has been confided to it by the nation, under the most solemn of all political sanctions; and if it had any such thought, it would have still abundant reason to know that peace, proposed at the cost of dissolution, would be immediately, universally and indignantly rejected by the American people. It is a great mistake that European statesmen make if they suppose this people are demoralized. Whatever, in the case of an insurrection, the people of France, or Great Britain, or Switzerland, or of the Netherlands, would do to save their national existence, no matter how the strife might be regarded by, or affect, foreign nations, just so much, and certainly no less, the people of the United States will do, if necessary, to save for the common benefit the region which is bounded by the Pacific and Atlantic coasts, and by the shores of the Gulfs of St. Lawrence and Mexico, together with the free and common navigation of the Rio Grande, Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, Ohio, St. Lawrence, Hudson, Delaware, Potomac, and other national highways, by which this land, which to them is at once a land of inheritance and a land of promise, is open and watered.

Even if the agents of the American people thus exercising their power should, through fear or faction, fall below the height of national virtue, they would be speedily, yet constitutionally, replaced by others of sterner character and patriotism. I must be allowed to say, also, that M. Drouyn de Lhuys errs in his description of the parties to the present conflict. We have an insurrectionary party, which is located upon and is chiefly adjacent to the shores of the Gulf of Mexico; and we have, on the other hand, a loyal people, who constitute not only Northern States, but Eastern, Middle, Western, and Southern States.

I have, on many occasions, heretofore, submitted to the French Government the President's views of the interests and ideas which are at the bottom of the determination of the American Government and people to maintain the Federal Union. The president has done the same thing in his Messages and other public declarations. I refrain, therefore, from reviewing that argument in connexion with the existing question. M. Drouyn de Lhuys draws to his aid the Conferences which took place between the colonies and Great Britain in our Revolutionary War. He will allow me to answer, that action, in the crisis of a nation, must accord to its necessities, and therefore can be seldom conformed to precedents. Great Britain, when entering on that negotiation, had manifestly come to entertain doubts of her ultimate success; and it is certain that the councils of the colonies could have failed to take new courage, if not to gain other advantage, when the parent State comprised so far as to treat of peace on the terms of conceding their independence.

It is true, indeed, that peace must come some time, and that conferences must attend, if they are not allowed to precede, the pacification. There is, however, a better form for such conferences than the one which M. Drouyn de Lhuys suggests. The latter would be palpably in derogation of the Constitution of the United States, and would carry no weight, because destitute of the sanction necessary to bind either to the loyal or disloyal portions of the People. On the other hand, the Congress of the United States furnishes a constitutional forum for debates between the alienated parties. Senators and representatives of the discontented party, who may be continually sent there from the States involved in the insurrection. Moreover, the conferences which can thus be held in Congress have this great advantage over any other that could be organized on the plan of M. Drouyn de Lhuys—viz.: that Congress, if it thought wise, could call a National Convention to adopt its recommendations, and give them all the solemnity and binding force of organic law. Such conference between the alienated parties may be said to have already begun. Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri, States which are claimed by the insurgents, are already represented in Congress, and are admitted with perfect freedom, and in a proper spirit, their advice upon the course best calculated to bring about in the shortest time a firm peace. Representatives have been sent also from Louisiana, and others are understood to be coming from Arkansas.

There is a preponderating argument in favour of the congressional form of conference over that which is suggested by M. Drouyn de Lhuys,—viz., that while accession to the latter would bring the Government into concurrence with the insurgents in disregarding and setting aside an important part of the Constitution of the United States, and so would be of pernicious example, the congressional conference, on the contrary, preserves and gives new strength to that sacred instrument, which must continue through future ages the sheet-anchor of the republic.

You will be at liberty to read this despatch to M. Drouyn de Lhuys, and give him a copy if he should desire it. To the end that you may be informed of the whole case, I transmit a copy of M. Drouyn de Lhuys' despatch.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

WM. H. SEWARD.

W. L. Dayton, Esq., &c.

THE WHITE POPULATION OF THE SOUTH.

The following is taken from the letter of the Times New York correspondent, which was published on Saturday last. Our readers will perceive that it fully endorses the facts and deductions of an article which appeared in THE INDEX of the 24th of July, 1862, entitled "The Distribution of Property, Schools, and Churches."

The following statements, based upon official documents, will show the real status of the white man and non-slaveholder in the Southern States, better than volumes of argument. In the first place it must be borne in mind that the Constitution of the Confederate States in respect to representation is precisely similar to that of the United States. But an interpretation has been given to the 3rd section of the 1st Article of the Constitution which is accountable for much of the error that prevails on the subject of the political value of the non-slaveholding unit. The section declares that "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years [apprentices], and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons [slaves]." The words in brackets are explanatory. Pointing to this clause in the Constitution, the believers in Southern feudalism assert that three-fifths of the slaves are counted in the representation, and, as the slaves do not vote, the master must vote for them. Thus, they add, the owner of a hundred slaves casts not only his own vote, but 60 votes for his slaves, to which he is entitled by the Constitution. If this were the correct interpretation the Abolitionist and English opinion would be to some extent correct, and with the addition of the law of primogeniture—long since abolished, however—an aristocracy might be created. But the whole calculation is a misconception. The number of representatives for the whole Union was fixed by the Act of 1850, and was limited to 233 (since altered to 241). At every decennial period, when the census is taken, the whole number of free persons, with three-fifths of the slaves together, are divided by 241, the quotient being the number of persons entitled to send one representative to Congress. By the census of 1850 the ratio was one representative for every 93,702; by that of 1860 it was one for every 127,000.

Assuming, for the sake of illustration, a community composed of 100,000 slaves (estimated in the representation as the equivalent of 60,000 persons) owned by 10,000 individuals, and 57,000 persons who are non-slaveholders, these 67,000 white men, each having one vote and no more, would be entitled to one representative in Congress. There is no plurality of votes. The master does not vote for his slaves, but the whole white male population votes for them collectively. Presuming a contest in such a community, it is evident that, man for man, the non-slaveholders would have it in their power to carry their candidate by a majority of 47,000. Thus, in point of fact, the non-slaveholder in the slaveholding States, so far from being a "mean white," is, as a political unit, a greater power in the State than the white Yankee, whether he be mean or the reverse.

By the census of 1850 the whole number of slaveholders in the United States was found to be 347,525. Of this number but two owned 1000 slaves and upwards; nine owned 500 and less than 1000; fifty-six owned 300 and less than 500; one hundred and eighty-seven owned 200 and less than 300; fourteen hundred and seventy-nine owned 100 and less than 200; six thousand one hundred and ninety-six owned 50 and less than 100; twenty-nine thousand seven hundred and thirty-three owned 20 and less than 50; fifty-four thousand five hundred and ninety-five owned 10 and less than 20; eighty thousand seven hundred and sixty-five owned five and less than 10; one hundred and five thousand six hundred and eighty-three owned two and less than five; while sixty-eight thousand eight hundred and twenty held one slave each. It will thus be seen that more than one half of the slaveholders own less than five slaves each, and that the cry of a slaveholding aristocracy oppressing the "mean whites" has no tangible foundation.

The phrases "poor white trash," "mean whites," and "poor white Buckras," originated with the negroes. For many years in the towns and villages of the slaveholding States, cooks, chambermaids, waiters, coachmen, footmen, &c., were exclusively negroes and mulattoes—a white coachman even now is a rarity. They also monopolized the positions of draymen, carters, barbers, porters, stevedores, marketmen, &c. Poor Yankees coming to the South or from European countries, who had been brought up to these several occupations, came into competition with the negroes if they sought employment in them. The competition prejudiced the negro against them. The negro ideal of a white man is like the Oriental ideal of a Sultan. It is associated with wealth, dominion, and power, and a white man possessing neither was "mean" in Sambo's estimation. Following the example of their brethren in the towns and villages, whom they consider their superiors, the country negroes applied the term in derision to any poor white man living in their neighbourhood who did not own slaves, and who happened to fall under their displeasure. In negro estimation Mr. Lincoln, when he honestly earned his bread by navigating a barge on the Mississippi, would have been a "mean white;" but no white man, rich or poor, slaveholding or non-slaveholding, would have applied such an epithet to him. The truth is that the white man in the slaveholding States, whatever his pecuniary condition, holds socially a high, and politically a higher, rank than one similarly situated in the free States. If there be an aristocracy in the South it is the aristocracy of colour, and the same aristocracy exists in the North and West, where the negro is free but a pariah. The idea that the mercantile and professional classes, the artificers, shopkeepers, merchants, and small traders, should be considered "mean whites" by men who had no other claim to superiority than their plantations is ludicrous to all who know the facts. Poverty is no greater bar to political advancement in the South than it is in the North. If Mr. Lincoln was a bargeman and a rail-splitter before he became a lawyer and a politician, the Vice-President of the Southern Confederacy was the son of parents too poor to give him an education, and the Secretary of the Confederate Treasury took his first honours in an orphan school.

In the yet unsettled, wild, and swampy regions of the South-West, in Arkansas, and in Mississippi, there is no doubt a large class of white people who deserve to be called "mean"—rude, rough rowdies of the worst possible kind; but many of them are Yankees, Germans, and Englishmen and Irishmen who have left New England because New England was too small for their predatory instincts, and Europe because they had made it too hot to hold them. The war has converted thousands of these into excellent soldiers, and such of them as happen to have been born in New England are distinguished above their fellows for their love of the Southern cause and their detestation of the "Yankees." Perhaps these are the "mean whites" of whom Professor Cairnes and others in England make such constant mention. If not, there are no others, except in the slang of the negroes, who associate dignity with a white skin, and think a white man must be mean indeed who consents to fill a menial position.

THE CONTRABANDS AT WASHINGTON.

The stolen and runaway negroes from Virginia, to the number of 3,000 and upwards, are encamped on the "Slashes," within the northern precincts of the city. They are badly clothed, worse fed, and their scanty tents furnish but a poor shelter from the warring elements at this inclement season. Many have died, and numbers are dying from pneumonia and typhoid diseases, induced by their exposed condition, and the emaciated condition of the survivors, and the squalor and filth pervading the encampment, beggar all description. The efforts to procure employment for those who are able and willing to work have been ineffectual, as the menial places about the Government Departments are filled by hungry Yankees, and housekeepers, who refuse to hire the "runaways," even when offered for their vituals and clothes. In view of Abraham Lincoln's recent emancipation proclamation, well may the blacks of the South inquire, "Is this the entertainment to which we are invited?"

The Treasurer of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund acknowledges, with thanks, the receipt of a Five Pound Bank of England Note, "contributed by an Englishman who has no connection with America, for the benefit of the brave men of the Confederate army who are prisoners at the North."

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The Federal Congress that expired yesterday at noon was determined to go off with a noise. The Republican members who retire into private life must feel exceedingly disgusted that their time did not last the war out, for it is a position of profit to be a Republican member of Congress whilst Mr. Lincoln is engaged in crushing "the rebels." What excesses the Congress may have been guilty of between the 19th of February and the 4th of March we know not, but before that date it was sufficiently extravagant in its eccentricities to divide with Tom Thumb and Miss Warren the attention of New York; though, of course, the Lilliputian General and his wife had the lion's share.

Perhaps the best indication of the state of feeling in the Federal Congress is a discussion that took place in the House of Representatives upon the Illinois and New York Ship Canal. Mr. Voorhees, of Indiana, observed that he was contented with the channels and canals "which Almighty God had given to the West;" that commerce could not be diverted from its natural courses, and that digging ditches was not the way to unite the West with New England. These seemingly innocent observations drew forth a sensational reply from Mr. Dawes, of Massachusetts. He remarked that he should vote for the Bill, and that "New England would not ask the gentleman from Indiana on what terms she would remain in the Union." Mr. Voorhees had not said a word about the secession of Indiana, but New England already begins to shiver at the thought of being left out in the cold, and cannot conceal her fears. The "Saints" begin to dread that they will not only be deprived of the pleasure of plundering the South, but that the West likewise will be released from their avaricious grip. When the slave trade was in operation, the "Saints" turned it to their profit; when the slave trade was abolished by means of protective tariffs, they waxed rich on the slave labour of the South; latterly they resolved on domineering over the whole of the late United States, making the peoples of the South and West their toiling tributaries. But the self-elected "Saints" have been disappointed. The Confederate States have defeated this scheme so far as the South is concerned, and the hand-writing on the wall proclaims that sooner or later, and perhaps very soon, the West will also be quit of the Yankee. It is necessary to bear these things in mind to understand the tone and proceedings of the Federal Congress.

Some months since the New York Caucasian published a poem recounting the contest of a worthy citizen with an obstinate cow. The animal was in the garden, and would not go out. The citizen and his family advanced against it, and were driven back; they made loud noises upon tin kettles, and dug ditches at a respectful distance from the cow; but all in vain; the animal would not budge an inch. As a last resource the citizen determined to issue some proclamations; and he forthwith announced that if the cow did not move she would be skinned alive, and that anybody who could might milk her. But the cow remained in the garden, and nobody essayed to milk her. This was a forcible, if not a refined, caricature of the proceedings of Mr. Lincoln, and we hope that the same satirist will try his practised hand on the late Congress—that is, late, if between the 19th of February and the 4th of March, it did not decree itself permanent and indissoluble.

Congress cannot issue proclamations selling the lion's skin before the lion is caught, or confiscating the tail of a comet; but it can pass Acts just as pretentious and abortive. We say nothing about voting fabulous sums of money to the Government, because if the war should go on, Mr. Lincoln retain office, and the greenbacks continue to be worth something, if only a cent per dollar, there is no reason why Mr. Chase should not erect a few hundred presses, and issue ever so many millions of billions of paper dollars. But what shall we say of Congress passing a Bill for the enlistment of 300,000 negroes, seeing that the United States has not under its control more than 50,000 free negroes capable of bearing arms, if it has so many? Is it supposed that an Act of Congress can cause a black army to spring from the earth? But the Negro Enlistment Bill is not more ridiculous than the Conscription Bill which the Federal Senate passed on the 16th of February.

Certainly, the Act is comprehensive. All citizens, and those who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 20 and 45 years, are liable to perform military duty when called out by the President. This is a coup de grace for emigrants. We do not suppose that the military officers in the United States are more scrupulous than our recruiting sergeants, and therefore will be ready to swear or to get up evidence, that any able-bodied emigrant they come across has declared his intention of becoming a citizen of the glorious Republic. There is, however, just one little difficulty in the way. The Federal Congress is not yet the ruler of the whole earth, and foreign nations are not bound by its acts; and we are inclined to think that until Irishmen have become de facto citizens of the United States, they remain citizens of the mother country, notwithstanding any announcement of a future intention to throw off their allegiance; and that by the aid of the British Consuls they will be able to defy the Act of the Federal Congress.

The exemptions are remarkably few, being limited to the Judges of State Courts, and the Governors of States. Even members of Congress are liable to serve, or find a substitute. Mr. Sumner proposed to exempt the clergy of Massachusetts, but the motion was rejected. Mr. Sumner need not be alarmed. His clerical friends will not fight. They are willing to preach wholesale slaughter and desolation, but they will not expose their tender skins to balls and bayonets. Like all other advocates of bloodshed and spoliation, they are skulking cowards.

We venture to say that this Act will be a dead letter. Mr. Lincoln cannot and dare not enforce a conscription. He tried it on when his power was at its highest, when the Democrats were gagged, and then he failed. Is he more likely to succeed now, when his power is crippled, when the Northern people are depressed by continued military failure, and when the Democratic party is revived? The Conscription Act just passed by the Federal Senate is "bunkum," sheer "bunkum," and its only use is to indicate the complete exhaustion of the North, and the savage despair of the war party. Congress may make paper money, but it cannot make armies. Even if Mr. Lincoln could enforce the draft, he knows, from bitter experience, that only a percentage of the drafted men can be kept from deserting whilst en route for the seat of war, and that in the battle-field it sometimes happens that drafted men will not fight. If, indeed, Mr. Lincoln could enforce the draft, he would be nearly as great a military despot as the Emperor of Russia. He could then, at ten days' notice, have an army of a million and a half at his command. According to the United States' census of 1860, the return of militia in the North and West was 2,429,636, but this must have been considerably thinned by the war, and it includes all citizens, whether able-bodied or not. But Mr. Lincoln, though not a statesman, is too shrewd not to perceive that the Conscription Act, like his proclamation, is like a lion painted on canvass which looks prodigiously terrible and menacing, but which cannot bite.

The fear of servile insurrection evidently does not sway the minds of the Southern people. On the 23rd of January, the Confederate House of Representatives repealed, apparently without debate, what was popularly known as the "Twenty Negroes Exemption Clause" of the Conscription Act passed last year. This clause exempted from military service, "one person, either as agent, owner, or overseer, on each plantation on which one white person is required to be kept by the laws or ordinances of any State; and on which there is no white male adult not liable to military service, and in States having no such law, one person as agent, owner, or overseer on each plantation of twenty negroes, and on which there is no white male adult not liable to military service." The House also repealed the clause in said Act exempting from military service "for every negro on two or more plantations within five miles of each other, and each having less than twenty negroes, and on which there is no white male adult not liable to military duty, one person being the oldest of the owners or overseers on each plantation." The persons so hitherto exempted by these clauses are now made subject to military duty in the same manner that they would be had said clauses never been embraced in said Act.

The Federal Senate wants to make Mr. Lincoln supreme by sea as well as by land. It has passed a Bill authorizing him in all domestic and foreign wars to issue letters of marque, and the authority is limited to three years. Against whose commerce are the Federal privateers to operate? Mr. Seward says the Confederate ports are effectually blockaded, and it is certainly true that at present the South has not a commercial marine. Is not the boasted navy of the North enough to watch Southern ports? Are privateers to assist in the blockade of the British port of Nassau? The idea of granting letters of marque against an enemy that has not a commercial marine would be an inexplicable proceeding; but Mr. McDougal, of California, explained the purport of the measure. A proposal to limit this Act to the suppression of the rebellion was rejected, and that gentleman took the opportunity of expressing his opinion that "before the meeting of another Congress the United States would be involved in a foreign war, and he wished the country to be prepared." Our impression is that the foreign war in which the United States is at present engaged is quite enough to satisfy the bulk of the Northern people; and, moreover, we think that the next Congress will meet sooner than the Republicans think. Mr. Lincoln may be obliged to convoke it. The Republicans and their puppets may wish for a foreign war as a political move against the Democrats, and may even speculate upon bringing it about during the long Congressional recess, but they will probably be disappointed. The Democrats are on the alert. The Democratic members of the next Congress have been invited to meet in New York on the 8th of this month. But after all, this Act for authorizing the President to issue letters of marque is, like the Conscription Bill, mere bunkum—furious barking, signifying nothing. The intention is to threaten, if not to frighten, England and France; but by this time Europe ought to know too well the value of Yankee bragadocio to care for it.

Mr. Seward is blamed, if not for refusing, at all events for the uncourteous manner in which he refused the proposition of the Emperor of the French. Altogether there is abundant evidence that a large party in the North desire peace. The Senate of the Illinois Legislature has rejected the resolution for calling a convention at Louisville, but this was in consequence of a dodge of the Republicans, who withdrew sufficient members to deprive that body of a constitutional quorum. The Kentucky House of Representatives has rescinded the peace resolutions previously passed.

The only war news is of an engagement near Port Hudson; no details are given, though it was reported in Wall-street that the Federal General Banks had been defeated. Everywhere else there is a lull in the war. General Hooker is endeavouring to infuse a little discipline in the fast-dissolving mob that once constituted the pet Army of the Potomac. Rosecrans is still binding up his wounds, and has not yet recovered from the dire effects of his victory at Murfreesboro. Charleston, so often condemned to utter destruction, boldly defies the Federals. Its walls have not fallen at the braying and cursing of the Northern press and preachers, and it has not been captured by great preparations. And at length, when Wall-street is eagerly waiting for the news of Charleston being taken, it is whispered that the attack is postponed till a more convenient season—till, we suppose, the naughty rebels dismantle their fortresses and meekly promise not to hurt their gallant foe. We think the Northern commanders are prudent in not attacking Charleston; but after such loud boasting it would have been almost better to have attacked and been beaten than not to attack.

The Confederate flag still waves over Vicksburg, and the capture of that place is also postponed. The Mississippi, like the Confederates, is very obstinate, and will not change its course at the bidding of the Federals. Digging has, so far, proved a failure; why does not Mr. Lincoln try the effect of a proclamation ordering the Father of Waters to change its course under penalty of being dried up; or why did not the late Congress pass a Bill making it imperative on the river to change its course?

Now we are told that Savannah is to fall. Let us give the Federals their due, they certainly are very considerate in not taking their enemy by surprise. They always give the Confederates long notice that they are going to begin to make preparations to attack this or that place. In the present instance their considerate kindness is unnecessary, for Savannah is fully prepared to give them a warm reception.

Another Federal expedition has left New Orleans for Bayou Tesche. The Federal General Forster has returned to North Carolina. The Federal commander on Roanoke Island has telegraphed for reinforcements. The Federal turreted gunboat Indianola has run the Vicksburg blockade; and the truthful Federals report that General Hindman's army in Tennessee "is said to be demoralized." With all the great efforts of the North, with its large armies and fleets, and its numerous expeditions, nothing can be accomplished, or the budget of war news would not consist of such trifles.

A joint resolution has been introduced into the Confederate Congress, recognizing the right of all friendly peoples to the free navigation of the Mississippi, and declaring that this right shall at all times be maintained. We need hardly observe that it never was the intention of the Confederate States to exclude friendly peoples from the free navigation of the Mississippi, and that that river will be a highway for the carriage of the produce of the West, as it was before the disruption of the late Union. It is the interest of the Confederacy that the navigation of the river should be free, and this joint resolution may be useful in reminding the West of the absurdity of the Northern suggestion that the establishment of the Southern Confederacy would deprive them of the free use of the Mississippi.

There has been a pretty quarrel between the New York Tribune and the New York World. The former paper is not a favourite with the troops, whilst the latter has a large circulation in the army. Upon which the Tribune publishes an article, in which it says: "We understand that thousands of copies of the World are regularly distributed through the Army of the Rappahannock, gratis, or at a nominal price—opulent Democrats supplying the needful. We believe this distribution is calculated and intended to demoralize that army and aid the rebels." The World took the trouble of denying this charge; and assured its readers that every copy "distributed in the Army of the Rappahannock is bought and paid for by those who choose to buy and pay for it, and is not sold at a nominal price, but at a profit in every instance." This led to a report that the sale of newspapers was forbidden in the Army of the Potomac. We do not suppose that even Mr. Lincoln will venture to prevent the soldiers reading their favourite paper. Despotism are the servants of their troops.

The Rev. John H. Dashiell, of Baltimore, has been arrested for taking down a Federal flag which had been raised on his church by the Unionists; and on the same day a congregation in the same city refused to assemble at their usual place of worship, because the national flag had been placed on the building by the order of General Schenk. It is worthy of note that the puritanical North will not allow religion to be free, but hampers it with political conditions.

The Federal commanders of the vessels blockading Charleston declare "they never quitted the blockading line usually occupied by them," but they do not say how many miles from the port is the "usual line." They are not, perhaps, aware that vessels out of sight five miles beyond the port are not legally blockading. It would be wise of the Federals not to attempt to shuffle out of the defeat at Charleston. The Federal officers abuse the British Consul and the Commander of the Petrel. English officials will not be injured by Federal Billingsgate.

With regard to the port of Galveston, the fact of the blockade being raised is not denied. The following despatch from Lord Lyons has been published in the London Gazette:

I have the honour to enclose a copy of a note, which I received at 2 o'clock this afternoon, from Mr. Seward, stating that the blockade of Galveston was "resumed immediately, and will be continued until further notice."

Department of State, Washington, Feb. 5.

My Lord,—As opinions may be entertained by merchants interested in trade to the port of Galveston, in Texas, that the blockade of that port by a United States' naval force may, in consequence of recent events in that quarter, have been interrupted, I have the honour to acquaint you, with a view to obviate embarrassments to neutral commerce which might be occasioned by such opinions, that the blockade was resumed immediately, and will be continued until further notice. Although due notice of such resumption will probably have been given by the commander of the blockading squadron to vessels which may attempt to enter Galveston, it is deemed advisable to communicate a similar notice to your lordship.—I have, &c.,

The Lord Lyons. (Signed) W. H. SEWARD.

Will our Government notify to Mr. Seward that a blockade cannot be "resumed;" that being once broken or raised, a new blockade must be established, which involves the usual notice? On this point all authorities are agreed, but probably our Foreign Secretary may consider the Lincoln Government privileged to violate the law of nations.

We are not surprised to hear that "there is a rumour current in Richmond of a programme in the North-West for forming a North-Western Confederacy." It is so manifest that sooner or later the United States must split up, and so manifestly the interest of the North-West to secede now, that such a programme is discussed and expected by European politicians.

Amongst the items of news not the least important is the rise in the price of gold, which was, on the 20th of February, at 63½ premium. This was partly brought about by dearth of war intelligence; Mr. Seward's despatch in answer to the French proposal; and because the Federal House of Representatives, though rejecting most of the amendments of the Senate, have carried the amendment declaring the interest on the $400,000,000 of interest-bearing notes should be payable in legal tender or green-backs, instead of coin. The prospect of all paper and no coin is certainly not encouraging.

The Tribune wants Butler to be sent back to New Orleans, but it is supposed Mr. Seward opposes the project. Since Butler is disappointed in the hope of plundering Charleston, he would, no doubt, be glad to have another turn at his well-squeezed lemon—New Orleans.

The Governor of Virginia has just reminded Mr. Lincoln that there is such a thing as State sovereignty in the South, by informing him he would unflinchingly retaliate for any improper treatment of citizens or soldiers of Virginia, and there is no doubt he will keep his word.

It is announced that, "Two members from Louisiana have been admitted to seats in the House of Representatives." Well, bringing the Federal Congress into contempt will do the Confederate States no harm, and it certainly will do the Northern States no good.

The Senate of the New York Legislature, for prudential reasons, no doubt, has rejected the resolution inviting General McClellan to be the guest of the State at Albany. To have passed the resolution would have been something like a declaration of war against the Lincoln Government, and the Democrats will not engage in the conflict upon a side issue.

The following refer to the proceedings of the Confederate Congress:—

Resolutions have been introduced into the Confederate Congress that President Davis shall, on the 1st of May next, withdraw the diplomatic agents from foreign capitals, the Governments of which shall not then have recognized the South.

Also, that, after May next, foreign consuls shall not be allowed to exercise any power in the Confederate states except upon an ex equatur asked from and granted by the Confederate Government.

A resolution has also been offered that the conduct of the Emperor Napoleon in offering the mediation of the European Powers was highly gratifying to the Government and the people of the Confederate States, and that the hope is indulged that the Emperor's wise and magnanimous movement may soon eventuate in the establishment of relations of close commercial amity and enduring concord between the French Government and the Confederate States.

The New York papers pretend that the danger of war with France is imminent. The New York Times roundly abuses M. Mercier.

The "irrepressible" conflict is going on in the North. It is reported that there has been a collision between a negro and a Maine regiment, and that the negroes killed six of the Federals. The North may fall into the pit which they have dug for others.

It is reported that soon after the adjournment of the Federal Congress Mr. Lincoln intends to endeavour to conciliate the Democrats by returning to a conservative policy and appointing General McClellan Commander-in-Chief. Mr. Lincoln is quite likely to trick the Republicans if it suits his purpose, but it is rather a dangerous game. Between two stools the Lincolnites are pretty sure to come to the ground rather sooner than they would do by dealing fairly with one party or the other.

Not the least of the arbitrary acts of the Lincoln Government is dissolving a State Convention at Frankfort, Kentucky, by the interposition of the military. This is a direct blow at the fundamental rights of State sovereignty.

In consequence of the cutting of the levees the Mississippi has overflowed its banks on the Louisiana side, submerging the town of De Soto, and giving some cause to fear that New Orleans will be inundated.

The following items are taken from the telegraphic summary of the news per Etina:—

Rumours were current of a sortie made by the Confederates against the Mobile blockading squadron.

The Federal frigate Brooklyn is reported aground off Galveston.

The Hartford (Connecticut) Democratic Convention has passed resolutions against Congressional and Federal usurpations of the rights of the States. They denounce Secession, but declare that the time has arrived to abandon the monstrous fallacy that the Union can be restored by armed bands, and they pledge themselves to co-operate with the Conservatives of the Middle and Western States to adopt all honourable measures for the cessation of hostilities and the reconstruction of the Union on terms thoroughly defining the State rights.

They further declare the Conscription Bill unconstitutional, and urge the authorities of each State to sternly resist its operation. They denounce the banking scheme, the emancipation proclamation of President Lincoln, the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, and the interference with the press, and declare that they will use all their influence to prevent the payment by the people of a single dollar for compensated emancipation.

Advices from St. Domingo city state that the Alabama captured and burnt the barque Golden Rule, belonging to the Panama Railroad Company, about 50 miles south of St. Domingo, on the 26th ult. Her entire cargo, a portion of which belonged to English, French, and Spanish consignees, was, in consequence of the absence of documentary proof of its being the property of neutrals, destroyed with the vessel. The bills of lading had been forwarded from Panama by steamer after the sailing of the Golden Rule. The Alabama also captured and burnt, off Altively Rock, on the 27th ult., the Boston brig Chastelain, from Guadaloupe, for Cienfuegos. The nautical instruments of the vessel, and $800 in gold were taken possession of by Captain Semmes. The schooner Hanover, from Boston for Aux Cayes, was taken by a privateer, name unknown, off the Island of Hayti, on the 31st ult.

Accounts from Havannah to the 15th inst. report that one steamer and three sailing vessels, laden with cotton, had recently arrived at the West Indies from Confederate ports.

The Richmond Enquirer of the 19th February, publishes a proclamation by General Beauregard, announcing to the citizens of Charleston and Savannah the expectation of an early land and naval attack upon one or both of those cities. It invokes all able-bodied Carolinians and Georgians to arm themselves with any description of weapons they can procure, and aid in the defence of their homes. Non-combatants are urged to retire to a place of greater safety.

ENGLAND.

We can report no material abatement in the distress of Lancashire. The reduction of pauperism this week is under 2200; and there seems reason to fear that a good deal of this is owing only to the fact that the sufferers have sought hard, unsuitable, and unremunerative work as agricultural labourers in neighbouring counties. It is far better, of course, that they should do this than that they should remain at home in idleness, eating the bread of dependence. But it is not to be understood that the 50,000 persons who have ceased to be paupers during the last two or three months have ceased to be in distress. Their highly-skilled and very valuable labour has been degraded to the level of that of the rudest peasant; the whole worth of their hardy-acquired dexterity and mechanical education is lost to them and to the country; and they are but a little better off, as far as subsistence goes, than they were as paupers. Many of the warm friends of the operatives, and many of the élite of the operatives themselves, are beginning to look to emigration as affording the only effectual means of relief. Mr. Selfe, one of the ablest of the London Police Magistrates, who has entrusted to him a considerable sum intended for the relief of Lancashire distress, urges upon the Mansion-house Committee the desirability of employing some portion of the funds entrusted to them in promoting emigration, and they have taken his proposition into serious consideration. One recommendation we have heard which seems to us exceedingly wise—that co-operative societies of emigrants should be formed, to go out together and to apply to agriculture in the colonies the same principles and system which have been found to answer so well in trade and manufactures at home. It is a melancholy thought that English families, and chiefly, of course, the best and most hopeful portion of the working class, should be driven to leave their country by a war with which England has no direct concern, and in which the English Government has not the courage to interpose. But if we are not to have cotton from America soon, and in the former abundance, it is certain that Lancashire will not be able to support her present population, and emigration seems the only remedy.

Dr. Campbell is the editor of a certain paper of the class called religious, which probably none of our readers have ever seen, but which has by some means or other—we speak with the fear of Chief Justice Cockburn before our eyes—obtained an extensive, and we believe a profitable, circulation among the "unco' guid." It had been helped into notoriety by certain letters published therein, addressed to the Queen and Prince Consort, containing much insolent advice and a good many disloyal insinuations. The vulgar—and the lower sort of Dissenters belong to the most vulgar class in England—are apt to be pleased with rudeness towards those in high station, and especially when that rudeness is offered under the guise of pious rebuke and sanctimonious scolding. When the effect of this kind of literature had somewhat worn itself out, Dr. Campbell set to work to write and publish a series of articles on missions in China, finding fault with the Queen and the Government for not having converted the heathen of the Celestial Empire. He urged, or his "correspondents"—who have since been proved to be real persons—urged, that every one who took an interest in Chinese conversion—of which, apparently, the Taepings were to be the agents, and wholesale rapine and murder the instruments—should subscribe for hundreds or thousands of copies of Dr. Campbell's paper, which thus obtained a circulation wholly irrespective of any merits it may possess. The Saturday Review, which keeps a rigorous watch over the honour and dignity of the press, appears to have considered that conduct of this kind merited exposure and reproof; and accordingly wrote an article inflicting a most severe castigation on the offender. Of course the editor of a "religious" organ has no chance against the Saturday Review. First, as Mr. Sergeant Parry remarked, all men of education read the Review; and we may add, hardly any man of education ever dreams of reading a Dissenting newspaper. Secondly, some sort of ability is required from a Saturday Reviewer; nothing but unscrupulous insolence is necessary to the editor of a journal whose readers require from it nothing but Radical principles and a Pharisaic demeanour, and which can satisfy them easily by a rough mixture of the dialect of Billingsgate with that of Exeter Hall. Instead of answering the Saturday Review, Doctor Campbell brought an action for

EUROPE.

Rumours of disasters in Mexico have again been circulating in Paris. It was positively affirmed that General Forey had written home to say that unless he received very large reinforcements, not only would he be unable to advance on Mexico but must retreat to Vera Cruz. There does not seem to have been the slightest foundation for this mischievous gossip. The "old parties," unable to openly oppose the Government of the Emperor, try their utmost to discredit it, by circulating malicious reports.

The explanations which the Prussian Government has at last given with respect to the convention with Russia remove the danger, which a few days since seemed imminent, of a European war. It is probable that these explanations are positive untruths. The convention undoubtedly contained some stipulations for common action against the insurrection; but if the Prussian Government chooses to declare that it has made no such engagements, and acts scrupulously in accordance with its declaration, Europe will have no right or desire to interfere further.

England, France, and Austria are said to have determined upon a common representation at St. Petersburg, in favour of the Poles. They will ask, or have asked—the current rumour, a credible one enough, tells us—for those national institutions which were given Poland by the treaty of Vienna, together with an amnesty, and will propose, moreover, to take these institutions under their guarantee. The difficulties of the Russian Government are so great, that if these representations are made in a tone to which it can listen without any sense of humiliation, it will probably enough be glad to accede to them.

On the 3rd of February the twenty million serfs were emancipated. Great fears are justly entertained, lest the newly-freed men should disregard the conditions upon which their liberty has been given them, refuse to pay their lords the rents reserved, and create serious disturbances. This fear paralyzes the armies of Russia in Poland.

The reports from Poland are this week more contradictory than ever. Their antagonism is so complete that the attempt to reconcile them is almost hopeless. As the Moniteur says, and we have often before said, "almost every successive despatch presents events under a different aspect, according to the source from which the intelligence is derived." This battle of bulletins rages most over that south-western corner of Russian Poland in which the insurrection first established itself, and still numbers its largest bands. The question is, whether the Russians have defeated Langiewicz, dispersed his followers, and driven him, wounded, to flight, or whether he has annihilated the Russian columns sent in pursuit of him. According to the Russian version, Langiewicz was defeated near Malogosez, lost two brass guns, and was hotly pursued. According to the Czas of Cracow, a Polish organ, Langiewicz beat the Russians at Malogosez after an engagement lasting five hours, and Malogosez was reduced to ruins, a statement which may be believed, whichever side may have won. The official journal of Warsaw, of Sunday, says that the bands commanded by Langiewicz and Jezerranski were totally defeated at Woloszewoz with the loss of 70 baggage waggons and 152 horses. Langiewicz was wounded and fled; the peasants seized the fugitives and had already given up 200 to the Russian commander. A despatch from a Polish quarter declares that Langiewicz, with 6000 men, arrived at Zombkowitz on Sunday morning, and totally defeated the Russian troops, whilst a telegram from Breslau mentions a report that a column of Russian troops proceeding from Czenstochau, to reinforce the Russians at Zombkowitz, was defeated by 4000 Poles at Myskow.

It is quite evident that one side has lied most terribly, which a few days will show. A telegram from Lemberg in Galicia—a focus of pro-Polish sympathy—which says that it was reported there that Langiewicz, was wounded and his followers dispersed, gives some corroboration to the Russian accounts. On the other hand, the Polish versions are later in their date.

Perhaps the Russians have had several different encounters with Langiewicz, in the first of which they were successful, whilst in the subsequent ones fortune has been on the side of the Poles. Langiewicz, who has proved himself the ablest leader the insurgents have, is an old soldier of Polish independence. He fought in the insurrection of 1830.

Intelligence from Lemberg corroborates the Russian account of a victory on the Bug, which we admitted, under reserve, last week. The Russians do not appear to have, in the slightest degree, exaggerated the losses of the insurgents, whose leader, Bogdanowicz, is said to have been captured.

Mieroslawski has made his way across the frontier, according to one account, under the disguise of a traveller for a champagne house, and has issued an order of the day announcing that the Provisional National Government had appointed him Commander-in-chief of the insurrectionary forces. What success has attended him is involved in obscurity. According to one account, evidently unfounded, he had been defeated, and had fled across the frontier; according to another, from Warsaw, he had penetrated as far as Kolo on the Warta, and had there engaged the Russians on Monday and Tuesday. The result of the engagement has not been announced, and we may therefore assume that it was unfavourable to the Russians, who have taken care to announce that a body of 1000 insurgents advancing to join Mieroslawski were entirely dispersed. There is reason however to believe that Mieroslawski has subsequently sustained a repulse of some kind. A fight is also said to have taken place at Kutro between Kolo and Warsaw, in which the insurgents had the advantage, and the insurgents have taken Opatowich, a manufacturing town near Kalisz, and just on the Prussian Posen frontier. Whatever may be the real character of these different engagements, they show that the insurrection is extending, and that in the province in which it first merely took the form of small guerilla bands the insurgents are now gathering in small armies. Some of the French liberal newspapers, deriving their intelligence from the Polish refugees in Paris, announce that the insurrection is extending very widely in Lithuania, and that the Government is at its wits' ends to make head against it. But this statement must be taken with reserve. The reports of the brutal conduct of the Russian troops have received the fullest confirmation. They seem to have been ordered to carry out the threat of Prince Gortschakoff to Count Zamoyski, "We will make Poland a heap of ashes and of corpses."

A Dantzig newspaper publishes a letter from Warsaw, stating that the Emperor had ordered the authorities to suppress the insurrection within ten days at any cost. It is needless to point out the improbability of the Emperor having transmitted any such absurd direction. A slight disturbance is reported from Warsaw. The police attacked and dispersed some eighty persons about to join the insurgents; but "perfect tranquillity," says the telegram, "now reigns in Warsaw." A new commander of the forces has arrived at Warsaw, whose appearance is ominous of rigorous measures. General Von Berg played an active part in Warsaw in 1831; he has since been Governor of Finland, being appointed to the province at the time of the Crimean war, when the Finns were thought likely to show their sympathies with Sweden—an able man, who will show the Poles no mercy.

The Prussian Chamber of Deputies has adopted, after three days' debate, and by 246 to 57 votes, a resolution to the effect that the interests of Prussia demand that the Government should give assistance neither to the Poles nor the Russian Government. The interest of the debate attaches to the declarations of the Minister. Herr von Bismarck Schonhausen asserted that the convention contained no stipulations to which the expressions of Earl Russell were applicable; that Count Bernstorff was not acquainted with its contents; and that the previous assent of the Government of Russia or Prussia was necessary for every passage of Prussian or Russian troops across the frontier. Nothing could be more arrogant or offensive than the tone Herr von Bismarck adopted towards the House. He told the Deputies that they sympathized with the insurrection, that they were indifferent to the honour of Prussia. He taunted Herr von Unruh, the President of the Prussian Constitutional Assembly, with having been one of those who refused the payment of taxes in 1848; and when the President of the House called him to order, positively refused to recognize his authority. He was no member of the House, he said; he had no part in making its laws, and owed it no obedience; he stood there in the name of the King, and should say what he pleased. The President threatened to adjourn the House if the phrase were repeated; but the Minister tauntingly said he had no occasion to repeat it. Herr von Bismarck is not the first Minister who has refused to recognize the power of the President to call him to order. The Prussian Ministers appear, in both Houses of Parliament, to defend and explain the measures of the Government, but they have no votes. They may, if elected, be members of the House and vote, and up to the time of the Von der Heydt Ministry were usually members. In the debates upon the army reorganization last year Herr von der Heydt advanced the same pretensions as Herr von Bismarck did in the recent debate. Herr von Bismarck also said that he was defied by the Opposition to dissolve the House, but he preferred that the country should first learn of what materials it was composed. The debate was, on the whole, a very vigorous one; language of the strongest kind was applied by the speakers to the Government, who, however, found, so far as their Polish policy was concerned, a very powerful supporter in Baron von Vincke, the leader of the old Liberals, who declared that the re-establishment of Poland would be dangerous to Prussia, approved of the precautions taken by the Government, but objected to allowing the Russians to pursue the insurgents on to Prussian territory.

The statement that Herr von Bismarck had resigned, made by the Berlin correspondent of a leading contemporary, seems to have had no other foundation than that gentleman's fervid imagination. On the contrary, the Minister seems to stand firmer than ever, and the very offensiveness with which he imputed to the House sympathies with the insurrection and hostility to the throne, will confirm him in the good opinion of his master.

Most of our contemporaries persist in styling the Prussian Minister, Count von Bismarck. He has no claim to that title. Plain Herr or [M. von Bismarck is his proper designation.

Despite the vigilant guard of the Prussian authorities, small parties of Poles, anxious to take part in the struggle for independence, make their way across the frontier; some are refugees from Paris, some students from that city or Berlin, most natives of Posen. Arms and other warlike stores are also smuggled into Russian Poland across the Prussian frontier in large quantities.

Marshal O'Donnell, having failed to obtain the assent of the Queen to the dissolution of the Cortes, has resigned. Why he wanted the dissolution remains a mystery. Upon all important questions he could command a majority of at least two to one. The Marquis Duero was charged by the Queen with the task of forming a Ministry, but after coming very near success, he failed, and Narvaez, whose appearance at Court we signalized two weeks ago, as danger to O'Donnell, was then charged with the task. He failed, and the Marquis Miraflores then libel, declaring that his character as a man and a minister had been defamed. Lord Chief Justice Cockburn summed up strongly in his favour, rather against the opinion, we believe, of all men of sense and nearly all lawyers; and a special jury, apparently overpowered by the tone of the Judge, found a verdict for the plaintiff, estimating his character as a minister and a man at £50. They appended to their verdict a virtual exculpation of the Reviewer, on which an appeal will be founded. The press generally has taken a rather unworthy tone in the matter, instigated, probably, by a very natural envy and a not unprovoked dislike of the ablest and most influential paper in England, which has affronted each of its contemporaries. The Times, which has been unmercifully handled by the Review, behaves in a manner worthy of its old repute, and vindicates the liberty of the press in manful fashion against judicial misconstruction and Dissenting arrogance. It has done nothing so much to its honour for many years past.

By the command of the Queen, a Levee was held on her behalf by the Prince of Wales, on Wednesday week, at St. James's Palace. About a thousand gentlemen were presented, presentations on this occasion counting as presentations to her Majesty, entitling the debutant to be received at Court, and to be presented to foreign Sovereigns by the British Ambassador. The Princess Royal (Crown Princess of Prussia), held a Drawing Room, on behalf of the Queen, on Saturday, when 250 ladies were presented. The whole of the West End was gay that afternoon with carriages and powdered footmen, and occasional glimpses of the magnificent Court dresses, which scarcely find room, even in the ample carriages which fashion imposes on those who are entitled to attend a Drawing Room. The preparations for the reception of the future Princess of Wales on Saturday go on incessantly. The churches in the Strand have been made to support the tiers of seats rising nearly to the roof, and every window along the route is either "to let," or taken for the occasion.

Parliament has been singularly inactive this week, and the Parliamentary debates have been unusually dull. The House of Lords was enlivened on Monday evening by the presence of the Prince of Wales, who came down and sat for a few minutes on the cross benches, as if to compensate for the withdrawal of Lord Campbell's motion for the correspondence of the Government with Washington and with Mr. Mason, which reduced the evening's entertainment to more than usual dreariness. The House of Commons was amused on Friday by the spectacle of an unfortunate fellow-creature "brought to the bar"—a spectacle which attracted a very full House, and crowded yet more the almost always crowded galleries. The latter have, however, been once or twice almost half empty during the present session; a striking proof of the dulness of the debates; for in general even the dreariest discussion on a Railway Bill, or an item in Committee of Supply, is sufficient for the curiosity of the public, and attracts more strangers than can find room in the long pews assigned to them, facing the Speaker's chair, and the comfortable gallery occupied by the reporters.

The Court of the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford University has declared itself incompetent to deal with the case of Professor Jowett, which is accordingly dismissed. The feeling in the University seems to be hostile to Dr. Pusey; and in the Church at large a great majority of clergymen regard the latter as an unsound and dangerous guide on matters of theology. It is very probable, therefore, that the prosecution will be pressed no further; and we shall abstain from expressing an opinion upon its merits unless we hear of it again in a higher court.

The Bench of Bishops, or nearly all of them, have addressed a gently-worded but substantially-strong protest to the Bishop of Natal. They point out to him the inconsistency between his doctrines and those of the Church, and the impropriety of his longer retaining possession of his See. If this remonstrance do not induce Dr. Colenso to resign, we shall be compelled to form a low opinion of his sense of truth and duty. Whatever may be the value of his criticisms on the Pentateuch, there can be no doubt as to their incompatibility with his professed belief and official duty as a Bishop of the Church of England.

The National Rifle Association held its annual general meeting yesterday, the Duke of Cambridge, Commander-in-chief in the chair. His Royal Highness stated that the finances of the Association were in a flourishing condition, and urged on volunteer officers the expediency of becoming subscribers. Several suggestions were made with regard to prospective improvements in the details of the annual rifle competition at Wimbledon, particularly with a view to the encouragement of the use of the Enfield rifle, the established weapon of the regular army and the volunteer corps.

Mr. Sergeant Glover, late proprietor of the Morning Chronicle, came before Mr. Justice Blackburn in Chambers, to make an application in regard to his suit now pending against sundry Ministers of the French Government for various dirty work done by the defunct paper on their behalf. He repeated the story of his own shame, the shabby behaviour of his employers, and the ruin of his paper by the suspicions which came to attach to it. A Commission had been granted to take evidence in Paris; it had not completed its work, and an order had been made to extend the time allowed it. Mr. Sergeant Glover applied to have this order rescinded. He had been over in Paris to watch the proceedings of the Commission, and had been there grossly maltreated by the Parisian police. Mr. Justice Blackburn dismissed the application.

undertook it. We cannot congratulate Spain upon the change. O'Donnell has done more than any previous Spanish Premier to maintain the honour and develop the power of Spain, and if he has done nothing to redeem its financial discredit, it must be remembered that the recognition of a debt for which no legal obligation now exists would encounter an immense opposition in the Cortes. A Narvaez Ministry is not likely to consult the true interests of Spain so well as O'Donnell and his colleagues did, nor is Miraflores likely to do better. The Queen-mother Christina is said to have some part in the overthrow of O'Donnell, and the programme of the new Ministry may include her return to Madrid.

The new Ambassador to the French Court, Senor Isturitz, for a long time the representative of Spain in this country, has presented his credentials to the Emperor, and the usual complimentary speeches have been exchanged.

Cardinal Antonelli has tendered his resignation. Its acceptance would presage a complete revolution in the Papal policy. For many years Antonelli twisted the Pope round his little finger. His strong will and his thorough knowledge of the weaknesses and prejudices of the well-meaning but feeble Pontiff have made him the virtual ruler of the State. For the last three years, however, he has had to bear a rival near his throne, in Monsignor de Merode, the Papal Secretary of War. There has been much bickering between these two Ministers. Antonelli is shrewd and cautious. Merode is impetuous and indiscreet. It is an act of Merode which has provoked Antonelli's resignation. A certain Signor Fausti, the chamberlain and factotum of Antonelli, was arrested by the orders of Merode, in the most ostentatious manner, at mid-day, in the presence of the congregation issuing from a fashionable church, upon the charge of being connected with political offenders. Antonelli seems to have considered this arrest an insult to himself, to have remonstrated, and, his remonstrance failing, to have tendered his resignation. The Pope has not yet accepted it, and is not likely to do so. He cannot do without Antonelli, and Antonelli, knowing how necessary he is, has probably only resigned in order to return to office upon conditions which will protect him against all interference from Monsignor de Merode.

The Italian Chamber of Deputies has passed, by 204 to 32 votes, the Bill introduced by Signor Minghetti to authorize the loan of 700 million lire. The Italian Government may therefore be expected to make an appeal to the money market for a portion of this sum in a very short time. The opposition to the Bill was based not on the ground that the Minister asked too much, but that he took too little. The speakers against the Bill denied that 700 million lire would suffice to cover the deficit already existing and the extraordinary and ordinary deficits for the ensuing years. Great complaints are made of the apathy of the Italian public. It seems disposed to leave these important questions of reorganization and finance to the Government. Such an indifference to the very questions in which the public is so materially interested is, no doubt, a serious evil; but it is the necessary reaction from the feverish excitement in which the different Italian Governments have kept the people by the promise of Rome and Venice.

Whilst the Committee appointed by the Italian Parliament to inquire into the "brigandage" in Naples is pursuing its investigations under a strong escort of military in one part of the kingdom, the brigands are making themselves very disagreeably manifest in other parts. A band of sixty brigands surrounded and destroyed a small party of soldiers at Benevento the other day, and from most of the provinces come complaints that the brigands wax bolder. General La Marmora, with his 90,000 men, can do nothing with them—for the simple reason that the whole population sympathizes with them, aids them, and recruits their bands.

The Moldo-Wallachian Assembly has adopted, by a small majority, an address to Prince Couza, in which it condemns strongly the conduct of his Government. It complains of violations of the Constitution, the dissolution of the Assembly five times in four years, the manipulation of the electoral law; that the budgets have been raised from 60 million to 120 million francs; and that, nevertheless, the army wants necessities, the public servants are not paid regularly, the Treasury orders not paid when due, and sell at 25 per cent. discount; that the budget has not been examined and voted since 1861; that the accounts are not presented to the Chamber; that individual liberty is not respected; and that public functionaries are dismissed and transferred at the caprice of the Government.

The indictment is a pretty strong one; the Government, on its part, contends that the Assembly does not represent the nation, and urges upon it the adoption of a new electoral law.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 26.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Taking an opportunity afforded by a question from the Marquis of Normanby, Lord Russell explained the position held at Rome by Mr. Odo Russell. That gentleman had gone there first as an attache of our Legation at Florence, and afterwards as an attache of the Legation at Naples. Now, those Legations had ceased to exist; and Cardinal Antonelli had objected to receive Mr. Russell as an attache to the Embassy at Turin, accredited to an excommunicated sovereign. Accordingly, he was now at Rome simply as a servant of the Foreign Office.—Lord Derby inquired into truth of a rumour that Cardinal Antonelli had charged Mr. Russell with misrepresentation and misstatement, and declared that he could only receive him in a private capacity.—Lord Russell replied that he had heard nothing of the kind.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 26.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Sir F. Smith (member for Chatham) called attention to a breach of privilege. He had taken occasion, in debate, on the Naval Estimates, to question the fitness of Mr. Reed, selected by the Admiralty, for the post of Chief Constructor of the Navy. He had received a letter from Mr. Reed, accusing him of making false and libellous statements. [The hon. gentleman read the letter, and repeated his actual remarks, which happened to be indisputably true, and were in no sense libellous.] If Mr. Reed had, as he understood from the Secretary to the Admiralty, written an apology, he was willing to accept it, and press the matter no further. The House, however, would not allow Sir F. Smith to let the question drop. The letter excited great displeasure; and after repeated cries of "move," Sir F. Smith moved that the offender should be called to the bar.—Lord C. Paget (Secretary to the Admiralty) asked for delay, in order that he might induce Mr. Reed to make a private apology; but he was met with cries of "No, no."—Sir G. Grey suggested that the first thing to be done was to move that the letter was a breach of privilege.—Sir F. Smith did so.—Mr. Roebuck insisted on an apology at the bar.—The motion that the letter was a breach of privilege was agreed to amid loud cheers, and Sir F. Smith moved that Mr. Reed should be called to the bar of the House on Friday, which was agreed to.

The Prince of Wales' Annuity Bill was passed.

On the motion for going into Committee of Supply, Mr. H. Baillie moved the following resolution: "That whereas by a Royal Proclamation addressed to the native Princes and peoples of India, published the 1st of November, 1858, it is stated 'That we desire no extension of our present territorial possessions, and while we will permit no aggression upon our dominions or our rights to be attempted with impunity, we shall sanction no encroachment in those of others;' and again, 'We hereby announce to the native Princes of India that all treaties and engagements made with them by or under the authority of the Hon. East India Company are by us accepted, and will be scrupulously maintained;' so, in the opinion of this House, where differences of opinion have arisen with respect to the interpretation of such treaties, the questions at issue ought to be referred for decision to her Majesty's Privy Council." In justification of his motion, he entered upon a long and minute exposition of the case of the Nawab of the Carnatic, supported by documentary evidence, observing that this was not a solitary instance of violation of treaties and spoliation of territory in India.—The motion was seconded by Mr. Smollet, who cited as additional instances of alleged violation of treaty obligation by the British Government in India, the cases of Sattara, Nagpore, Oude, and Tanjore.—Sir C. Wood observed that he was not prepared, by the terms of this motion, nor was the House, he thought, called upon, to go into all the cases which had been referred to; but as to the general question, the Government did accept all the treaties and engagements made by the East India Company, and would scrupulously maintain them; and, in the interpretation of those engagements, they acted upon their own responsibility, subject to the opinion of Parliament. He reviewed the main features of the cases cited, remarking that, in his opinion, the proclamation was a very wise and politic measure, and that he did not think he was called upon to undo what had been done by the Government of the day years and years ago. He thought the House would not take so strange a view of the subject as to refer these questions to the Privy Council. After a few words from Colonel Sykes, in defence of the East India Company, the motion was negatived, upon a division, by 104 to 24.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, resumed the consideration of the Navy Estimates. On the vote of £165,322 for the Admiralty-office, Mr. Lindsay, Mr. Bentinck, and Sir M. Peto strongly condemned the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, the former suggesting a different constitution and a different distribution of the business of the office. The vote was ultimately agreed to with several others.—On the vote for £1,334,051 for naval stores for the building, repair, and machinery of ships, in the department of the Store-keeper-General of the Navy, Lord C. Paget explained that it was intended to use the large stock of seasoned timber in store in constructing frames of vessels of wood to be covered with iron. This explanation gave rise to a warm debate, it being argued on one hand, that iron-covered vessels might thereby be built quicker and cheaper, and that the timber was already paid for; on the other, that it was no reason for using an inferior material for the frames of vessels because there happened to be a large excess of timber in store, and that if we were to have an iron fleet it should be an effective one, that would not be a burden on the country for repairs.—Mr. Lindsay moved to reduce the vote by £134,000, the computed cost of the iron plates of the vessels proposed so to be built.—Other members urged that, as there was some obscurity in the matter, the vote should be postponed. Lord Palmerston having proposed that the Government should lay before the House a statement of the comparative time and cost of constructing vessels with iron frames and with wooden frames, no steps being taken meanwhile with the five ships now in the course of construction, the amendment was withdrawn, and the vote agreed to.

The Post-office Savings Banks Bill was read a second time, the Chancellor of the Exchequer insisting, somewhat discourteously, on pressing it in the absence of Mr. Disraeli, who was desirous to speak upon it. The Bill to make a holiday on the 7th of March, by postponing bills of exchange falling due that day, was read a second time.

Mr. Monsell moved for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the registration of marriages in Ireland, which was founded, he said, mutatis mutandis, upon the Scotch Act, employing the same machinery as that contained in the Bill for registering births and deaths. After some remarks by Sir R. Peel (who did not oppose the motion), and other members, leave was given to introduce the Bill. Leave was given to bring in other Bills, and the House adjourned at 40 minutes past 12 o'clock.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 27.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Lord Ellenborough remarked that a Prussian Minister had contradicted Lord Russell with regard to the recent convention with Russia on the affairs of Poland. He should not ask for any explanation. He hoped that if any serious complications arose between England and Russia her Majesty's Government would not hesitate to come to Parliament for support.—Lord Russell said that the contradiction had no reference to the essential part of his statement. In answer to Lord Shaftesbury, the noble earl stated that some Polish students had been sent across the frontier by the Prussian authorities, but he did not know whether they had been surrendered to the Russians.

The Prince of Wales' Annuity Bill was read a second time without observation.

Lord Stanhope (formerly a member of the Government of Sir Robert Peel, and the author of a very able history of England in the reigns of the three first Georges) asked some questions regarding transportation to Western Australia. He pointed out the great difficulties which lay in the path of convicts desirous to earn an honest livelihood in this country, especially of women, and urged the necessity of selection in order to prevent the colony of Western Australia from refusing to receive any more transported criminals. He complained that, though convicts for that colony had at first been carefully selected, the Government had now sent thither the whole convict establishment of Bermuda.—The Duke of Newcastle (Secretary of State for the Colonies) said that he had sent out murderers and other ruffians to Western Australia in considerable numbers, and that, after this, the sending thither a single shipload of similar offenders from Bermuda was not of much consequence.

A debate followed on the affairs of the University of Durham. It had been enacted, some time ago, that a Royal Commission should report a scheme for the future government of that University; that its report should be submitted to Parliament; and that if neither House interposed by an address to the Crown within forty days, the Crown might proceed to carry out the report of the Commissioners. This report was laid on the table, but apparently not printed (nor was the attention of the House called to it), sixteen days before the close of last session. This was the twenty-fourth day of the present session, and the Government insisted that it was the last on which an address could be moved to prevent the scheme of the Commissioners from becoming law. The Bishop of Exeter had given notice of an address, but as the only member of the Commission who had a seat in the House of Lords was not present, he felt obliged to postpone it. This looks like very sharp practice on the part of the Government.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 27.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. Layard promised that the Italo-French Treaty of Commerce should be laid on the table as soon as it was ratified.

Sir George Grey explained the arrangements made for the reception of the Princess Alexandra of Denmark on the 7th inst. She is to be escorted through Southwark by the High Bailiff of the borough; through the City by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and through Westminster by the Duke of Buccleuch, High Steward of that city. The Corporation of the City of London are, after passing Temple Bar, to fall into the rear of the procession.

Mr. Reed was called before the House to account for his letter referred to in the debate of Thursday. The ceremony was a curious one. The Sergeant-at-Arms (Lord C. J. F. Russell) rose from his chair, walked to the middle of the space in front of the door, and bowed to the House. He was asked by the Speaker if Mr. Reed were in attendance; and on answering that he was, was directed to introduce him. From each of the two desks that close the lower end of the front bench below the gangway on either side a brass rod was drawn out, making a bar across the house. To this Mr. Reed advanced, in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, bowing three times to the Speaker.—The Speaker: Mr. Reed, did you write a letter to Sir F. Smith, a member of this House?—Mr. Reed: I did, Sir.—The Speaker: Is that the letter?—Mr. Reed (after examining the letter, which was handed to him for that purpose by the Clerk of the House): It is, Sir.—The Speaker: I have to acquaint you that that letter has been adjudged to be a breach of the privileges of this House. Have you anything to say in respect of that letter?—Mr. Reed: Sir, I was not aware that I was committing a breach of the privileges of this House when I wrote that letter, or I certainly should never have written it. Finding now that I have committed an offence, I beg to tender to the House the most ample apology that I can offer, and I beg the pardon of the House for having offended against its rules. To the hon. and gallant member for Chatham I beg to tender a double apology—in the first place, for having written any letter at all to him concerning remarks made by him in this House; and, secondly, for having employed in the letter I did write phrases, I confess, of great impropriety. (Hear, hear.) I am quite confident now that I wrote that letter under great irritation, that the hon. and gallant gentleman was entirely misunderstood by me on Monday evening, and that he did not intend to do me any injustice. I hope, Sir, that this apology will be deemed satisfactory by the hon. and gallant gentleman, and the more so as I have a very deep sense of the estimation in which the hon. and gallant gentleman is held by the public, by this House, and by his honourable profession. (Hear, hear.)—The Speaker: You may withdraw. Mr. Reed, accompanied by the Sergeant, having retired with the usual obeisances, Sir F. Smith moved that Mr. Reed, having made an ample apology, be discharged from further attendance; which was agreed to.

On the order for going into Committee of Supply, Mr. Hennessy rose to move an address to the Crown on the subject of Poland, enumerating the wrongs of that country, pointing out the fact that those wrongs constitute a breach of the Treaty of Vienna, and calling on her Majesty to assert the rights conferred by that treaty. He spoke with great effect, though with a somewhat hesitating manner and bad delivery, and was complimented by all subsequent speakers on his success. He gave a history of the recent treatment of the Poles; of the arrest of the twelve Marshals of the nobility of Podolia for presenting a respectful address to the Czar; and of the banishment of Count Zamoyiski for a similar offence. He detailed the history of the infamous measure of conscription which had driven the Poles into insurrection; and showed conclusively that the conduct of Russia was a gross breach of her treaty engagements, and had been so from the first, and argued that those treaty engagements, to which England is a party, bound her to interpose.—Mr. Newdegate abused the Poles for their bigoted Catholicism, and thought Lord Palmerston might be trusted to do at least all that he ought to do for them.—Every subsequent speaker expressed the strongest sympathy with the Poles, and the deepest abhorrence of the recent measures of Russia, while the present course of the Prussian Government was treated with merciless and most contemptuous censure. Great difference of opinion prevailed as to whether the language of the proposed address would or would not compel the Crown to enforce its demands by war.—After Mr. Buxton, Mr. Monckton Milnes, Mr. Walter (chief proprietor of the Times), Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald, Mr. Stansfeld, and many other gentlemen on either side, had spoken, Mr. Walpole advised the withdrawal of the resolution, as it had served its purpose by eliciting from the House an unanimous expression of sympathy for Poland, and condemnation of the conduct of Russia and Prussia.—Lord Palmerston said he did not stand there to unsay anything he had formerly said. In the matter of Poland he repeated that the Treaty of Vienna had been systematically violated. It was impossible not to feel the deepest sympathy for the Polish nation. He believed that the present Emperor of Russia did mean and meant to improve the condition of his Polish subjects; but no doubt the late act of conscription was entirely discordant with such a disposition, and accounted for the outbreak.

It was a most barbarous act, a cruel political piece of tyranny under the pretence of a military measure. He could not but conceive that to a Sovereign gifted with the feelings of the Emperor of Russia military success would be a great and signal calamity. If the insurrection was put down, he would have a country in which the plains would be bathed in blood, and the towns be smoking ruins. A Sovereign with his enlightened views would be disposed to grant an amnesty and give the Poles the institutions promised to them. He hoped Mr. Hennessy would be satisfied with the unanimous expression of opinion in the House and would not press his motion, the objections to which were really very great. It assumed that by the Treaty of Vienna we were under an obligation to interfere. We had a right to interfere, but were not under an obligation to do so. In the interests of a cause which the House and the country had at heart the course best adapted to accomplish the purpose in view was to leave it, as proposed by Mr. Walpole, to the responsibility of the Government to advise the Crown in the matter.—Mr. Disraeli said that the object of England in the Congress of Vienna, in 1815, had been to obtain the reconstitution of the independent Kingdom of Poland. In that we had failed, owing to the weakness of France and Austria, and the vast strength of Russia. Now circumstances were changed, and our former policy might be resumed with more hope of success. He was surprised that the Government had given no intimation of their policy, but recommended the withdrawal of the resolution. This advice was ultimately adopted.

The Tobacco Duties Bill was again debated. By persistent motions, its opponents compelled the adjournment of the debate. The House rose at 1 a.m.

MONDAY, MARCH 2.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Lord Cambell's motion in reference to America, was postponed in consequence of his lordship's indisposition. It will be brought forward at an early date.

The Prince and Princess of Wales' Annuities Bill passed through Committee.

The Drainage of Land (Ireland) Bill was read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee.

The Duke of Somerset, in moving for the second reading of the Naval Coast Volunteers Act Amendment Bill, briefly explained the object of the Bill, which was to abolish the restriction as to service of 300 miles from the coast in respect to future volunteers.—Lord Hardwicke considered that the enormous number of 76,000 seamen and marines was uncalled for in time of peace.—The Duke of Somerset said it was inexpedient, under existing circumstances, to reduce the naval forces of the country.

MONDAY, MARCH 2.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to Mr. Caird, Mr. Layard said that the attention of the Government had been called to more than one vessel which was supposed to be fitted out for the service of the Confederate States as the Alabama was fitted out. (Hear.) Up to this moment, however, no evidence had been furnished which would enable the Government to act according to law. (Hear.) He could assure his hon. friend that orders had been given that any vessels suspected of being fitted out in that manner were to be closely watched. (Hear.)

The House went into Committee on the Bill to continue the Act of last session for the relief of the Unions in the cotton districts.—Mr. Villiers inserted a clause limiting the duration of the Act to Midsummer next, and another including in the expenditure of a Union on the poor (the rate of which determines its right to take the benefit of this Act) its contributions under the Act in aid of other Unions. A clause apportioning the contributions in aid of a Union situate in two or more counties was also agreed to.—Mr. Hibbert, (M.P. for Oldham,) moved the insertion of a clause giving the Public Works' Loan Commissioners power to advance money to Boards of Guardians; pointing out the difficulties now experienced in borrowing of private capitalists on security of parish rates.—The Chairman of Committees ruled that the motion was out of order. To give power to public servants to employ public funds in any new way, an Act of Parliament was required, which must originate with a Minister of the Crown.—Some further discussion took place, and the Bill passed through Committee, and the Speaker resumed the chair.
